Many Republicans, and some Democrats, say it will be hard for Democrats to win unless they go beyond attacking Republicans and offer a program of their own. And Ken Mehlman, the Republican national chairman, said the Republicans' own experience in politics suggested that running against someone who is not on the ballot is challenging. "The last time this kind of morph ad was tried was in '98 when we tried to nationalize the races against Clinton and it didn't work," he said.

Kenneth M. Goldstein, an associate professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin who studies campaign advertisements, said the focus by Democrats on Iraq and security was a sharp shift from what he had observed in the last two election cycles. Then, Mr. Bush was far more popular and public opinion on the war had not changed, but Mr. Goldstein argued that the Democrats still might have made a mistake in not trying to at least challenge Republicans on the war.

"If you're running a campaign, you try to engage on a subject or change the subject," Mr. Goldstein said. "The Democratic strategy in 2002 and 2004 was very much to change the subject."

This time around, Mr. Bush can be found in Democratic advertisements running in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Arizona, Tennessee, New Jersey and other states.

In New Jersey, Senator Robert Menendez, a Democrat facing a tough election battle, strode along the New Jersey waterfront, attacking the president — rather than, say, the Republican he is running against this fall, Thomas H. Kean Jr. — as failing to improve security in the nation's ports.

"Five years after 9/11, President Bush still doesn't get it: homeland security starts here," Mr. Menendez says.

In Rhode Island, Sheldon Whitehouse, the Democratic challenger to Senator Lincoln Chafee, turns to a room of voters and says, "I want to make it absolutely clear that we need to effect a responsible deployment of our troops out of Iraq." In South Florida, Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr. is pictured between photographs of Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, under the words, "Shaw votes for the Bush/Cheney agenda 90 percent of the time." The announcer says that Mr. Shaw, who is facing a tough challenge from Ron Klein, is "refusing to question their handling of the war in Iraq."

Howard Wolfson, a Democratic consultant, produced a television advertisement for Kirsten Gillibrand, the Democratic challenger to Representative John E. Sweeney of New York, that opens with the image of Mr. Bush saying, "We are making good progress in Iraq."

"You wouldn't have done that two years ago," Mr. Wolfson said.

Republicans have responded with advertisements attacking Democrats for raising taxes and as being weak on national security. And they have invoked their own political totems: In Indiana, Republicans use a picture of Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader who would probably become the next speaker should Democrats take the House, in an advertisement attacking Brad Ellsworth, a Democratic sheriff running a very threatening challenge to Representative John Hostettler.

"Pelosi and other Democrats want to raise your taxes, cut and run in Iraq and give amnesty to illegal immigrants," the announcer says.

The Republicans have turned to images of Mr. McCain in ads, including one for Mr. Kean in New Jersey.

But for sheer star power, nothing matches a president, as Republicans certainly demonstrated in 2002 and 2004, when Mr. Bush was a constant presence in almost all the Republican campaigns. Mr. Bush's image this fall is being invoked by Democrats as a proxy for Americans who want change in Washington; who oppose the war in Iraq; who think Mr. Bush has not done enough to protect the nation from future terrorist attacks; or who are angry with changes Mr. Bush has pressed in Medicare.

"It's not just photos," said John Lapp, who runs the Democratic campaign committee's independent advertising program. "It's statements and actions and votes that show a pattern of people being with Bush."

Steve Murphy, a consultant whose firm made the Iraq advertisement for Ms. Madrid of New Mexico, said: "The war is a dominant issue. For all these Republican candidates who are going through gyrations to distance themselves from Bush — well, if they support Bush on the war, there is nothing more illustrative of the fact that they are in bed with Bush."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat leading his party's campaign to take back the Senate, said: "In 2004, people were still happy with Bush's course in Iraq. Now they are not."

That shows in terrorism, too. Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democratic candidate for Senate in Tennessee, walks through an airplane as he criticizes the administration's efforts in protecting the nation from terrorism, and mocks any suggestion that the White House deserves credit for the arrests in Britain of a ring of terror suspects accused of plotting to bomb airlines headed for the United States.

"Thank God the British stopped them," Mr. Ford says, adding: "Today our ports and borders remain vulnerable to terrorists."

Is The Incumbent Too Close To Bush? Or Not Close Enough? (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

In this television commercial, Patricia Madrid, a Democrat from New Mexico running for the House of Representatives, highlights a theme of her campaign: that her opponent, Representative Heather A. Wilson, a Republican, is too close to President Bush on Iraq and other issues.

THE SCRIPT "It's a simple choice. Heather Wilson voted for the Bush-Cheney energy plan. She voted for their Medicare plan that gives pharmaceutical companies $139 billion, instead of requiring Medicare to negotiate lower prescription drug prices. And Heather Wilson supports George Bush on the war in Iraq with no questions asked. If you agree, you should vote for Heather Wilson. But if you want change in Washington, Patricia Madrid for Congress."

ON THE SCREEN The spot opens with a picture of Ms. Madrid, the state attorney general, in what appears to be a courtroom. It then shows drilling operations and a pharmacy counter, with headlines that say "Elderly will have to pay for government's sellout'' and "Insurance, drug industries will benefit most from bill." When the commercial focuses on Iraq, it shows Ms. Wilson standing shoulder to shoulder with Mr. Bush.

ACCURACY In 2005, Ms. Wilson voted for an omnibus energy bill that followed the general outlines of Mr. Bush's energy program, emphasizing greater production of oil, gas and coal. In 2003, she voted with most Republicans for the bill that added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare. Republicans say the new Medicare program has been a boon to older Americans. Under the law, Medicare officials cannot negotiate prices with drug manufacturers. But Republicans say that private insurers have negotiated substantial discounts for Medicare beneficiaries who enroll in their prescription drug plans.

Ms. Wilson, a former Air Force officer, has generally supported the war in Iraq, saying Americans would be less safe if the United States abruptly pulled out its troops without completing the mission set by the Bush administration.

On the other hand, in recent months, she has displayed a large degree of independence on some issues. In February, she broke ranks with Mr. Bush and said she had "serious concerns" about the administration's wiretapping program. She has led House efforts to regulate the use of such surveillance, by imposing more restrictions than the White House wants. Ms. Wilson is chairwoman of a subcommittee of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence that monitors the National Security Agency, but she said she learned of the wiretapping program from news accounts in December.

In this advertisement, Representative Nancy L. Johnson, Republican of Connecticut, portrays her Democratic opponent, Chris Murphy, as weak on national security issues.

THE SCRIPT The narrator, speaking in urgent tones, says: "A call is placed from New York to a known terrorist in Pakistan. A terrorist plot may be unfolding. Should the government intercept that call or wait until the paperwork is filed? Nancy Johnson says: 'Act immediately. Lives may be at stake.' Liberal Chris Murphy says: 'No. Apply for a court warrant even if valuable time is lost.' Chris Murphy — wrong on security, wrong for America."

ON THE SCREEN The commercial creates the feel of a military or intelligence command center, full of high technology and grainy pictures with an eerie green tint. The spot begins with a satellite image of Earth and focuses in on North America. A yellow line arcs from the United States to Pakistan as the narrator describes the telephone call to a terrorist. When the narrator suggests that Mr. Murphy would delay electronic surveillance, words flash across the television screen: "Signal lost. Access denied. Data inaccessible due to regulation DD247/22Y. All further intel denied. Authorization code 7726C." A few seconds later the viewer sees a similar message: "Access denied. Court order required." The screen shows a blur of government paperwork, including a document from the Senate Judiciary Committee. The spot concludes with a picture of Mrs. Johnson, her right hand over her heart, and four veterans in the act of saluting. All look upward, as if to a flag in the distance.

ACCURACY Mrs. Johnson, a member of Congress since 1983, is best known for her work on Medicare and insurance issues. But this commercial underlines her contention that her top priority is to protect the nation against terrorist attacks and that electronic surveillance is needed to "protect American lives."

Mr. Murphy, a state senator, says the commercial misrepresents his position. He says he would not force the government to delay wiretaps on calls involving suspected terrorists, but would require officials to follow procedures set forth in existing law: the attorney general can authorize the emergency use of electronic surveillance if he seeks court authorization within 72 hours. Mr. Murphy maintains that the administration has flouted the requirements of current law, and in a statement this week he said, "Nancy Johnson's loyalty to President Bush is so strong that she supports him even when he breaks the law."

Candidate Agonistes And Iraq (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

The headline Thursday morning from Iraq read: "Nearly 100 Killed in Baghdad During 24 Brutal Hours." That's what faced embattled Republican Rep. Chris Shays of Connecticut -- along with a plate of lukewarm scrambled eggs and a tableful of reporters at a press breakfast sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor.

Shays waved away the breakfast plate, but he had a harder time dismissing his own doubts about what he terms "the noble mission" that brought the United States to Iraq.

By the end of an hour, it was clear to everyone that the war has reduced this 60-year-old, nine-term veteran of the House to a complete head case -- consumed by the convoluted efforts to square the circle of his own conflicting impulses.

Shays's symptoms are important, because he is no ordinary member of Congress. He has made 14 trips to Iraq in the past three years as chairman of a subcommittee on national security -- more, he says, than any other legislator.

He made news in August by saying that, as a longtime supporter of the war, he thought it was time to tell the Iraqi government that unless it acted promptly to unify the country, U.S. forces would have no choice but to withdraw.

What emerged at breakfast was a far more nuanced -- and tortured -- set of views and a self-absorbed soliloquy that may reveal what is going on inside the heads of other politicians less prone than Shays to treat a breakfast for reporters as a session on the psychiatrist's couch.

Shays brought a bundle of contradictions to the Iraq issue. A conscientious objector during the Vietnam War, he had to wrestle with his conscience and, he said, his religious faith as a Christian Scientist before he could support President George H.W. Bush's decision to use force to repel Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait.

But he had no qualms about the current president's decision to invade Iraq, because he believed Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. And even now he expresses scorn for those who say they regret their votes to authorize this war because the weapons were not there. "I would never back away from my vote," he said.

On the other hand . . . .

"The president has no credibility," Shays said, because of that intelligence blunder and because management of the war has been awful. Notable as he found the Iraqis' political achievement in writing and ratifying a constitution and electing a government in Baghdad, he said: "Since January, there has been no progress" toward reconciling Shiite-Sunni conflicts and transferring the responsibility for policing the country to the growing army of Iraqis.

Shays said he has become skeptical that the Shiite-dominated government on which the administration has placed its reliance will ever take the necessary steps -- unless the United States makes them a condition for its remaining.

On the other hand . . . .

It would be "immoral," Shays says, simply to set a date or a timetable for withdrawal, as Ned Lamont, who won the Democratic Senate nomination in Connecticut over Sen. Joseph Lieberman, has suggested. Rather, Shays said, withdrawal should be conditioned on the Iraqis reaching certain specified troop levels, after which every new Iraqi soldier or police officer would mean another American could come home, until only a residual force was left.

Shays's position now is almost identical to that of his Democratic challenger, Diane Farrell, who has continued to attack President Bush's policies and fault Shays and the Republican Congress for "lax oversight" of the war.

But Shays says that, unlike his critics, he believes fervently that the threat of Islamic terrorism is real and growing and that the president's second inaugural speech, calling for a worldwide offensive for democracy, represents a "historic" redefinition of American purpose.

Shays stopped off at Scotland Yard on his way home from Iraq last month, and what he learned from the British alarmed him: Al-Qaeda cells with technology more advanced than those arrested in August for planning to blow up airplanes on transatlantic flights are probably operating today. He is convinced that we will be attacked some day with chemical, biological and possibly nuclear weapons. He feels like a lonely Paul Revere, trying to warn people to take precautions.

But ultimately, he acknowledged, "my only concern is my own credibility." It is terribly important to Shays that his agonizing over Iraq not be confused with any worry about reelection. His race is very much in doubt, but he wants everyone to know that "if Iraq costs me election," it will not bother him. He just wants his constituents to know he cares.

O'Malley, Cardin Hope To Link Rivals To Bush (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And John Wagner, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Republicans Say Tactic Won't Work

The campaigns are for high political office in Maryland, but the Democratic candidates' toughest attacks are focused on a man from Texas: George W. Bush.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, who is challenging incumbent Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., calls his opponent "the George Bush Mini-Me of Maryland," and he has plastered the same photo on three recent campaign mailers. It shows Ehrlich and the president arm in arm.

Benjamin L. Cardin (D), the 10-term congressman from Baltimore who is taking on Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in the race for an open U.S. Senate seat, mentions his opponent on the stump. But he saves a battery of attacks for Bush and urges voters to elect Cardin because "George Bush is leading this nation in the wrong direction."

The Democratic effort to nationalize the two high-profile Maryland campaigns is unmistakable, the latest sign that party leaders believe anger at the president might be the decisive emotion that drives voters to the polls in November.

Republicans, however, say it won't sell.

"They don't seem to realize that George Bush isn't running for Senate or governor in Maryland," said state GOP Chairman John Kane. "I think they're so lost for something to grab onto to move this state forward that this is all they can talk about."

Republicans aren't countering by embracing Bush, though -- Steele and Ehrlich skipped the president's recent Labor Day visit to Maryland. Instead, they have been running campaigns that never mention their party affiliation, casting themselves as party-neutral moderates.

In his ubiquitous first campaign ad, Steele tells viewers he'll "talk straight about what's wrong in both parties."

Ehrlich's campaign is more issue-oriented, but he also has used advertising to try to convey a centrist, party-neutral image. In his first commercial, supporters tell viewers: "He doesn't govern from the right. Or the left. But the center, where most of us are."

Parris N. Glendening (D), a former two-term Maryland governor, said the Steele and Ehrlich campaigns offer the best evidence that the Democrats are onto something.

"To me, the strongest sign that this strategy is going to work is in the way the Republicans are responding," Glendening said. "Look at them. They're running as fast as they can from their party."

Glendening said Maryland Democrats are following a road map that is being used in contests throughout the country. It's a strategy that mirrors the 1994 Republican plan, in which GOP candidates across the country sought to tar opponents by linking them to a then-unpopular President Bill Clinton, said Jim Jordan, a national Democratic strategist.

"Especially in a Democrat-dominated state like Maryland, where there's a thirst for change, it's smart politics to try to tap into that kind of passion," Jordan said.

Democrats received the same advice in a March strategy memo that advised linking Steele to Bush. The party followed suit, going so far as launching a Web site to highlight those ties.

A Washington Post poll in June found that the president had a 33 percent approval rating in the state and that 56 percent of voters would be less likely to support a candidate who they knew had Bush's support.

Two months before Ehrlich was elected in November 2002, Bush was seen favorably by 56 percent and unfavorably by 29 percent of Maryland voters, according to a Gonzales/Arscott Research and Communications poll.

In appearances since winning the Democratic nomination Tuesday, Cardin has repeatedly linked Bush to Steele. At a Democratic rally Friday in Annapolis, Cardin said Bush should be held accountable for "blocking" stem cell research and shortchanging education funding.

Yesterday, at a rally in Baltimore, Cardin said Steele sounded like a Democrat when he made his acceptance speech as the Republican nominee.

"Isn't this the same Michael Steele that George Bush recruited to run for the United States Senate?" Cardin asked the crowd.

Bush has not been as central a focus of O'Malley's effort to unseat Ehrlich, but references to Bush have been sprinkled throughout his speeches, mailings and campaign commercials.

O'Malley speeches include a section about the federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina, widely considered a low point in Bush's presidency.

At a recent forum on disability issues, O'Malley invoked Bush's name more than a dozen times as Ehrlich stood on stage looking befuddled by the line of attack. O'Malley said that federal spending cuts were hampering state programs to aid the disabled.

"We need a governor who can stand up against the wrongheaded, mean-spirited . . . cuts being shoved down on the state . . . by the Bush administration and the Republican Congress," O'Malley said.

O'Malley has repeatedly said Bush and Ehrlich are "in lock step" and in an interview Friday gave several examples, including Ehrlich's refusal this year to fight a Bush administration plan to allow a company owned by the government of Dubai to manage the Port of Baltimore. O'Malley said Ehrlich and Bush oppose raising the minimum wage, oppose allowing reimportation of drugs from Canada and support tax cuts that have disproportionately benefited the wealthy.

"I think he tries to emulate George Bush in every way," O'Malley said.

Anthony G. Brown, the Prince George's County delegate who is O'Malley's running mate, repeated that line -- "in lock step" -- five times during an interview Friday. The campaign is trying to reinforce that idea, Brown said, because the governor is "trying to portray this image that he's in the center."

For the most part, Ehrlich shrugged off O'Malley's efforts to link him to Bush, as he did when asked about it by reporters last week.

"I can't wait for the next person he wants to demonize," said Ehrlich, suggesting that the focus of the race should be on their respective records.

"Obviously, I agree with the president on a lot of issues," Ehrlich said. "I disagree on some."

The most notable differences are stem cell research and abortion rights, both of which Ehrlich supports.

Hans Kaiser, head of the Annapolis office of the GOP polling firm Moore Information, said Ehrlich is right to shrug off efforts to nationalize the campaign.

"The problem with it is, governors are very different than the national figures," said Kaiser, who is not working on any Maryland races. "It may work to generate enthusiasm with the Democratic base, but the people in the middle, those are the folks who don't respond to that argument. And they're the ones who will determine the outcome of the race."

Ehrlich, Kaiser said, should continue running on his record.

Ads the governor is airing in the Washington market target voters from both parties by focusing on issues with broad appeal in Maryland -- boosting funding for education, providing state money for stem cell research and cleaning up Chesapeake Bay.

Ehrlich's television spots in Baltimore, meanwhile, have for weeks focused narrowly on the performance of Baltimore schools -- an issue as local as they come.

In recent candidate forums, Ehrlich stressed how successful his administration has been in getting "waivers" to allow the state additional discretion on how it spends federal dollars on state programs.

But in making his case, Ehrlich never mentioned the president by name.

What Would The Democrats Do? (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON

FOR Democrats in Congress and those hoping to join them, the troublesome war in Iraq presents both a significant political opportunity and an exquisite dilemma.

Some recent polls show that voters consider the war the most important issue facing the country today and are very uneasy about the way the Bush administration is handling it.

Yet the public appears evenly split on what to do about it. Half say the United States should keep its troops in Iraq and the other half want the soldiers brought home. Half support a firm timetable for withdrawal; the other half think that's a bad idea.

So what's a Democratic candidate for Congress to say about Iraq, beyond articulating a broad antiwar message? Should he or she present a detailed plan for extricating the country from the increasingly unpopular war? Offer support for a firm timetable for withdrawal but leave the start and end dates vague? Say that such decisions are best left to the generals on the ground? Or just keep pounding President Bush, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and the Republicans in Congress for starting a misbegotten war with no way out?

Democratic candidates around the country are trying each of these approaches in a cacophony of frustration and sorrow, reflecting divisions in the party at the national level. If it is hard to see a Democratic plan to end the war, it's because there isn't one.

"It's a dog's breakfast," said Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, which has done extensive polling on public attitudes toward the war. "The reason that Democrats aren't talking about specific plans to end the war is because it's hard to figure out what to say without alienating a broad swath of the electorate."

Among the Democrats trying to find the right message on Iraq is Eric Massa, a United States Naval Academy graduate who spent 24 years on active duty and then worked as a staff member in Congress. He is challenging a freshman Republican representative, John R. Kuhl Jr., for a seat in western New York State. Mr. Massa offers a thought-out critique of the Bush policy in Iraq, based on his years in uniform and his service as a senior NATO officer dealing with the civil warfare in Bosnia.

"We will never be successful in creating a Jeffersonian democracy in Iraq at the tip of a bayonet," he said. "That's a fool's errand. The longer we try it, the more dire the consequences."

He gave qualified support for a plan devised by Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, to create three semiautonomous regions in Iraq to keep the Kurds, the Shiites and the Sunnis from each others' throats. Mr. Biden's plan is one of the most detailed Democratic blueprints for ending American involvement and has been embraced by a number of Democratic House and Senate candidates.

But even a staunch antiwar candidate like Mr. Massa, backed by the liberal group MoveOn.org and Senator John Kerry, now one of the strongest antiwar voices in Congress, flinches from calling for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq.

"Even if we started today," Mr. Massa said, "it would take 6 to 18 months to make it happen. But if we don't start today, we will never withdraw."

Mr. Massa's opponent pounced, calling that position tantamount to surrender. "That's the old cut and run," Mr. Kuhl said. "I will not send up the white flag as my opponent says he will."

The Kuhl-Massa debate, if you can call it that, illuminates the difficulties at least some Democrats are having talking about Iraq. The more specific they are in proposing solutions to the impasse in Iraq, the more they open themselves to Republican charges of defeatism, or worse.

"Is the 'cutting and running' charge working?" asked Douglas Foyle, a professor of political science at Wesleyan University. "My sense is it's not working so far, but that's not to say that it won't work later. The public doesn't really like the way things are going, but it isn't yet ready to run away."

A Pew Research Center poll released last week found that Democratic candidates attract strong support among Democratic voters by advocating immediate withdrawal, but that position tends to repel independents. The safest position appears to be supporting a timetable for withdrawal, which independents favor by 35 to 20 percent.

Professor Foyle said the situation Democrats face today is in some ways reminiscent of the 1968 election, in which neither President Lyndon Johnson nor the Democratic nominee for president, Vice President Hubert Humphrey, could answer growing public restiveness about Vietnam.

"L.B.J. lamented that he would listen to anyone who had a plan that met American goals and got the troops out of Vietnam," Mr. Foyle said. "Nobody had one."

THAT gave Richard Nixon freedom to run on a vague antiwar platform, promising to achieve "peace with honor" without having to say how he would do it. Some parodied his position as Mr. Nixon's "secret plan." But as a political strategy it worked. He won the White House, while it was five years before American troops were out of Vietnam.

Some Democratic candidates believe it is enough for them to point out the problems with the Iraq war and ride the tide of dissatisfaction into office. Others feel some duty to offer an alternative.

James Webb, a former marine and secretary of the Navy who is challenging Senator George Allen, the Virginia Republican, said that Mr. Allen and his allies ridicule him for criticizing the American war effort without offering a concrete plan to salvage it.

"The political conundrum that the Republicans really like is that they want the Democrats to step forward and say here's the timetable so they can attack the timetable," Mr. Webb said in an interview last week. "But my question is, 'What is your plan?' You say, 'Stay the course.' What does that mean?"

For his part, Mr. Allen hews quite closely to the White House on Iraq, and attacks Mr. Webb for offering what he says is a hodgepodge of proposals that do not deal with the immediate security crisis on the ground. "Like the Democrats nationally, Jim Webb cannot present any kind of clear position about where to go from here," said Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams.

In New Mexico, Patricia Madrid, the Democratic attorney general, is trying to unseat Representative Heather Wilson, a Republican on the House Intelligence Committee. Ms. Wilson is an Air Force Academy graduate, a Rhodes Scholar and a former National Security Council staff member.

Ms. Madrid said that she entered the race specifically to challenge Representative Wilson on Iraq, saying she bore particular responsibility by failing to exercise oversight of intelligence agencies that produced inaccurate reports on Iraqi weapons programs. "With all her experience, she should have known better," Ms. Madrid said.

Ms. Madrid has demanded that the administration produce a plan to end American involvement within a year, but she does not feel compelled to offer a specific plan of her own. "My proposal is to get out as soon as possible," she said. "I'm not a general, but this plan could involve some sort of redeployment of our troops in the region."

Representative Wilson, while expressing some misgivings about the conduct of the war, hits back at the early exit idea, framing the debate as "a choice between resolve and retreat."

Senator Biden, a once and possibly future presidential candidate, said that the Democrats probably can make substantial gains in the House and the Senate simply by pointing out how badly things are going in Iraq. But he said that Democrats and the public would be better served by a detailed discussion about how to get out of Iraq without leaving chaos behind.

"Pulling our troops out might be a last-ditch requirement, but it's not a plan," Mr. Biden said. He said that his proposal for partitioning the county could form the basis for a lasting solution that allowed American forces to exit in a reasonable time.

Bruce W. Jentleson, a professor of public policy at Duke University and an official in the State Department's office of policy planning under President Bill Clinton, said it may be unrealistic for some candidates to be so specific. "Most Congressional candidates don't have the savvy or experience to present a detailed plan for Iraq," said Mr. Jentleson, who advised Al Gore in the 2000 campaign but who is not working with any candidates this year. "If they're asked one hard question past their talking points, they won't be able to answer it.

"Many of them think it's enough to run on negativity on the Bush policy. I'm not convinced that's true. That feeds the perception that Democrats know what they're against but not what they're for."

Save Yourself, Blame Bush (WP)

By Joe Scarborough

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

I can't help but feel sorry for my old Republican friends in Congress who are fighting for their political lives. After all, it must be tough explaining to voters at their local Baptist church's Keep Congress Conservative Day that it was their party that took a $155 billion surplus and turned it into a record-setting $400 billion deficit.

How exactly does one convince the teeming masses that Republicans deserve to stay in power despite botching a war, doubling the national debt, keeping company with Jack Abramoff, fumbling the response to Hurricane Katrina, expanding the government at record rates, raising cronyism to an art form, playing poker with Duke Cunningham, isolating America and repeatedly electing Tom DeLay as their House majority leader?

How does a God-fearing Reagan Republican explain all that away?

Easy. Blame George W. Bush.

Escaping political death by attacking an unpopular president is hardly new -- especially since most endangered politicians have the loyalty of a starving billy goat. But this is Dubya's Washington, where the White House has pushed around, bullied and betrayed GOP lawmakers for years.

Republican House members and senators always believed that this White House took them for granted. But after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, most of them had no choice but to sulk in their cloakrooms, listen to Debby Boone on their iPods and take it like a man. Bush was a rock star among the party faithful through the 2004 election, so crossing this popular commander in chief was not an option. That's not to say that Old Bulls didn't privately growl about how they were treated better when their old nemesis was still frolicking with an intern. So what if Bill Clinton misbehaved? At least that president found time to personally negotiate terms of subcommittee markups -- even if he was defiling the Oval Office at the same time.

But that kind of give-and-take between presidents and members of Congress ended once Clinton retired to Chappaqua. For the next five years, Republicans on the Hill would do little more than rubber-stamp Bush's domestic and international agenda because lawmakers were intimidated by his power and his popularity with the Republican base.

Even when the administration would not give generals the troops they needed to win the war in Iraq, Republican leaders did nothing. When the president refused to veto a single spending bill while the deficit spiraled upward, Republican leaders looked away. And when chaos was reigning in the streets of New Orleans and across the Gulf Coast in Katrina's horrific aftermath, Republican leaders remained mute.

That silence -- proof that it is better to be feared than loved in politics -- has had devastating results. The United States is more divided than ever, our leaders are despised around the world, our fiscal situation is catastrophic and congressional approval ratings are the lowest ever. Since nothing sharpens the mind like a political hanging, Republican leaders in the Senate and House are finally considering doing what effete newspaper editorialists have suggested for years: throwing Bush overboard.

Of course, the mere suggestion makes some Republican loyalists shudder. Being a faithful follower of Brother Bush has long been synonymous with loving Jesus, supporting the troops and taking a stand against sodomy. But no more. Many of the conservatives who put Ronald Reagan and Newt Gingrich in power are counting the days until Bush goes to Crawford for good. Some mutter that their leader's governing style looks more like Jimmy Carter's every day -- and among that crowd, there is no harsher insult.

I recently ran a segment on my MSNBC show asking whether Bush was an idiot. After the show, I actually received positive feedback from conservative friends, along with the predictable condemnation from White House staffers. The response was telling and suggested that attacking Bush from the right carries no political risk -- a useful pointer for House members facing tough campaigns.

If I were a GOP candidate this year, I would not call the president an idiot (he isn't). But I would spend the next 50 days of the campaign telling conservatives and liberals alike that even though I voted for this war once and this president twice, time has proved that Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld were wrong to think that the nation could win Iraq on the cheap. I would also look them in the eye and say that our president was wrong to believe that the United States could fight a war, cut taxes and increase federal spending, all at once. I would castigate my president for claiming to support homeland security while allowing our borders to remain wide open.

I suspect that voters of all persuasions would like that message. Independence is almost always rewarded at the polls. I learned this by accident while running for Congress in 1994, when the local, state and national Republican machines worked overtime to elect my opponent in the primary. I was considered too young, too inexperienced and too conservative.

But after winning 62 percent of the vote, I arrived in Washington an independent man. I criticized Clinton for vetoing welfare reform; I went after Gingrich for backing off spending cuts. Both times, my constituents roared with approval. The best part is that I was rewarded for saying what I believed -- another pointer for today's Republicans.

Using a midterm campaign to run away from your party's president is not unprecedented. In 1994, Democrats did it while GOP challengers were busy tying Clinton's political carcass around their necks. Some Southern Democrats were so desperate to run away from Clinton's tax increase and health care debacle that they in effect told White House operatives that any attempt to send Air Force One to their districts would be met with antiaircraft fire.

In the end, Democrats' efforts to save their majorities in the House and Senate were futile. Right-wing barbarians like me were elected because after two long years of political bumbling, voters were tired of Clinton. Unfortunately for endangered Republicans 12 years later, Clinton's poll numbers during that campaign were 15 percentage points higher than Bush's now. That suggests that the Democratic tidal wave this year will rival that of the Republicans in 1994.

But these Republicans have one advantage that Clinton's party lacked in 1994: Their opponents are Democrats. The Party of Pelosi. The party that is so tongue-tied on its best political issue that I still can't tell you where it stands on Iraq. Nor can they explain how they would balance the budget or stop Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

That failure to present an alternative vision is in stark contrast with Gingrich & Co., who spent 1994 drawing up a legislative package, a plan to balance the budget and enough position papers to strip an Amazon rain forest.

This year, maybe Democrats can beat something with nothing. As for Republicans, their only chance of survival is blasting the president for mistakes of the past and attacking the Democrats for their failings of the future.

Of course, you GOP candidates can be sure that such attacks will annoy Bush, even though your survival may be all that stands between him and a crazy Democratic chairman launching impeachment hearings. But if you win this fall only to face his stern rebuke next winter, just tell him it was schadenfreude for all the times the White House treated you badly. With any luck, Bush will think you are talking about that Berlin disco that Moammar Gaddafi bombed back in 1986 and then dismiss you like the worthless billy goat he always suspected you were.

What About George? (WP)

By Stuart Stevens

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

As far as organizing principles of life go, I've never found anything that beat the theory that all life imitates high school. It's pretty much foolproof and covers almost all of the universe's difficult questions, such as why scientific studies show 82 percent of all males want to punch Tucker Carlson when he wears a bow tie and why some political candidates react the way they do to a president's popularity.

Visualize, if you will, the president of the United States as the ultimate high school quarterback. When the team is winning and he's on a hot streak, all flock to him in the great cafeteria of life. But when the team is losing, suddenly there are a lot of empty seats at his lunch table and downcast eyes as he's passed in the hall. If you're that quarterback, you find out pretty quickly who your real friends are.

Most Democrats and the vast majority of what passes for the intelligentsia in this country simply don't understand the appeal of President Bush, much the way Republicans never got that Clinton guy. So now that the president's public approval numbers have fallen from historic highs, there seems to be great salivating at the notion that the country is finally getting what has been so obvious to them for so long and that a national day of reckoning is nigh.

This view of Bush transformed from Leader of the Free World into Election Jeremiah is so wrong that it should be laughable. Except that a lot of Republicans seem to believe it's true. They're certainly behaving that way on the campaign trail, acting as though they're sure that a spy camera photo of a candidate caught with the president will be a death sentence in November. And that's a problem -- not for the president but for the candidates and the GOP.

One of the dirty little secrets of politics is that presidential endorsements rarely have any positive impact. In 1986, Republicans went into the off-year elections believing that their strongest card was the popularity of President Ronald Reagan, especially in those red states. It seemed axiomatic to end the campaign by giving the ball to the Big Guy, and race after race closed with endorsement spots of Reagan doing what he did best, looking straight at the camera and suggesting that if you wanted to help him, you'd vote for Candidate X. And then most of those candidates proceeded to lose. In one tight race after another -- such as those involving GOP Sens. Mack Mattingly of Georgia, Jeremiah Denton of Alabama and Paula Hawkins of Florida -- candidates saw their numbers flatten when the Reagan endorsement aired, then spike downward to defeat. These were all states in which Reagan's numbers were through-the-roof positive, but voters seemed to say, "Thanks very much, Mr. President, it's nice that you're supporting a fellow Republican, but what does that have to do with me?"

The flip side of the marginal positive effect of a presidential endorsement is the limited negative impact that comes from being associated with a president of your own party, regardless of his popularity. It's hardly a secret that if you're a Republican candidate you happen to be in the same party as Bush. If there's a Republican candidate out there who thinks he or she can slip that little factoid past the electorate, well, good luck, and good riddance.

Candidates need to worry less about Bush and more about their own agendas. The truth is that there is ample reason to believe that the president is well-liked among voters who might consider voting Republican. But the nation is fighting a tough and nasty war and there's little joy in the day-to-day slog of winning that war. Which makes it just like every other war the nation has waged.

My advice to Republican candidates is that they first must come to grips with the rationale for their own election: Why me? Why now? If in their hearts they disagree with the Iraq war, they should call it like they see it, but without trying to nuance a response seven ways from Sunday in hopes of pleasing all sides. That's French for ending up like John Kerry. Elections are littered with losers who have a need to be loved by everyone.

But I'd also caution any GOP candidate: Remember that Bush is the dominant political figure of the day and, well, he is president and head of the Republican Party and you're not. He has a distinct worldview that places the United States in the lead in a war against Islamic fascism. Whether you believe he is destined to be remembered as one of America's great presidents, as I do, or you think we have adopted a disastrous course, trying to ignore the president is likely to be as successful as a Democrat trying to ignore FDR in 1936. Running for the House or Senate and not having a clear and articulated position on Iraq is a recipe for disaster.

The War on Terror is clearly the new Cold War, the key in which our politics is to be played for a very long time. As a human, it's permissible to be conflicted. As a politician, conflicted equals confused -- and that's a particularly unappealing position when men and women are dying. The problem for Democrats is that they really believe this War on Terror is worth winning, they just wish somebody else would do it.

That's the same mix of hand-wringing and handshaking that the Europeans engaged in while the Serbs set up rape camps a four-hour drive from Harry's Bar in Venice. It has the dubious virtue of being both understandable in motive and reprehensible in result.

The simple truth is that Republican candidates should be running basically the same race regardless of the president's poll numbers. Which is to say running their race. There is a rumbling out there that this may be a terrible year for Republicans, one of those tsunami elections like those in 1974 or 1994. And, who knows, the rumbling may be right. But if so, that will have less to do with the president's personal approval rating than the general mood of the country and the election agenda. If this year turns out to be a referendum on the Iraq war and the numbers on Iraq are negative, those in both parties who support the war are likely to suffer.

The president understands this perfectly well. He is not trying to change the subject from Iraq and the fight against terrorism, which may very well be the best way to pump up his job-approval numbers. What he's doing is the hard stuff of continuing to make the case for why the Iraq war is essential and explaining its role in a global and historical sense. Like the war itself, it's a long, tough haul but he's out there doing it day after day.

In the 2000 campaign, we made a commercial that opened with then-Gov. Bush looking at the camera and asking, "Why don't the hard things get done? Because they're hard." So now he's doing the hard things. If Republican candidates run from this rare display of leadership just because there are a lot of rough days, they most likely will lose.

GOP candidates should take their lead from the president -- take a stand and fight. As I often heard the late Lee Atwater say, "It's time to dig the ditch we're going to die in."

Words To Win By (WP)

Dept. of Advice

An election that becomes a referendum only on the president's popularity or the success or failure of the war is a sure loser for Republicans. Remember: It is not your job to defend the president! He's a big boy. He and Dick Cheney have more than sufficient White House staff to defend them. But don't be critical of him. Most Republican voters still support the president even if they disagree with the war. Getting the base out is all-important and may be the difference between winning and losing.

-- Edward J. Rollins, Republican strategist and Reagan campaign manager

Republicans don't have to convince Cindy Sheehan that prevailing in Iraq is crucial to our national security, but they must and can persuade former hawks to support what has to be done in Iraq. President Bush's approval ratings are up following his own recent speeches on the war on terror and the ideological struggle we confront. Republican candidates should read them. Conservative voters face a choice in November and should be fearful of political leadership that diminishes the threat we face and lacks the resolve to confront it. Republican candidates should emphasize this. Fear is their friend.

-- Kate O'Beirne, Washington editor, National Review

Be proud of the party and be proud of the contrasts. Elections are about choices, so we must draw clear differences and reveal the Democratic candidates for the rogue extremists they truly are. Does their position on Iraq blow around like a tumbleweed? Do they support higher gas taxes? Is this candidate a prosecutor who plea-bargains with illegal aliens? The fact that these candidates would be tangibly harmful to the daily lives of most Americans will matter more than Democrats putting your picture next to the president's and saying "Supports Bush 92 percent of the time."

-- Dan Hazelwood, Republican strategist

Surprisingly, Bush's unpopularity can represent a strategic opportunity for House Republicans, especially conservatives. Here's why:

The administration has one large, unfinished domestic initiative left: Its big plan to legalize most illegal aliens, import millions of guest workers and increase total permanent immigration. The president believes strongly in more open immigration, and his plans are supported by most senators and by House Democrats. But they are strongly opposed by House Republicans -- and most American voters.

So here's a slogan for enforcement-first House Republicans: " Stop the Bush Amnesty Plan -- Vote GOP ."

-- David Frum, former Bush speechwriter

Unfortunately for the GOP, the nation is suffering from party-in-power fatigue. Unless given compelling reasons not to, the electorate will be inclined to give the other side a chance to govern. The toughest to convince that Republicans deserve more time may be true conservatives, those who believe that their party must reflect the ideals of Abraham Lincoln and Ronald Reagan. They worry that the Republican Senate has sold them out on immigration and that the party as a whole has "become what we defeated." We can still retain both houses come November, but we must first remind ourselves what we stand for.

-- Douglas MacKinnon, press secretary to former senator Robert J. Dole

Republicans running from the president on critical issues is a problem. If you run and cower from topics such as Iraq, the benefits of tax cuts and personal accounts for Social Security, the Democrats and the left will define your position for you. When you articulate the difference between the president and Democrats on taxes, immediate withdrawal from Iraq and Social Security, the voters respond that they are not interested in a tax hike, understand that it is not wise to arbitrarily withdraw from Iraq and want someone to seriously engage in fixing our collapsing retirement system.

-- Richard K. Armey, former House majority leader

Republican candidates should talk about the Democrats. The Democrats want to pull out of Iraq, shut down Guantanamo, open the nation's borders, abandon the Patriot Act and the NSA spying program and extend full constitutional protections to people like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the 9/11 attacks. We got critical information from Mohammed that helped us prevent future terror attacks by subjecting him to mild coercive techniques during questioning -- and the Democrats want to impeach the president for authorizing that! If this nation returns to the Democratic national security policy known in military circles as "unconditional surrender," two years of the Democrats could get us all killed.

-- Ann Coulter, GOP pundit

GOP candidates can't do much about the underlying problem: Republicans are in charge. It's hard to govern. Grievances accumulate, and you get no credit for successes. What's to be done?

The RNC can go on the air with a massive TV ad buy in October, introducing voters in key states and districts to the two Democratic congressional leaders -- the dour Harry Reid and the frenetic Nancy Pelosi. The message: When Harry Meets Nancy, and they're in charge, they'll raise your taxes and weaken our efforts in the war on terror. The Dems and media will respond, we'll have a taxes and terror debate -- and the Republicans might be okay.

-- William Kristol, editor, the Weekly Standard

Congressional Republicans should use the remaining days of this session to put Democrats on record on key national security votes. These votes and previous actions will reveal a political abyss between the two parties over how to protect America in an era of grave threats. At the same time, Republicans should embrace the current economic prosperity, brought about by the Bush/Republican tax cuts with little Democratic support, and point out that a Democrat-controlled Congress will allow popular pro-growth tax cuts to expire.

-- Scott W. Reed, 1996 Dole presidential campaign manager

The 212 Republican congressmen running for reelection won in these very districts in 2002, the year of Enron, when $7 trillion disappeared with the stock market drop and Iraq loomed. They won in 2004 when Bush limped across the finish line with 51 percent and Iraq was a boat anchor. No one was elected on Bush's coattails. Democrats who think they can win running against Bush and Iraq should remember GOP hopes in 1998. Iraq is Monica Lewinsky: tough on the president's poll numbers but not a reason to vote against your congressman.

-- Grover G. Norquist , president, Americans for Tax Reform

Republicans should heed those who want the war on terror won without the abridgement of civil liberties. They should allow Korean War veteran John Warner, Vietnam POW John McCain and Gulf War military lawyer Lindsey Graham to speak for them, to show that they are not wholly taken by the imperial claims of an increasingly unpopular president.

-- David Boaz, executive vice president, Cato Institute

If Republican candidates can demonstrate a lengthy record of accomplishment, they will survive the political wave. If voters see Republicans fighting for them, they'll win. If they see them fighting to keep their jobs, they won't. And if Republicans want to increase turnout, they need to be strong advocates for cutting wasteful Washington spending and against illegal immigration. Any weakness on either issue is political suicide.

-- Frank Luntz , GOP pollster

Lead with solutions and ignore your critics. Let them fester in the corner mumbling about low approval ratings and ridiculing the president. It will underscore how bitter and disorganized they are without your saying it.

Preview life under the Democrats. Show a blank piece of paper and title it, "The Democratic Vision and Concrete Alternatives for a Better America."

Apologize to conservatives. Many in your own base are smarting over Iraq, federal spending and the lack of movement on immigration. Admit missteps and engage them, because if they stay home, it is trouble.

Don't Lose Like Me (WP)

By Joe Schwarz

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

I am the political equivalent of a woolly mammoth, a rarity heading for extinction. Yes, I'm a moderate.

Our plight today is dire. Even though more than half of all American voters consider themselves centrists, the Republican and Democratic parties are finding themselves controlled to an ever-greater extent by their more extreme elements. On the Republican side, the "religious right," the quasi-theocrats, are infiltrating the party power structure quite effectively. On the left, the moneyed Eastern establishment and California liberals shrilly tell Americans that the sky is falling, that the world hates us and that Republican policies are all wrong. Yet they offer no viable alternatives. As a result, they have managed to alienate much of the traditional working-class Democratic base, good people caught between Republicans they don't like and Democrats who have abandoned them. What's a moderate to do?

In my case, lose an election.

It wasn't President Bush who proved to be the kiss of death to my candidacy for a second term in the House. The president's poll numbers may not be very good in many places, but he's still well-liked in my neck of the woods -- south-central Michigan. So when I geared up to run again this year, I was pleased to have his endorsement. My loss had nothing to do with his popularity, or national issues such as the war in Iraq. What did me in was voter apathy, and moral absolutist groups supported by a vitriolic negative-ad campaign funded by organizations on the far right.

Michigan's 7th Congressional District borders on Indiana and Ohio, extending west to Battle Creek, east to Ann Arbor and north to Lansing. It's a real slice of Middle America. I was born and raised in Battle Creek. I've practiced medicine there for 32 years. My dad was a physician there, too. I was educated at the University of Michigan, and I'm chairman of the board of the alumni association of that great university. I bleed Maize and Blue. If ever there was a local, I'm it.

After 16 years in the Michigan Senate and service as mayor of Battle Creek, I was elected to Congress in 2004. But my moderate positions on Roe v. Wade (I do not support overturning it, believing that a woman has the right to choose) and embryonic stem cell research (I strongly support it), as well as my general feeling that religion and moral and ethical issues are private matters, did not sit well with those who would mix church and state in a way that is antithetical to the principles of separation on which our country was founded -- in other words, the hard right.

So in the Republican primary, the opposition got its vote out. The effort was funded, probably to the tune of $1 million or so, by the Club for Growth, a Washington outfit supported by plutocrats nationwide who apparently have nothing better to do with their money than give it to an organization that stands for nothing -- though it says it's "anti-tax" -- and likes to play in elections in which it has no logical interest.

I had a great campaign organization, willing volunteers and was well-funded. Key endorsements rolled in: from the Farm Bureau, police and fire organizations, teachers, medical groups, some unions, key GOP officeholders. My supporters thought I couldn't lose -- and as a result, I did. It was a classic example of a motivated minority -- just 7.8 percent of the Republican electorate districtwide -- nominating a congressional candidate. The moderates stayed home in droves, felt horrible the next day, and vowed never to miss another vote. They will. The hard right won't. And fewer and fewer sensible "let's take the broad view" candidates will have any chance of being elected.

But politics needs a middle. Communication across the aisle in Congress and in legislatures is the sine qua non of effective public policy formulation. The reluctance -- at times, the near-total unwillingness -- to consider the other side's position has hamstrung political bodies from coast to coast.

Moderates aren't organized, and because they straddle party lines, they may never be much of a cohesive group with the ability to move a policy agenda. But they must begin fighting back -- rationally always, gloves off if necessary. Congratulations to Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee, a moderate Republican from Rhode Island, for his primary victory last week. He did fight back, and effectively.

Somehow, some way, moderates must understand that they will go the way of the moa, the dodo and, appropriately, the woolly mammoth unless they learn to fight as hard for the policies of the sane and rational center as the far right and far left fight for the extremes.

Bush In A Bind With Southern Women, Poll Shows (HC/AP)

By Shannon Mccaffrey, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

Dwindling trust in president could bring down GOP gains in Congress

MACON, GA. — President Bush's once-solid relationship with Southern women is on the rocks.

"I think history will show him to be the worst president since Ulysses S. Grant," said Barbara Knight, a self-described Republican since birth and the mother of three. "He's been an embarrassment."

In the heart of Dixie, comparisons to Grant, a symbol of the Union, are the worst sort of insult, especially from a Macon woman who voted for Bush in 2000 but turned away in 2004.

In recent years, Southern women have been some of Bush's biggest fans, defying the traditional gender gap in which women have preferred Democrats to Republicans. Bush secured a second term due in large part to support from 54 percent of Southern female voters, while women nationally favored Democrat John Kerry, 51 percent to 48 percent.

"In 2004, you saw an utter collapse of the gender gap in the South," said Karen Kaufmann, a professor of government at the University of Maryland who has studied women's voting patterns. White Southern women liked Bush because "he spoke their religion, and he spoke their values."

Now, anger over the Iraq war and frustration with the country's direction have taken a toll on the president's popularity and stirred dissatisfaction with the Republican-held Congress.

Republicans on the ballot this November have reason to worry. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that three out of five Southern women plan to vote for a Democrat. With control of the Senate and House in the balance, such a seismic shift could have dire consequences for the GOP.

Democrats need to gain 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate to seize control.

In a sign of how crucial races in the South will be to the GOP national strategy, Bush recently traveled to Georgia to help former Rep. Max Burns raise money in his bid to unseat Democratic Rep. John Barrow. The president also gave a speech in Atlanta.

Knight lives in another congressional district considered competitive. Republicans hope to oust Democratic Rep. Jim Marshall, whose district was redrawn by the GOP-controlled Georgia Legislature to make it more conservative.

Voters like Knight could prove to be spoilers. The 66-year-old real estate agent doesn't particularly like Marshall, a hawkish Democrat and former Army Ranger, but she said she'll vote for him because she likes his conservative Republican opponent, former Rep. Mac Collins, even less.

"I'm going to go for the moderate, and these days that tends to be Democrats," Knight said.

Sandy Rubin, a high school teacher in Macon, voted for Bush and said she's also likely to vote for Marshall. Rubin said the GOP's focus on issues that appeal to social conservatives, such as gay marriage and abortion, have turned her off.

"I care about job security and education. The things I hear the Republicans emphasizing in their campaigns are not things that affect me or my family," said the 39-year-old mother of two.

The movement of some Southern women away from the Republican Party tracks with national poll results showing that women have become more disillusioned with the war and were more likely than men to list the conflict as the important issue facing the country.

"I'm a mother, and that makes me think differently about (Iraq)," Teresa Cranford, 39, also of Macon said.

Lynn Hamilton, 44, said she supports Bush even though her backing for the war has waned.

"As a mother you worry, 'Am I going to lose my baby boy?' " said the Gray, Ga., resident. "A mother's view about war is often going to be a lot different than dad's is."

Neither Cranford nor Hamilton has not decided how she plans to vote in the midterm elections, although neither ruled out voting for a Democrat.

Still, some Southern women remain supporters of the president and the GOP. At a watermelon festival in Chickamauga, in the mountains of northwest Georgia, substitute teacher Clydeen Tomanio said she remains committed to the party.

"There are some people, and I'm one of them, that believe George Bush was placed where he is by the Lord," Tomanio said. "I don't care how he governs, I will support him. I'm a Republican through and through."

GOP Detects Break In Gloom Over Congressional Elections (HC)

By Bennett Roth

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

9/11 anniversary sees rise in Bush's approval ratings

A bleak landscape for Republicans in the upcoming congressional elections appeared to brighten ever so slightly last week.

The president's aggressive campaign to emphasize terrorism and tie it to the conflict in Iraq has helped nudge upward his still-low approval ratings.

Experts say the ratings are an important gauge of how the president's party will fare in the congressional elections. The polls also showed a slight improvement in the public view of his handling of Iraq, an issue Democrats are hoping to use to make big gains.

The latest surveys also show a narrowing in the percentage of voters who in general favor Democrats over Republicans in the Nov. 7 elections, although Democrats still hold a lead of about 9 percentage points.

Thomas Mann, a congressional expert at the liberal-leaning Brookings Institution, said he is skeptical Republicans could sustain momentum generated by the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11.

"My view is it will be a one-week phenomenon," he said.

Senate Republicans also are breathing a sigh of relief that GOP Sen. Lincoln Chafee defeated his conservative challenger, Stephen Laffey, in the Rhode Island primary — despite the fact Chafee often votes against administration initiatives. Republicans think Chafee will be a stronger contender in the general election in the overwhelmingly Democratic state. However, polls still show Chafee running about even with Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse.

Both parties indicated they intend to dump substantial sums of money into key races in the final weeks.

The Democratic National Committee announced it would spend $12 million to get out the vote. For his part, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said he expects to spend $60 million on advertising and voter turnout . Mehlman told reporters he expected the party would lose seats in November but retain its majority in both chambers in part because of the party's strong grass-roots operations.

South Texas could hold key to the HouseA South Texas congressional district could be political ground zero this year in a scenario envisioned by some analysts if the Nov. 7 elections fail to result in a majority for either party in the House.

To break the tie, money and operatives from across the country likely would flood into the district now represented by GOP Rep. Henry Bonilla, who could face a runoff after the Nov. 7 elections.

Bonilla's district lines were altered after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled part of a Texas redistricting plan was unconstitutional. Bonilla, six Democrats and one independent are running in a district that is less Republican and more Hispanic than the previous one. There would be a runoff if none of the candidates receives more than 50 percent of the vote.

Larry Sabato, political science professor at the University of Virginia, said on his Web site that if that happened, GOP and Democratic House leaders would be "furiously brushing up on their Spanish, desperately seeking to avoid Davy Crockett's fate."

Local builder Perry bankrolling groupBob Perry, the Houston homebuilder and GOP donor who helped bankroll the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, which attacked John Kerry's military credentials during the 2004 presidential election, is back in the political fray as the top donor to a conservative group running ads against Democrats.

Perry gave $5 million to the Economic Freedom Fund, a California-based group, according to a Sept. 8 filing with the Federal Election Commission. The group is a so-called 527 entity, not subject to campaign finance limits. The fund, headed by

Charles Bell Jr., general counsel to the California Republican Party, has spent $500,000 in TV ads against Democratic Reps. Jim Marshall of Georgia and Alan Mollohan of West Virginia.

Public Money May Not Be Enough In 2008 (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Those three dollars you've set aside in your tax returns as a good deed toward clean presidential elections? Forget about it. Nobody wants them anymore.

Strategists from both parties estimate the White House race in 2008 could cost each nominee $500 million — far more than the Presidential Election Campaign Fund can afford. As a result, this next presidential campaign could mark the first time in 30 years that the Democratic and Republican nominees turn down the fund's millions in both the primary and the general elections.

"The public financing system was a great system, but it's broke," said Steve Elmendorf, the deputy campaign manager for Democrat John Kerry when the Massachusetts senator ran in 2004.

"There's not enough money in it anymore. It's highly unlikely that any candidate in any party will stay in the public funding system," Elmendorf said.

The decision has precedent.

George W. Bush declined the public money in the 2000 GOP primaries, when he was a first-time candidate, and did so again in 2004, when he sought re-election. Democrats Howard Dean and John Kerry made the same choice in 2004.

Still, Bush and Kerry each accepted $74.5 million from the fund to run their general election campaigns. For 2008, the amount could reach $85 million per nominee.

If the major party candidates decline the general election funds in two years, they in effect would kill one of the chief post-Watergate overhauls in campaign law.

The fund, which is expected to have about $200 million by the end of 2007, still would help pay for party presidential nominating conventions and assist primary candidates who do not raise large amounts of money.

More than ever, the first cut in the presidential sweepstakes will not result from the early contests of 2008, but from candidates' ability to stockpile huge amounts of money the previous year. That means potential candidates will ramp up their fundraising far sooner than they ever have in the past.

"The 2008 presidential election is going to be the Wild West," said Michael Toner, the Republican chairman of the Federal Election Commission. "Upward of $500 million is the likely goal of presidential fundraising per candidate."

So far, the best test of potential candidates' fundraising is the political action committees they have formed to probe the political environment and seed the landscape with donations. That money cannot be transferred into their election accounts.

At the top of the Democratic money list are former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner and Sens. Kerry, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Evan Bayh of Indiana and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Clinton stands out above the rest because as of Aug. 23, she also had $22 million in her Senate campaign fund. She can transfer this money directly into a presidential contest.

No one represents the crossroads of presidential ambition and campaign finance activism more than McCain. His name is synonymous with tough election laws that have banned parties from collecting unrestricted and unlimited amounts of money.

But McCain is among those prepared to forgo the public financing system in 2008, according to strategists working with him.

He caused a stir this summer when he did not sign on as one of the congressional supporters of legislation that would overhaul the system. The main proponents were his old allies on the campaign finance law — Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., and Reps. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., and Martin Meehan, D-Mass.

The measure would triple the amount available to candidates during state primaries and eliminate the state spending limits. It also would offer more money to candidates whose opponents chose to decline the money and raise more on their own.

In an interview, McCain said he supported the measure and said that if it passed he would live by the new rules.

"We're either going to upgrade it like it's envisioned in this legislation or nobody's going to take it, or very rarely will people take it," McCain said. But he added, "If you have to play by the rules as they are, that's very different."

Under current rules, no one can take the public money without agreeing to strict spending restrictions. Had Bush or Kerry accepted the money in 2004, they would have been limited to spending less than $45 million each in the primaries. Operating outside the system, Bush raised nearly $270 million and Kerry $235 million.

DOJ_NMG_0065012

What's more, not everyone assigns $3 to the presidential campaign fund in tax returns. That has left periodic shortfalls in the fund, forcing the FEC and the Treasury to lower the initial payout to primary election candidates. In every case, the government has paid the full match after April 15 with the arrival of more tax revenue.

Campaign strategists and campaign finance analysts say they can imagine the new crop of presidential candidates concluding that the entire government handout is not worth the trouble.

"Anybody who takes federal funding will do so at their own peril because they will be dramatically outspent," said Tom Rath, a Republican National Committee member from New Hampshire

Rath, echoing others, believes the minimum that top tier candidates will have to have in hand at the end of 2007 will be "clearly north of $50 million."

Some people, such as the FEC's Toner, predict the number will be closer to $100 million. By comparison, Dean had $41 million at the end of 2003, double the amount Kerry had in hand.

Once the parties have their nominees, the candidates will have to decide whether to settle for the guaranteed total — estimated up to $85 million depending on inflation — or decline the money and raise more on their own. It seems inevitable, though, that if one party's nominee declines the money, the other will, too.

Under existing law, the party nominees get their general election money after their respective political conventions, typically held in August. Some strategists and analysts believe raising money for the general election will cut into valuable campaign time. And they say the public money should be more than enough for a 100-day contest.

"If you don't accept public money in the general there is a much greater chance that you will suffer from public criticism and reprobation because it'll look like you're just going to buy the election," said Don Fowler, chairman of the Democratic Party during Bill Clinton's 1996 re-election.

McCain, for one, said he has not made that decision yet. Kerry has told fundraisers he is prepared to raise his own general election money. He nearly came to that conclusion in 2004.

Elmendorf said the question Kerry faced in 2004 was whether he would be able to raise more than the $74.5 million available to him from the presidential campaign fund. "It was unknowable at the time," he said. "In hindsight, the answer was yes."

Clinton-Gore Could Take On New Meaning For 2008 (HC)

By Judy Holland

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

Former VP opens door to face-off with senator for Dems' nomination

WASHINGTON — Al Gore's statement that he wouldn't rule out running for president raises the possibility of a Democratic duel between the former vice president and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Gore, who steadily has dismissed questions about his plans for 2008, created a stir when he told reporters: "I haven't completely ruled out running for president again in the future, but I don't expect to."

That slight deviation from his past denials of presidential dreams has spurred speculation that Gore might suit up again for a presidential bid, leading Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., to enthuse that it would be "fabulous" if Clinton and Gore both ran for the Democratic presidential nomination.

"The two of them are very strong candidates," she said.

Gore, 58, who won the popular vote in the 2000 presidential election but lost the White House after a blizzard of ballot recounts in Florida and Supreme Court intervention, is on the lecture circuit to talk about global warming.

His best-selling book and documentary film, An Inconvenient Truth, in which global warming is described as the greatest crisis the world has ever faced, have opened up global speaking opportunities.

John Zogby, an independent pollster with Zogby International, sees "a battle royal shaping up."

"Frankly, this is Al Gore's year and it's Al Gore's turn and that's the thing — it's also Hillary's turn," Zogby says.

Gore is "in a very second tier after Hillary, who is in a league by herself," Zogby says. He says Clinton "really sucks the air out of the contest because she's new, she's a woman and she's Hillary — no last name needed."

On the other hand, Gore has "two aces in the hole," Zogby said. Unlike Clinton, he opposed the Iraq war from the start. And he is known as an expert on the environment.

DOJ_NMG_0065013

Clinton, who was first lady for eight years while Gore was No. 2 to her husband, praises his work on global warming, calls his film "excellent."

But when asked about a Gore candidacy in 2008, Clinton laughs and curtly moves on, saying: "You'd have to talk to him about that."

Marshall Wittmann, a senior fellow with the Progressive Policy Institute, a Democratic policy group, says Gore is "clearly and certainly leaving the door open."

Wittmann says Gore is "probably reading up on what Richard Nixon's path out of the wilderness was," in 1968 after he spent several years out of public life.

While Nixon lightened his image by appearing on the comedy show Laugh-in, Gore put the nation in stitches appearing on Saturday Night Live, in a series of skits that included impersonations of Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., his own refusal to leave the Oval Office and being shot with a stun gun after a long kiss with his wife, Tipper.

Barack Obama: Could He Be Too Popular? (SLPD)

By Kevin McDermott, POST-DISPATCH SPRINGFIELD BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 17, 2006

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

For a politician, is there such a thing as too much popularity?

If there's any cloud over U.S. Sen. Barack Obama's seemingly charmed political life, it may be that one.

With national political pundits now using words such as "messiah" in connection with the Chicago Democrat - and one former campaign opponent calling on him to run for president - some say he could ultimately be rising so fast and high in the American consciousness that he may end up with nowhere to go but down.

"It's a cliche, but it's true: The higher you go, the harder you fall," warned pollster Del Ali of Research 2000, which conducted a poll for the Post-Dispatch last month that showed Obama with an unheard-of 70 percent approval rating among Illinoisans.

One rule of thumb in politics is to keep expectations low so that any mistake the politician makes looks smaller while any accomplishment looks bigger. For Obama, sitting on a runaway train of gushing publicity, that kind of "expectation control" has become impossible.

"One of the obvious dangers is that no one's perfect," said Mike Lawrence, director of the Paul Simon Public Policy Institute at Southern Illinois University and a longtime Illinois political aide. "His mistakes could become magnified if the expectations are unreasonable."

Obama's staff is aware of that danger.

"I think, honestly, expectations became basically uncontrollable about 10 minutes after he finished his speech at the (2004 Democratic National) Convention," said Robert Gibbs, Obama's communications director. "I've had people say, 'You guys should really tamp things down,' but it's hard to do."

Newsweek hasn't helped. An essay published in the magazine last week described the reception that Obama received on his recent trip to Africa as "befitting a messiah."

"It is not too early to pronounce Barack Obama a political phenomenon unlike any previously seen on the American scene," the essay declares. It then, nonetheless, goes on to offer a previously seen example: John F. Kennedy.

Illinois Comptroller Daniel Hynes suggested last week that Obama could follow that path. In an unusual official statement on Thursday, Hynes pressed Obama to run for president in 2008, calling him "the person for these times."

"You and you alone can best put together the broadest possible coalition with the charisma and the excitement, as well as the substance, to win," Hynes wrote in an open letter to Obama, who beat Hynes in Illinois' 2004 Democratic U.S. Senate primary. Hynes' statement went on to vow to "impress upon (Obama) the breadth of support he has throughout the country."

Obama (whose office reiterated last week that he isn't running for president in 2008) hardly needs his own startling popularity impressed upon him. He has quipped about it himself, joking to reporters at a dinner in Washington in March, for example: "I want to thank you for all the generous advance coverage you've given me in anticipation of a successful career. When I actually do something, we'll let you know."

By most accounts, Obama has had a strong debut in the Senate in terms of legislative accomplishments. But the continuing demand for him to appear at political events across the nation clearly is out of proportion with any mere legislative agenda.

Pundits have offered various explanations for Obama's "rock star" phenomenon, from his multicultural background (immigrant Kenyan father, white Kansan mother) to his intellectual credentials (first black Harvard Law Review president, bestselling author) to his political style (optimistic and conciliatory). Obama did win a Grammy earlier this year for the spoken-word version of his autobiography, "Dreams From My Father."

The moment that lit the match was his speech to the 2004 Democratic National Convention in Boston, which caught the attention of the national media for its eloquent statement of Democratic principles. His subsequent huge win in the Senate race in Illinois - though clearly aided by a series of self-destructing opponents - was hailed as further proof that a major new figure had stepped onto the national political stage.

"One of the weirdest things I ever saw was on the day before he was sworn in" to his Senate seat, recalled Gibbs, amused, "and somebody asked him what his place in history is."

Lawrence, of the SIU institute, said one trap Obama would have to watch for was not to forget the Illinois voters who put him in office - and who (assuming he runs for a second term in 2010) will decide whether to keep him there.

"He doesn't get elected in Africa, he doesn't get elected in Iowa," said Lawrence. "He's in demand around the world, but he needs to make sure to stay close to the (voters of) Illinois."

Robert D. Novak: Obama For President? (UL)

By ROBERT D. NOVAK

Union Leader, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON – Prominent Illinois Democrats are advising Sen. Barack Obama, now finishing his second year in the Senate, to consider making a run for the 2008 Presidential nomination.

One such Democratic stalwart is telling the 45-year-old Obama to run only if prospective front-runner Sen. Hillary Clinton does not. But others are advising the popular freshman senator to go for it even if Clinton is a candidate.

These boosters calculate that Obama, the son of a black father and a white mother, could break the Republican Presidential hold on the South by maximizing the African-American vote in states such as South Carolina, Georgia and Mississippi.

TAXES AND POLITICS

Rep. Tom Reynolds, the campaign manager in charge of keeping the Republican majority in the House, gave his approval to a bid by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas to force a tax bill through the September session of Congress.

Reynolds's opinion is given the highest weight, even more than Speaker Dennis Hastert's, in the current House Republican leadership meetings. These sessions have concentrated on what might help elect Republicans in November. Reynolds previously had been skeptical about the political value of a pre-election tax measure.

Thomas, in his typical style, has kept quiet on the details of what would be his final tax bill as he ends his congressional career. Not as usual, Thomas has been in contact with the Senate, indicating he means business.

KATHERINE'S WOES

Jim Dornan, one of the former managers of Rep. Katherine Harris's beleaguered Republican Senate candidacy in Florida, has told associates he was startled by how aggressively the FBI questioned him Sept. 6.

Dornan was interrogated for an hour and a half by federal agents as part of their inquiry into Harris's political contributions from defense contractor Mitchell Wade, who has pleaded guilty to bribery in another case. Dornan described the FBI as pressing him hard about Harris.

Dornan, a lobbyist and fund-raiser, is currently consulting for Rep. John Sweeney's re-election campaign in upstate New York. He left the Harris campaign last November.

DEMOCRATS AGAINST CHAFEE

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC), headed by Sen. Charles Schumer, made an unusual intervention in a Republican primary by financing negative telephone calls in an unsuccessful effort to block liberal Sen. Lincoln Chafee from renomination in Rhode Island.

The DSCC spent $14,300 for anti-Chafee calls last Saturday and another $11,700 on Monday, for a total of $26,000. Chafee's conservative challenger in the GOP primary, Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey, was considered a sure loser in the general election if he were nominated.

Chafee was vigorously backed by the National Republican Senatorial Committee, the Republican National Committee and the White House. In comparison, the DSCC spent only $62 helping Sen. Joseph Lieberman's losing candidacy in the Connecticut Democratic primary.

BOWLING FOR REPUBLICANS

Republicans in Washington were urged to take time off work from 4 to 6 p.m. last Wednesday and go to the Lucky Strike Bowling Alley in an unusual fund-raiser for seven GOP House members in need of late campaign money.

DOJ_NMG_0065015

The National Republican Congressional Committee called the event BOMP (Bowling for Our Majority Program). The beneficiaries were Reps. Steve Chabot of Ohio, Thelma Drake of Virginia, Jeff Fortenberry of Nebraska, J.D. Hayworth of Arizona, Marilyn Musgrave of Colorado, John Sweeney of New York and Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania.

The solicitation for BOMP asserted that the seven incumbents "all have a real need for additional resources in the last couple of months before the election," either because of a "well-funded" Democratic opponent or especially high local television costs.

Iraq Looms Large In Senate Race (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen, POST-DISPATCH WASHINGTON BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 17, 2006

Every which way they turn, Sen. Jim Talent and state Auditor Claire McCaskill face voters' unease and anger about the war in Iraq.

"There's no winning that," said Nell Cowden, 58, a retiree, as she waited in the buffet line last month at a Democratic dinner in Maryville featuring McCaskill. It doesn't make sense, she said, "to throw more money and lives" into the effort.

Talent says he frequently hears from voters who "want us to win and want us to win faster than we're winning. And they're frustrated that we're not doing that."

But Missourians looking for a dramatic new direction on Iraq from the two candidates competing for the U.S. Senate seat may not be happy with what either Talent or McCaskill has to say.

To be sure, Talent, the Republican incumbent, and McCaskill, his Democratic challenger, have sharply different positions on the best course forward in Iraq, as well as whether it was a good idea to strike in the first place. Indeed, Iraq may be the strongest point of disagreement on a broad range of foreign policy questions.

Talent was among the staunchest proponents of the war and remains unwavering, like many other Republicans, in his belief that setting any timetable for withdrawal would be a terrible mistake. He voted against two recent Democratic resolutions, one calling for the start of U.S. troop withdrawal this year and another calling for nearly all U.S. troops to be out of Iraq by July 31 next year.

Despite spiraling violence and a mounting death toll in Iraq, Talent says the United States is making progress and must stick it out. He sees positive developments in the election of an Iraqi government and other steps.

"We don't need complete peace in Iraq" before U.S. troops can leave, said Talent, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, which oversees the Pentagon. "We need a fundamental level of stability that the government can maintain on its own. And we are making progress towards that."

Any early withdrawal, he said, would be "a signal to our enemies that if they can fight on long enough, that eventually we'll leave. It will just encourage them."

McCaskill says the war was a mistake and is now a quagmire that has compromised America's strength and bred terrorism in new corners of the world. But she has not bowed to the most fiery anti-war wing of her party - voters like Cowden who say "bring the troops home tomorrow" - or even to some Democratic senators who have called for withdrawing all U.S. troops by the middle of next year.

McCaskill advocates a two-year phased pullout, to begin this year, with American troops eventually replaced by a multinational force - time enough, she says, to allow the Iraqi government to achieve stability.

"We have become a crutch in terms of (the Iraqis) moving forward," McCaskill said. "As long as they can rely on American lives and American resources, it allows them the luxury of not getting to work and figuring out how they can live together. . . . We are never going to build democracy at the barrel of a gun."

Asked about Talent's charge that setting a date for withdrawal will bolster the insurgents and spark chaos once American troops leave, McCaskill said: "It's complete and total chaos now. I don't think our presence now is contributing to a political solution, and it may even be a hindrance. . . . I'm not sure anyone understands what our mission is now in Iraq."

No easy solution

Talent and McCaskill both acknowledge problems with their positions.

Talent concedes that he underestimated how long it would take U.S. troops to establish security in central Iraq. And he said his hope earlier this summer that the United States would be able to withdraw troops this year has been proved wrong by the relentless sectarian flare-ups. But he still believes the war's broader goal - to foster democracy in other places like Iran and Syria - is viable.

"Part of winning this is defeating the terrorists' view of Islam," he said. "We need to be part of a partnership that's showing this part of the world that democracy will work here."

McCaskill acknowledges that putting together a multinational force to replace U.S. troops in Iraq would be a hard sell, at best, given the continued violence and the strong anti-war sentiments around the world. "It is incredibly difficult now, because of what this administration has done," McCaskill said. "We need to get to work" to rebuild alliances, she added, particularly with moderate Arab nations.

Far from fostering democracy in the Middle East, McCaskill said, the Iraq war has increased terrorism and emboldened rogue regimes like Iran and North Korea. "They know that we are weakened by our tunnel vision in Iraq," she said.

McCaskill has also blasted Iraq war spending, saying that no-bid contracts and other favoritism have cost U.S. taxpayers billions of dollars. She has called for a new "Truman Commission" to expose "war profiteering."

"It is time for a reckoning, a time for real oversight and true accountability," McCaskill said in a speech in May unveiling the plan.

Talent said Congress "constantly needs to make sure the money is being spent wisely" but that there is no need for a new commission.

"We've got all kinds of oversight committees" both in Congress and at the Pentagon, he said. "I've sat through hours and hours and hours of hearings on all kinds of issues, from Abu Ghraib to the (Boeing) tanker lease deal."

Lieberman Pleads For Unity Against `Barbarians' (HARTC)

By Mark Pazniokas, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, September 17, 2006

FAIRFIELD -- Using apocalyptic imagery of civilization lost, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman blamed politics Friday for undermining the war on terror and leaving the U.S. vulnerable to "barbarians at our gates."

The U.S. faces a patient and ruthless enemy in Islamic extremists, an enemy that "threatens not just America, but all of civilization," Lieberman said in a national security speech at Fairfield University.

"We remain too divided as a nation, and in Washington, spend too much time fighting each other rather than coming together to make our country safer," Lieberman said. "At stake is the kind of world we will live in, not far away abroad but right here, home in Connecticut."

His 25-minute address repeatedly called for bipartisanship in Washington, reinforcing the central theme of his re-election campaign as an independent since losing the Democratic primary in August to his main rival, Ned Lamont.

He was introduced by Mary Fetchet of New Canaan, whose son, Brad, was lost in the 2001 attack on the World Trade Center. Fetchet helped lead the relatives of victims in lobbying Congress for the creation of the 9/11 commission supported by Lieberman.

Lieberman faulted the Bush administration for alienating potential allies in the war on terror, though he gave no examples of an administration miscue. He never mentioned the war in Iraq, a topic he intends to address with another policy speech.

The senator blamed the terror attacks of 9/11 on a generation of leaders lulled into complacency as tensions eased with the Soviet Union.

A string of Islamic assaults on American interests, beginning with the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Iran in 1979, should have served notice that the U.S. faced a new and dangerous world even after the close of the Cold War in 1989, Lieberman said.

"But as a nation, we remained asleep, unwilling to see the gathering storm," Lieberman said.

While criticizing Bush, he effectively buttressed comments the president made Friday that the world remains a dangerous place.

"We cannot ever again let down our guard or allow ourselves to go into denial," Lieberman said. "We must stay alert and engage in this war against the barbarians, because that is what they are - modern barbarians at our gates. Our enemies are patient and purposeful. They are ruthless. They are lethal."

His line about barbarians was one of Lieberman's many departures from a six-page text that was copied and distributed to reporters minutes before the speech at Fairfield's school of business.

Lieberman said Islamic terrorists are a threat to Americans of all races and creeds.

"They hate us all because we are Americans. And yet, we remain divided among ourselves in responding to them," he said. "It's really outrageous that that continues to be the case. We have got to move forward together."

He faulted some on the right for implying that Democrats do not care if terrorists succeed and some on the left for going "beyond dissent to demonize the president" and impugn the motives of those who support him.

DOJ_NMG_0065017

Lieberman said Congress and the president must work in a bipartisan fashion. Sprinkled through his speech was praise for Republican senators with whom he has worked cooperatively: Susan Collins of Maine, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, John McCain of Arizona, and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania. He singled out no Democrat.

The senior Democrat on the Senate Homeland Security Committee, Lieberman also touted a port security bill the panel endorsed this week on a vote that crossed party lines.

"When we work together across party lines in Washington, when we put principles ahead of politics, the national interest ahead of our parties' interest, we have made progress in making America safer," he said.

Liz Dupont-Diehl, Lamont's press secretary, said Lieberman tried Friday to criticize Bush, yet he used the same fear tactics as the president.

"Sen. Lieberman's Houdini-esque contortions today, an effort to make believe that he is above the fray, will not fool Connecticut voters," she said.

The Lamont campaign said Lieberman's rhetoric is belied by his missed votes as a committee member on homeland security funding.

"He skipped all of these votes after issuing at least 8 press releases claiming he was outraged at President Bush's inadequate budget proposals," the Lamont campaign said in a written statement.

Lieberman, 64, a three-term incumbent, faces a five-way race for re-election, though polls show Lamont is his main rival. The field also includes Republican Alan Schlesinger, Ralph A. Ferrucci of the Green Party and Timothy A. Knibbs of the Concerned Citizens.

Lamont, 52, a cable-television entrepreneur, delivered his own national security speech Wednesday at Yale University, accusing Lieberman of breaking faith with a half-century of U.S. foreign policy by backing Bush's pre-emptive invasion of Iraq.

On Friday, Lamont stood at the Legislative Office Building in Hartford with Democratic gubernatorial candidate John DeStefano Jr. to blame Lieberman and Republican Gov. M. Jodi Rell for failing to lobby for legislation that would have targeted homeland security funds to urban areas, which could have brought federal aid for security to the ports of Bridgeport, New Haven and New London.

Lieberman missed a Senate floor vote on the legislation, which then failed on a tie vote. "Sen. Lieberman's vote would have made the difference, and Sen. Lieberman wasn't there to cast that vote," Lamont said.

Tammy Sun, Lieberman's campaign press secretary, said the senator was touring the Sikorsky Aircraft plant in Connecticut on the day of the vote, discussing how to secure more business for the helicopter maker.

Rich Harris, a spokesman for the Rell campaign, said the governor did object "vehemently" to the funding cuts.

Lieberman Stresses Dire Threat Of Terrorism (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

FAIRFIELD, Conn., Sept. 15 — Under attack for his support of the war in Iraq, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman gave a 25-minute national security speech Friday without ever mentioning that conflict, instead arguing that the broad threat of international terrorism demands a continued aggressive stance. He said Osama bin Laden was “free and fomenting hatred against the United States.”

“We must stay alert and engage in this war against the barbarians, because that is what they are: modern barbarians at our gates,” Mr. Lieberman said before an audience of about 200 here at Fairfield University. “Our enemies are patient and purposeful. They are ruthless. They are lethal.”

It was Mr. Lieberman’s first major speech since he was defeated in the Democratic primary last month, and aides said it was intended to be a policy update rather than a political statement. A Democrat now running as an independent, Mr. Lieberman criticized both major parties, highlighting his odd political position now.

“It is wrong for some on the right to imply that some Democrats don’t care if the terrorists succeed, or that debating the merits of the president’s policies on the war on terrorism emboldens our enemies,” Mr. Lieberman said.

That kind of attack on people’s motives “divides and weakens us as a nation,” he said.

But Mr. Lieberman, who is trying to strike a careful balance as he seeks Republican and unaffiliated votes in November, also criticized some of the president’s detractors.

“It is wrong for some on the left who go beyond dissent and demonize the president and impugn the motives of all those who support him,” Mr. Lieberman said. “Like it or not, we are in this war against terror, and we are in it together.”

That brought a response from Ned Lamont, the Democratic candidate for Senate, who suggested earlier in the week in his own foreign policy speech that the United States should refocus its anti-terror efforts on Afghanistan.

"I don't think anybody's demonizing anything," Mr. Lamont told reporters at a news conference in Hartford. "I think we're talking about the fact that this country's not on the right course in Iraq, and we're having a good, honest debate about what that course ought to be."

Mr. Lieberman, whose support for President Bush's efforts in Iraq was the core of Mr. Lamont's case in the Democratic primary, also made sure to chastise the White House. He said the administration had formed important alliances but also "alienated too many potential friends who could help lighten America's burden in this fight against our common enemy."

It is "an enemy that threatens not just America but all of civilization, or all of the civilized world," he added.

After the speech, members of the audience challenged Mr. Lieberman's Democratic credentials.

John Orman, a Fairfield University professor who considered a bid against Mr. Lieberman before Mr. Lamont entered the race, was the first in line. He asked the senator why he did not talk about Iraq.

Mr. Lieberman smiled and said he planned to make a speech on the war by the end of the month, and that he feared he "wouldn't do justice to either" subject if he combined them.

"I wanted to focus on homeland security in this speech," he said, adding that he believed the United States did the right thing in going into Iraq.

Mr. Lieberman said the Bush administration had made several mistakes after Saddam Hussein was overthrown but that Iraq had become a front in the "war on terrorism."

"I have no doubt that we will defeat the terrorists who started this war against us," Mr. Lieberman said in his speech. "That's not in question in my mind. It will not happen overnight, but I am confident we will ultimately prevail."

Suggesting that the United States had ignored threats after the cold war, Mr. Lieberman said that in the 1990's a "dangerous enemy began to take root in the backwaters of the Islamic world."

Citing the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, the 2000 attack on the destroyer Cole and the Iranian hostage crisis of 1979, he said, "As a nation, we remained asleep, unwilling to see the gathering storm."

Mr. Lieberman added that the American public had grown weary of war after World War II, Korea and Vietnam and had become complacent.

"We don't have the luxury of that ever again," he said. "We cannot ever again let down our guard."

New Jersey Is As Democratic As It Gets. For One Democrat, That's A Problem. (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

Newark

IT'S possible, but not easy, to find a more dismal way to spend a morning than slogging through Newark in a downpour to witness the guilty plea of yet another disgraced New Jersey politician. Friday it was John A. Lynch Jr., the former State Senate president and Democratic power broker, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges that could lead to a prison term of as much as 41 months.

But bit by bit, a far drearier and not entirely unrelated picture, at once far-fetched and somehow perversely credible, is beginning to take form in the fevered brains of Democrats in Washington.

It goes like this: Riding a tide of anger against the war in Iraq, they manage to take away six Republican Senate seats in places like Missouri, Tennessee and Ohio to take back the Senate. And then, oops, they find they've lost an unlosable seat in New Jersey to render the whole thing moot.

"Believe me, there are Democrats who are having that nightmare already," said Jennifer E. Duffy, with the Cook Political Report, a nonpartisan newsletter in Washington. "And if it happens, there will be people leaping from tall buildings. What's staggering to us is it's still a viable option for a Republican to win this year in a blue state like New Jersey. I promise you I never thought I'd be talking about New Jersey after Labor Day."

In fact, the Cook Report, like all the major political newsletters, is now calling the race between State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican, and Senator Robert Menendez, the Democrat, a toss-up. And, whether or not control of the Senate ends up hinging on the answer, it's clear that this is yet another toxic soufflé of New Jersey politics that will revolve around this question: Who seems scarier — the Republicans in Washington or the Democrats in New Jersey?

This, of course, was not supposed to be the story line in a year when the Democrats are poised to make major gains, even if winning the House still remains a challenge and taking back the Senate a major long shot. But the longer that polls show the New Jersey race in a dead heat, the more people wonder just what script gets written in the end.

The betting for most is still that things eventually revert to form. New Jersey has not elected a Republican to the Senate since Clifford Case 34 years ago. Polls show the Iraq war wildly unpopular in New Jersey and President Bush getting a favorable approval rating from about a third of state voters. And in tough races, the Democrats almost always manage to turn out big enough numbers in North Jersey cities to push the sick and frail over the finish line.

"A month ago I said Menendez would win by between seven and 10 points, and I'm getting teased about it," said David Rebovich, director of the Institute for New Jersey Politics at Rider University. "I still think a Democrat has to be favored, but we're looking at a much tighter race."

And somewhere in the reptile brain of voters, where gut rules, there are plenty of reasons to hedge one's bets. Many voters may still not know that the Kean who is running is not the former governor but his 38-year-old son. And they might not care. In America, where nothing beats a good brand, we elect Kennedys and Bushes and Cuomos and Keans, and there's always room for a fresh product line.

Voters might not approve of President Bush or his war, but as Mr. Lynch's plea yesterday shows, New Jersey Democrats never run out of reasons to give voters pause. Maybe you could dream up a worse election-season front page for New Jersey Democrats than Friday's Star-Ledger, but it wouldn't be easy. Splashed across the top was the Lynch story. Dominating the rest of the page was another headlined "McGreevey 'In Love' From the First Kiss."

And for all the Democrats' advantage in money and base, this race remains full of questions. With almost no really competitive races for Democratic congressmen, can they guarantee the urban turnout they need? In a state where a Hispanic candidate has never been elected statewide, what role will Mr. Menendez's ethnicity have both on white suburban voters and on black urban ones?

And if ethics is a major issue and an aggressive Republican United States attorney keeps it that way, can Mr. Menendez convince voters he's clean and the election is about Iraq and control of the Senate, not Hudson County and New Jersey politics?

So we'll see what race wins out. If it's about Washington, Mr. Menendez almost surely wins. If it's about New Jersey, the Democrats have reason to be nervous.

Marriage Vote Seen As Lifeline For Allen (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

Virginia's constitutional amendment on marriage will attract conservative voters who otherwise would have stayed home in frustration with national Republicans, grass-roots activists say.

The bump in turnout in November likely will benefit U.S. Sen. George Allen, a Republican who until recently appeared a lock for re-election and poised for a 2008 White House bid.

"Marriage amendments do drive turnout," said Victoria Cobb, executive director of Virginia's Family Foundation.

Mrs. Cobb said ballot questions defining traditional marriage in more than a dozen states in 2004 helped secure President Bush's re-election.

"People came out to support it who would not have come out otherwise," she said.

Mr. Allen favors amending the state constitution, but his challenger, Democrat James H. Webb Jr., opposes the constitutional change as broad and discriminatory.

Democrats say Republicans should not be so confident that the measure will pass with a large margin. They say its placement on the ballot -- once considered a gift from Republican state legislators so Mr. Allen could get a landslide win -- is stirring opposition in the more liberal areas of the state.

A recent Mason-Dixon poll showed the amendment winning but losing support.

"It worked in other states, but what was thought to be an asset to Senator Allen no longer will be a benefit," said Delegate Brian J. Moran of Alexandria, who leads the state Democratic House Caucus.

Mr. Moran said Democrats can link the amendment to Mr. Allen's highly publicized use of the word "macaca" last month to address a 20-year-old Webb volunteer who was videotaping his campaign stops.

Mr. Allen, who made the crack at a rally in Southwest Virginia, apologized within days to the Webb worker, S.R. Sidarth, who is of Indian descent. The senator has apologized repeatedly in front of other audiences.

"You'll see a lot of people connect the dots between discrimination and macaca," Mr. Moran said. "This is the politics of division, and there is a relationship between the two."

Pollsters agree the remark damaged Mr. Allen's re-election bid, eroding a double-digit lead. He and Mr. Webb are nearly tied in several polls.

The Allen-Webb race attracted national attention, and the candidates were set to meet this morning in a debate on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The outcome of the race could decide control of the Senate if Democrats win enough seats elsewhere.

Though Mr. Allen has the advantage in fundraising and name recognition, the momentum is held by the Democrats and Mr. Webb, a former Republican secretary of the Navy under President Reagan.

Activists familiar with the grass-roots efforts of both parties in Virginia say the Democrats have the organizational advantage and can build on the successes of the current governor and his predecessor, both Democrats.

"I'm getting the largest turnouts at my rallies since I had in 1992 when [Bill] Clinton was running for president," said Rep. Rick Boucher, a Democrat from Southwest Virginia, a traditionally Republican region.

Dan Drummond, chairman of the Fairfax City Democratic Committee, agreed, saying that "grass-roots is going to win this campaign."

Some Republicans predict that a large turnout will not be enough to save Mr. Allen from conservatives irritated about immigration policy and other voters angry at President Bush over the war in Iraq.

"There is a growing frustration that maybe it's time for a change, maybe it is time for the Republicans to lose some power," said Brag Bowling, a commander in Virginia's Sons of Confederate Veterans and, until recently, a loyal Allen supporter. "They can't wage a winning war, they can't balance our budget, they can't protect our borders."

Mr. Bowling also said Mr. Allen insulted his Southern heritage when he said at a conference of historically black colleges and universities that he has come to understand that the Confederate flag is a symbol of hate and intolerance for blacks and regrets once having displayed it.

A Bad Amendment (WP)

Even if you oppose gay marriage, Virginia's ban would go too far.

SINCE 1998, 20 states have adopted constitutional amendments banning gay marriage. But not all of them have been drafted so expansively, and so carelessly, as the measure that will appear on Virginia's ballot in November, which would recognize no "union, partnership or other legal status to which is assigned the rights, benefits, obligations, qualities or effects of marriage." The amendment is muddle-headed and absurdly broad, duplicates what is already in state law and carries the germ of a thousand unintended consequences. Virginia voters should reject it.

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) opposes gay marriage, but he shares with its defenders the concern that the wording of Virginia's amendment could imperil the rights of individuals to enter into private contracts or employers to extend benefits such as health care coverage to unmarried couples. Plenty of the state's most prominent employers might face a more vexing recruiting environment if the amendment is approved.

The governor seems prepared to spend some political capital opposing the amendment but not too much; his aides say not to expect a full-court press. He has recognized from the outset that the amendment can be construed not only as banning same-sex marriages and civil unions but also as putting thousands of unmarried couples at risk of losing a host of benefits. But he is loath to hit the hustings in an all-out effort to defeat the measure, which will appear on the statewide ballot Nov. 7.

We believe that all such measures enshrine intolerance and may have cruel and discriminatory effects. Around the country, there are encouraging signs that voters and legislatures in some states that have not already adopted such amendments are balking at jumping on the bandwagon. The tide that has carried these proposals may be receding somewhat, which may be one reason for Mr. Kaine's ambivalence. He has said he would support a narrowly drawn amendment that defines marriage as the union of a man and a woman, as a number of states have done.

Like any politician, Mr. Kaine is entitled to pick his battles, and there's no doubt that this one would be an uphill struggle. He would have to tackle the reality of a majority of Virginians who start out opposed to gay marriage, as well as that of the state's attorney general, Robert F. McDonnell (R), who backs the measure and dismisses the idea that it is legally problematic. But the stakes, as the governor himself has defined them, are high. Defeating the amendment is a fight worth fighting wholeheartedly.

Paid Bloggers Stoke Senate Battle In Va. (WP)

Campaigns Test Limits of Finance Laws

RICHMOND -- Virginia's U.S. Senate race has catapulted bloggers into the middle of electioneering and controversy as campaign supporters use their online forums to connect with voters, raise money and spread gossip.

Liberal bloggers -- two of whom are on the payroll of Democratic challenger James Webb -- fanned the flames last month after Sen. George Allen aimed a derogatory remark at a young Webb volunteer. That hype has helped Webb close a double-digit Allen lead in public polls and was a blow to the Republican senator's possible presidential bid in 2008.

The lack of an effective response from conservative bloggers has prompted Allen to hire a Virginia blogger as his "new media coordinator" to goose GOP supporters into action. And four of Virginia's most popular conservative bloggers launched http://www.allens-a-team.com last week to counter what they call liberal attacks.

Together, the Webb and Allen campaigns are transforming the image of the independent blogger, clicking away on his own dime from his basement. And they are pushing the boundaries of federal campaign finance laws as blogs that once were personal diaries have come to resemble full-blown campaign operations that don't have to be reported as expenses.

The goal of the paid bloggers, both campaigns say, is to deluge online political journals with positive tidbits about their candidate and draw attention to the most negative news about their opponent. The campaign bloggers sometimes write their own bits. Other times, they spread gossip generated by others.

"We just feel like if the left is going to run rampant, we have to respond in some way," said Chad Dotson, one of the new pro-Allen bloggers and the prosecutor in Wise County. "We decided enough is enough. It's something we should have done before."

Jon Henke, Allen's new blog guru, said he will try to do in the eight weeks until the Nov. 7 election what Democrats have been doing online for months in Virginia. "Our goal is to engage the blogosphere to get our message out," he said.

Bloggers first appeared on the national political scene in 2003 and 2004 during the presidential contest. Democratic candidate Howard Dean was the first to harness the energy from thousands of online journals, whose tiny readership is multiplied by the Internet's ability to link readers from one blog to the next.

They have made little splash in Maryland and the District. But in Virginia, bloggers have mushroomed into a political force to whom politicians cater. Last month, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) held a morning conference call just for political bloggers. Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R) regularly does a "live blog" on several conservative Web sites.

And nowhere is their presence felt more than on the campaign trail in the Senate race.

"It does seem to have gone up another notch," said Lowell Feld, founder of Raising Kaine, a liberal blog whose monthly visits are on track to be more than 100,000, up from 15,000 in December.

Bloggers were all over last week's campaign developments as the two sides traded accusations about the candidates' views on women. The bloggers' posts often are over the top. One entry on the A-Team blog offered the following quote: "Who is more modern in their attitude towards women: the Taliban, or . . . Webb? Tough call."

But it is Feld's Virginia site, at http://www.raisingkaine.com , that has been at the center of blogging influence and of controversy.

A former federal employee with degrees in psychology and Middle East studies, Feld helped blog Kaine into office last year (thus the site's name) and runs a state political action committee that he said has been largely dormant since the end of the governor's race.

This year, Feld was one of several bloggers who launched online petitions to help persuade Webb to get into the race against Allen. Feld blogged furiously on behalf of Webb during his primary fight against Fairfax Democrat and lobbyist Harris Miller.

Shortly after Webb won the primary in June, Feld announced that he had been hired as Webb's "netroots coordinator." The campaign pays him $2,500 a month to help the Democrat interact with the online community. Feld's partner, Josh Chernila, is the campaign's grass-roots coordinator.

Both offer disclaimers that their opinions are their own, but they have continued to blog on Raising Kaine, using the site to launch sometimes blistering critiques of Allen and often going further than Webb's spokeswoman.

In recent posts, Feld has referred to Republicans as "rightwing crazies" and has changed the name of Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, to a locker room epithet.

Recently, Feld wrote about a picture that shows Allen standing next to a group of white men who allegedly belonged to a white supremacist group.

"Finally! I mean, seriously, how long does it take the supposedly 'mainstream media' to pick up on evidence that a man who wants to be President is a racist?" Feld wrote.

Asked whether she believes Allen is racist, Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd said: "I don't know. You'll have to ask George Allen." Told about Feld's post, she added, "Well, you know, Lowell doesn't speak for the campaign."

Feld's online statements -- and the Webb campaign's attempts to distance itself -- have outraged conservatives who accuse Webb of illegally using the Raising Kaine site and its bloggers as a vehicle for election-year messages without officially reporting it as a 2006 campaign expense.

Dotson accused Feld and other liberal bloggers of making "huge misrepresentations" on their sites and said the Webb campaign should be held accountable.

"His campaign has been so inept that if he didn't have left-wing bloggers screaming at the top of their lungs, he wouldn't have a campaign," Dotson said.

On the Virginia Virtual Conservative blog, http://virtuconindustries.blogspot.com , Jim Riley penned an entry titled "Raising Kaine PAC in violation of Federal Election law."

Riley wrote: "The gang at Raising Kaine PAC better start looking around for a good Democrat federal election law attorney. Something tells me that they'll be needing one."

Feld said lawyers have told him neither he nor the campaign is doing anything wrong. "We're very confident. They've assured us time and again [that we] not only meet the letter of the law, but exceed it."

Federal election laws largely exempt blogging and other online activity from reporting requirements in much the same way that newspapers and television programs are free to comment without fear of government regulation.

In March, the Federal Election Commission issued rules that require campaigns to report when they buy banner ads on Web sites. But those same regulations appear to give bloggers such as Feld and Henke virtually unlimited freedom.

In documents accompanying the regulations, the FEC wrote, "The new rules exempt Internet activity by individuals acting both with and without the knowledge or consent of a candidate, authorized committee, or political party committee."

But Feld and Henke are testing the federal laws by claiming to be members of a campaign staff one moment and independent campaign bloggers the next.

What is clear, said political activists on the left and the right, is that campaigns such as the ones in Virginia are changing the way bloggers are perceived.

"Blogging is evolving," Feld said. "You are moving into the point where bloggers who before were making no money are starting to become more like professionals, like journalists and other campaign people."

Democrats Lose In Chafee Victory (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

Senate Democrats last week lost a key chance in their battle to retake the Senate, when top Republicans helped one of their most liberal members, Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, defeat a more conservative challenger who both sides thought would lose to Democrats in November.

"Republicans are breathing a sigh of relief," Republican pollster Scott Reed said. "And the Democrats' momentum has been halted. ... This just would have made them one step closer."

Democrats have to gain six seats in order to retake the Senate. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said last year that a "miracle" would be needed for them to do so.

Senate Democrats strongly disagree that Mr. Chafee's win was a setback for them. They argue that they can still win the seat because Mr. Chafee was weakened by the bitter primary and polls show a tight race between him and Democratic nominee Sheldon Whitehouse, a former state attorney general.

But the hill is now a bit steeper for Democrats than it would have been had the more conservative Stephen Laffey won the Republican primary in the Democratic state.

To gain a majority, Democrats would have to win Mr. Chafee's seat, as well as four vulnerable Republican seats in Missouri, Montana, Ohio and Pennsylvania, said Jennifer Duffy, editor and political analyst for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. Then, they would have to pick up a sixth seat from among three slightly less vulnerable Republican seats in Arizona, Tennessee and Virginia, she said. And they would have to do all of this without losing any of their current seats.

In addition, Democrats are trying to deal with reports that Sen. Robert Menendez, New Jersey Democrat, is the subject of a federal investigation. The Star Ledger reported on Sept. 8 that the federal government is investigating a rental deal between Mr. Menendez and a nonprofit group in the state that received millions in federal funds. A Republican poll taken last weekend showed Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr. with a four-point lead.

Meanwhile, last week's Rhode Island primary was a focus for both parties because polls showed Mr. Laffey likely would lose to Mr. Whitehouse, giving Democrats a victory in the state. National Republicans gave ample money, time and resources to Mr. Chafee to ensure that didn't happen.

"It makes the math a lot harder for [Democrats]," Dan Ronayne, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said of the outcome. He noted that Democrats were so intent on a Laffey win that they spent $26,000 making phone calls against Mr. Chafee leading up to the race, according to a Federal Election Commission filing by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC).

But the DSCC is now wholly focused on the general election.

DOJ_NMG_0065023

It says Mr. Chafee will have a difficult time trying to woo left-leaning voters after top Republicans such as first lady Laura Bush traveled to Rhode Island to campaign for him.

"Chafee's going to have a harder time shifting to a general election after using page after page of the Republican playbook in the primary," DSCC spokesman Phil Singer said.

In a strategy memo the day after the primary, DSCC Chairman Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York noted that Mr. Whitehouse got roughly the same number of votes as both the Republican candidates combined.

He said the primary showed that "candidates who were perceived as the most anti-Bush won -- an ominous sign for the GOP and a good sign for Democrats."

Clinton Stars At Klobuchar Event (MINNST)

By Josephine Marcotty, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 17, 2006

The former president, ever-popular among Democrats, lent his charm and fundraising mettle to the DFL candidate.

Former President Bill Clinton, the Democrats' favorite Democrat, stood with U.S. Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar before a crowd of more than 1,400 people Saturday night to shed some of his rainmaking power on her and her political party.

Clinton raised cheers at the fundraising dinner held at the RiverCentre in St. Paul when he said that Klobuchar "may be the very best we have in the United States."

His presence in Minnesota, and that of President Bush at a Republican fundraiser in August, illustrates the importance that both parties place on this Senate race.

"It's the most competitive race in the country," said Mark Drake, communications director for the Republican Party in Minnesota. "It speaks to the fact that they have to bring in their most important fundraiser," he said.

Questions were raised about whether Bush would help or hurt Minnesota Republican candidates during his fundraising swing here.

But that's not an issue for Clinton or the candidates he supports in Minnesota, experts said.

"There is no more popular Democrat than Bill Clinton," said Steve Smith, a professor of political science at Washington University in St. Louis. "If you are putting on a fundraiser, you want Bill Clinton."

When Bush came to Minnesota for a Republican fundraiser in August, some questioned whether the political fallout from the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina would steer voters away from Republican congressional candidate Michele Bachmann and Senate candidate Mark Kennedy. In fact, a running theme of the coverage of the race between Kennedy and Klobuchar has been that Kennedy is trying to overcome his image as a Bush Republican.

Kennedy's answer to that was to ride in Bush's motorcade, and shake his hand during the Minnesota visit.

However, when Clinton left office he was one of the most popular presidents ever, said Stephen Frank, a political science professor at St. Cloud State University, and that was especially true in Minnesota.

"And we love former presidents," he said.

In fact, Clinton's appearance beside Klobuchar at the event might raise her appeal to a broader spectrum of voters, he said.

"She's modeled herself on Clinton," Smith said. "He was known for his success in taking a moderate approach. And [Klobuchar] has attempted to stake a claim in the middle of spectrum."

In fact, Clinton said during his speech Saturday that the "Democratic party has actually become both the liberal and the conservative party in America today." The Republicans have been taken over by a narrow group of extreme conservatives, he said.

That's in sharp contrast to what Republicans have been saying about Minnesota Democrats since Keith Ellison won the Democratic primary last week in the Fifth District Congressional race.

"Clinton, coming to town on the heels of Ellison's victory, really underscores just how much Minnesota Democrats have abandoned his Democratic legacy," Drake said.

Ellison has been subjected to heated attacks by his Republican opponent in the race because of his past ties to Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan. Ellison, a Muslim, has said his ties were limited to helping organize the Million Man March in Washington.

Campaign officials for Klobuchar said the event was sold out, and they added spots for 200 more people at the last minute. However, they were unable to say how much money was raised because Clinton's schedule changed at the last minute, forcing the Klobuchar campaign to cancel a fundraising event with him that was to be held before the dinner. Earlier Saturday he attended the funeral of former Texas Gov. Ann Richards, who died Thursday of cancer.

A spokesperson for the Minnesota DFL said its share of the proceeds would be about $500,000.

'Values Voters' Up For Grabs In State's Senate Race (PPG)

By James O'Toole, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

CAMPAIGN 2006 / U.S. SENATE

Bob Casey returned to his law school, Catholic University, last week, to deliver a message on how his faith informs his public life.

This Wednesday, Dr. James Dobson, the popular and influential evangelical broadcaster, will appear at the Mellon Arena.

Sen. Rick Santorum, whose reelection is being challenged by Mr. Casey, won't be there and won't be endorsed formally at the gathering, but the selection of Pittsburgh as a site for pre-election Stand for the Family rallies shows how highly the conservative Republican is valued by Dr. Dobson and his colleagues.

"Pennsylvania is too important for us not to be here ... especially in your Senate race," Dr. Dobson said in a radio interview last week. "Get to the polls. You know who to vote for. I won't tell you, because you already know."

The two events highlight the importance of religion in this race and in the broader national struggle between parties eager to appeal to "the values voter," that many analysts saw as a decisive factor in the 2004 presidential race. Since that election, Democrats nationally have struggled to find a natural voice on religious issues.

"I really think they understand that they've missed the boat and they've ceded all this territory to the Republican Party," said Laura Olson, a Clemson University scholar and the author of "Religion and Politics in America: Faith, Culture and Strategic Choices."

"On the other hand," she said, "you can't really turn around all of a sudden and say, 'OK, I'm going to talk about religion.' "

A recent survey by researchers at Baylor University confirmed earlier findings that regular church attendance had a high correlation to support for Republican candidates. The latest in a series of surveys on religion and politics by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life offered similar conclusions. Both surveys noted that white evangelical Protestants were the most monolithic of religious groups in their support for conservative candidates and issues.

That tendency should be unmistakable in the presentation by Dr. Dobson and his colleagues. While, for tax reasons, the group is barred from making formal endorsements in the race, anyone who walks away not knowing their preference won't have been paying attention. Mr. Santorum, while a Roman Catholic himself, had a prominent place in a Time Magazine survey of the most influential figures in the evangelical movement.

"Obviously, we're coming to a state where the stakes are pretty high," said Tom Minnery, Focus on the Family's vice president for public policy and the leader of its political arm. "We won't be telling people how to vote, but we'll be laying out the differences."

If the electorate were limited to religious conservatives, Mr. Casey would face prohibitive odds in November. But some analysts see a broader problem for a party whose brand name has become associated with a more secular approach to public issues.

"The root of the Democratic Party's religious woes may not lie solely in the fact that they have been spurned by religious conservatives," Pew researchers Gregory Smith and Peyton Craighill wrote in a commentary on the latest survey. "Contributing to the party's electoral misfortunes may be that even moderate citizens and voters view the Democrats as being unfriendly toward religion."

The introduction to the report itself said the Democrats have a "God Problem," with only a quarter of voters saying that the party is friendly toward religion. It went on to note, however, that "the proportion of Americans who say the Republican Party is friendly to religion, while much larger, has fallen from 55 [percent] to 47 [percent] in the past year, with a particularly sharp decline coming among white evangelical Protestants (14 percentage points)."

Mr. Casey's Catholic University speech was an implicit effort to counter his party's image.

Mr. Casey, like his opponent an observant Roman Catholic, invoked the Conference of Catholic Bishops' "Guide to Faithful Citizenship," and said, "My understanding of the common good also comes from my faith: faith in God, that all things will ultimately work to his greater good."

Back in the 'public square'

Mr. Santorum, in his book, "It Takes a Family" and in numerous speeches has complained about a society that would ban religion from the public square. He argues in his book: "Most liberals seem really to believe that this widespread worry about values is nothing more than a version of the Marxist 'false consciousness,' a form of mass hysteria created by urban legends and stoked by talk show hosts like Sean Hannity, Dr. Laura, and Rush Limbaugh and evangelicals like Dr. James Dobson."

Jay Reiff, Mr. Casey's campaign manager, argues that such a characterization can't be tagged on the challenger

"Bob is a new kind of Democrat and is hoping to be a model of bringing faith to the public square," he said.

One of the factors cited by analysts in Democrat Timothy Kaine's victory in last year's Virginia governor's race was his ability to speak comfortably about his faith. Early in the campaign, the Virginian-Pilot reported, he ran radio ads on small Christian broadcasting stations saying that, "My family and Christian faith are the core values that guide me."

Handicapping the Virginia race in an appearance on "Meet the Press," Howard Dean, the Democratic National chairman, said, "We ought to talk about our values. Tim Kaine did it. I don't think that's the only reason he won, but it's certainly one of them."

This rebranding effort has skeptics, however, both in and outside the party.

"I'm not comfortable with the way the Democratic Party has tried to become religious," the Rev. George Regas, pastor emeritus of All Saints Church in Pasadena, Calif., said at a panel discussion on religion and politics last week at the Warhol Museum. "There's an inauthenticity about it."

The Rev. Regas, who supports abortion rights, said he was frustrated at Democratic efforts to defend liberal positions on issues such as abortion and gay marriage from a civil liberties standpoint rather than a moral one.

Some Democrats eager to portray their candidates as more friendly to religious audiences have launched the Web site, FaithfulDemocrats.com. One of its key figures is a former DNC chairman, David Wilhelm, an investment banker and practicing Methodist.

The site describes itself as "an online community of Christian Democrats -- religious leaders, political leaders, writers, and regular Americans who are committed to the Gospel and the common good. ... We don't believe that good Christians have to be Democrats. Nor do we believe that one religion has a monopoly on faith. But we make no apologies for rooting our identity as Democrats in our faith as Christians."

To the Democratic hierarchy, a big part of Mr. Casey's appeal as a candidate was based in part on his ability to fit a similar profile. He shares Mr. Santorum's overall positions on abortion and stem cell research. Both support the death penalty. Like the incumbent, Mr. Casey opposes gay marriage, but supports civil unions for gay couples. And while he supports previous legislative definitions of marriage as a bond between a man and a woman, he derided the effort to insert similar language as an amendment to the Constitution as a partisan ploy by congressional Republicans.

Abortion off the table?

At a recent Labor Day picnic, while Mr. Casey worked the crowd a few feet away, Westmoreland County Commissioner Tom Balya said he expected Mr. Casey to run well in his socially conservative county because, in his view, he takes the polarizing issues of abortion, along with gun control, off the board.

That Democratic hope won't be realized for every voter, however. Referring to the premise that Mr. Casey's candidacy moots the abortion issues, Helen Cindrich, president of People Concerned for the Unborn Child, said, "He's going to be surprised if he thinks that's true."

LifePAC, the political arm of Mrs. Cindrich's group, endorsed Mr. Santorum last week. The veteran anti-abortion activist described herself as a longtime admirer of Mr. Casey's father, the late governor, who was an outspoken foe of abortion and who even considered running for president on a pro-life platform.

"We interviewed him before the primary," she said of the Democratic candidate. "We were kind of thinking, 'Here comes Robert P. Casey all over again.' He said to me, 'I'm not my father.' "

"The fact that he says that Plan B is a good thing really rankles," Mrs. Cindrich said.

Mr. Casey supports the so-called morning after pill -- Plan B -- and the recent FDA decision to allow its sale over-the-counter, an issue that both Mrs. Cindrich and Mr. Minnery, of Focus on the Family, cited as important to their constituencies.

In his recent appearance on "Meet the Press," Mr. Casey said that the Plan B pill is a contraceptive. Mr. Santorum and many abortion foes oppose it, however, arguing that it can, in some instances, be tantamount to an abortion.

Mr. Casey also differs from Mr. Santorum in supporting government aid to family planning organizations. He has argued repeatedly that both pro-life and pro-choice groups can find common ground in supporting polices that reduce the number of abortions.

"In my view, neither party has gotten it right when it comes to life issues," Mr. Casey said in his Catholic University address. "We can't realistically tackle the difficult question of abortion without embracing the 'radical solidarity' with women who face pregnancy that Pope John Paul spoke of many years ago. If we are going to be pro-life, we cannot say we are against abortion of unborn children and then let our children suffer in degraded inner city schools and broken homes."

Mr. Reiff, the Democrat's campaign manager, pointed out that Mr. Casey has made efforts to reach out to a variety of faith-based groups, including the Pennsylvania Pastors Network, a coalition of nonprofit groups, working to increase the turnout of religious voters in November. Mr. Casey spoke to a meeting of the group in July, but its first session, early this year, featured a seven-minute videotaped greeting by Mr. Santorum.

In Pennsylvania and elsewhere in the country, GOP outreach to such church groups proved a decisive factor in the 2004 presidential results.

All of this suggests several tactical issues about this Senate campaign. Mr. Santorum seems certain of retaining the allegiance of most of the more conservative religious groups, but will Mr. Casey's relatively conservative social positions, and comfort in discussing his faith, allow him to peel off at least some of that conservative support?

Conversely, will more socially liberal voters, such as those in the crucial Philadelphia suburbs, perceive Mr. Casey as relatively moderate compared to the incumbent, or will they place both candidates in the same pro-life niche?

"Because Casey is able to present himself as a moderate, it creates a strategic opportunity for the Democrats to peel off moderates," said Ms. Olson, the Clemson scholar. "It seems to me that the 2006 elections are not going to be decided on the same culture wars as in the past."

Al Franken: Formidable Fundraiser (MINNST)

By Rob Hotakainen, Star Tribune

The potential 2008 U.S. Senate hopeful is helping DFLers and candidates around the country.

WASHINGTON - A new Democratic powerhouse is emerging in Minnesota this campaign season: comedian Al Franken.

His political-action committee, which is called Midwest Values, has raised more than $800,000 that he's spreading to Democratic candidates in Minnesota and across the country.

"He's potentially a huge player." said David Schultz, a professor at Hamline University in St. Paul who studies money in politics.

Schultz said that if Franken spends all of the political funds he is raising, his group would be one of the "top two or three PACs expending money in the state of Minnesota."

But Franken, a bestselling author and radio talk-show host who grew up in St. Louis Park, could be the ultimate beneficiary if he cashes in his chits and runs for the Senate in 2008 against Minnesota Republican Sen. Norm Coleman.

Franken, who moved from New York to Minneapolis this year, said he might form an exploratory committee for that race early next year.

He is raising campaign money from a variety of sources -- from the entertainment industry on both coasts, his stand-up comedy shows and elsewhere.

"If I do run against Norm Coleman in '08, I'll be the only New York Jew in the race who actually grew up in Minnesota," Franken quipped to about 200 DFL activists gathered at a picnic in Fridley recently.

Hollywood ties

Contributors to Franken's PAC include Barbra Streisand, Phil Donahue, Larry Hagman and Norman Lear from the entertainment industry, former Minnesota Gov. Wendell Anderson and Minneapolis attorney Sam Kaplan.

That list of contributors prompted Coleman to say that Franken "obviously has a sense of humor" by calling his PAC Midwest Values.

"Hollywood values aren't Midwest," Coleman said, "and the money isn't Midwest."

Coleman, who has raised nearly $4 million for his reelection bid, said he expects Franken to be "a very strong voice for the far left" and a strong fundraiser.

"There's a lot of Hollywood money out there, a lot of ultra-liberal money out there," Coleman said. "I have no doubt that Al Franken will be very, very formidable. ... He can probably self-fund."

Franken said he chose the name Midwest Values for his group because he is tired of Republicans claiming those values as their own. He said that Hollywood contributors have provided only $60,000 to his PAC and that Minnesotans have given much more.

Franken would not be allowed to use his PAC money to finance a run for the Senate.

So far, Franken has distributed $10,000 each to Senate hopeful Amy Klobuchar and House candidates Patty Wetterling, Tim Walz and Coleen Rowley. He gave $5,000 each to Democrats in tight Senate races: Claire McCaskill in Missouri, Sherrod Brown in Ohio and Jon Tester in Montana. He gave $20,000 to the DFL Party and $500 each to more than 30 legislative candidates.

He is aiming his money at contested races where he believes it will help most.

Wetterling said that Franken is bringing a new perspective to politics: "This is Minnesota. We elected Jesse Ventura. We elected Rod Grams, the TV anchorman," she said. "We've elected different people."

Franken has been doing a lot of politicking around Minnesota since January, when he moved his show on the Air America radio network from Manhattan to Minneapolis.

DOJ_NMG_0065027

The night after he appeared in Fridley, Franken went to Tonka Bay to raise money for Wetterling. The next night, he rallied DFLers at the Wellstone Dinner in St. Cloud. Two nights later, he was in Minneapolis, raising money for abortion-rights advocates. The next week, Franken went to Denver and San Francisco to do stand-up shows. Last Tuesday night, he attended a political event in Rochester.

Republicans take notice

Franken's political rounds in the state are not going unnoticed by opponents.

Last week, State Republican chairman Ron Carey called him one of the "true finance chairs" behind DFL gubernatorial candidate Mike Hatch. Carey described Franken as "an angry liberal."

Franken said he is ready for attacks. "I admit, I've been angry at times. ... I don't know how you don't get angry at what's going on," he said.

As he travels throughout Minnesota, Franken is staying true to his trade, often relying on humor at political events. He calls the No Child Left Behind law for schools "the most ironically named piece of legislation since the 1942 Japanese Family Leave Act." He says Republicans are "stealing God," adding that the Bible is filled with references to helping the poor. If you cut all those references out, he says, "you'd have the perfect box to smuggle Rush Limbaugh's drugs in."

At the Fridley picnic, Franken got a big laugh when he read from the GOP's Contract With America in 1994, recalling how Republicans promised to end a cycle of political scandal.

"On September 27th, 1994, on the steps the Capitol, they said this: 'If we break the contract, throw us out,' " he said.

After the crowd's hooting ended, Franken yelled: "Sounds like a plan to me!"

Jindal, Vitter Back Romero For House Seat (BRADV)

By Patrick Courreges, Acadiana Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 17, 2006

HOUMA — The Louisiana Republican Party's two hottest political acts traveled to Houma Saturday to declare their support for Republican Louisiana 3rd Congressional District challenger Craig Romero.

U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, and U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-Metairie, held a news conference with state Sen. Romero, R-New Iberia, in front of the Terrebonne Parish Courthouse where they praised Romero's values and work ethic.

Romero is the best-known and best-funded of three challengers attempting to unseat first-term incumbent U.S. Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, in the Nov. 7 election. The other two are Franklin Libertarian James Lee Blake Jr. and LaPlace Democrat Olangee "OJ" Breech.

"I am absolutely convinced we need Craig Romero in our delegation, especially in these challenging times," Vitter said.

He said that trying to bring more funding to the state to help restore its eroding coast and continue the recovery from 2005's hurricanes Katrina and Rita are crucial issues for the state's delegation.

Romero is uniquely qualified to deal with hurricane recovery, having served as Iberia Parish president and helping oversee that parish's recovery from Hurricane Andrew in 1992, Vitter said.

"He has the knowledge and the experience," Vitter said.

He said another reason for his endorsement is that Romero best represents the conservative values that Vitter believes Louisiana wants.

Vitter said he does not believe Melancon's claims to share those conservative values.

"I think the record shows that he doesn't," Vitter said.

The first vote Melancon or Romero would cast in Congress would be a choice for Speaker of the House, and while Romero would certainly vote for a strong conservative, Melancon would have to vote with the rest of his party for U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., Vitter said.

He said a Pelosi-led House would be for abortion, for gun control and for tax increases.

GOP's Attack On Ellison Focuses On U.S. Muslim (MINNST)

By Sharon Schmickle, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 17, 2006

Nihad Awad is head of the Council of American-Islamic Relations. Conservatives say it is rooted in Hamas and secretly supports Hezbollah in Lebanon.

When Nihad Awad flew to Minneapolis to attend a fundraiser for state Rep. Keith Ellison in August, following him was a simmering debate in American politics: What constitutes support for terrorism?

Last week, Minnesota Republicans thrust that issue to the forefront after Ellison won the DFL primary in the Fifth Congressional District. In a letter to Republicans statewide afterward, state GOP chairman Ron Carey accused Ellison of trying to hide his backing from "a self-identified supporter" of the Palestinian group Hamas.

Carey was referring to Awad, a former Minnesotan and executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) in Washington, one of the nation's most prominent Muslim groups. Awad has been a frequent commentator on national television and appeared with President Bush after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

But many conservatives and Jewish groups say that CAIR is rooted in the Hamas movement and that its leaders also secretly support Hezbollah in Lebanon. The United States counts Hamas and Hezbollah as terrorist organizations.

Awad donated $2,000 to Ellison's campaign in July, and at least one other CAIR employee gave $1,000. The donations are listed on Ellison's campaign finance reports, and he said he has nothing to hide.

"The Republicans are in a tough situation," Ellison said. "Iraq is a failed policy."

Ellison added, "They haven't done much for homeland security. We still have a health care crisis. The Earth is warming up, and they're not doing anything about it. What are they going to do? They have to try to engage in smear politics."

If he wins, Ellison will be the first Muslim elected to Congress. He called Awad an "acquaintance," saying he has known the CAIR leader for many years but not well enough to be able to "account for everything he has ever done, everybody he knows or everything he has ever said."

But after Awad attended the Ellison fundraiser on Aug. 25, conservative blogs, some Jewish groups and some Democrats objected.

Awad dismissed the attacks as an effort to crush Ellison with unfounded guilt-by-association innuendo. He predicted that it will backfire. "The Twin Cities has broken the historical ice of stereotypes and fear that American Muslims cannot make it," Awad said.

But some observers neutral-to-supportive on Ellison said it's valid for voters to examine a candidate's associations.

Jewish voters, for example, are concerned about Israel's security, and they scrutinize all candidate positions as they relate to Hamas and Hezbollah, said Julie Swiler, a spokeswoman for the Jewish Community Relations Council of Minnesota and the Dakotas.

Many Jewish voters apparently were satisfied with Ellison even after Awad stepped forth to support him. Prominent Jewish politicians continued to campaign for him, and an influential newspaper, the American Jewish World, endorsed him.

The debate goes back to the late 1980s, when Awad, a Palestinian refugee, left Jordan to study at the University of Minnesota, where he was active in Muslim student groups. That's where he met Ellison, a law student at the time.

Awad frequently accepted invitations to explain Islam at Twin Cities area schools and churches, sometimes collaborating with another Minnesotan, Ibrahim Hooper. In 1994 they took their outreach nationwide, with money raised by Omar Ahmad, president of the Islamic Association for Palestine, where Awad worked as public relations director.

The organization that Awad and Hooper opened in a two-room office in Washington that year now has 32 chapters and affiliates in the United States and Canada. Its stated mission is to enhance understanding of Islam and defend civil liberties. But its leaders also have criticized U.S. policy in the Middle East.

Controversy began even before the doors opened to CAIR's first office.

In March 1994, Awad said at Barry University in Florida, "I am in support of the Hamas movement more than the PLO," a reference to the Palestine Liberation Organization, which was widely seen as corrupt. Awad went on to say that Hamas and other Islamic movements were gaining popularity in the Middle East in part because they "respond to the daily needs of the people." He added, "There are radicals in every movement and every sect, but we have to look at the moderate side."

The statement came before Hamas had set off its first car bomb in Israel and more than a year before the United States designated it as a terrorist organization. Since then, CAIR has issued dozens of statements condemning terrorism.

But critics continue to cite the phrase "I am in support of the Hamas movement" as evidence that Awad supports a terrorist organization. He reiterated last week, "I don't support any organization that is designated by the State Department on the list of terrorism, and we respect the law."

Awad's original statement reflected a nuanced view common in the Middle East, said Prof. J. Andrew Overman of Macalester College, who leads study groups to the region.

A typical response from a Palestinian voter, Overman said, is "this suicide bomber stuff is insane, and I am scared to death that my 14-year-old son is going to be talked into being one. But the only way I can get penicillin for my son is from Hamas. So do I support Hamas? I do, but I do not support suicide bombing."

CAIR's critics cite other worries, though. One is that groups associated with it have been linked to terrorism-related activity. For example, after the Sept. 11 attacks, CAIR invited visitors to its website to help victims by contributing to a charity called the Holy Land Foundation. In December 2001 the United States blocked Holy Land's assets, saying it supported Hamas.

And the Islamic Association for Palestine, instrumental in launching CAIR, was found liable in a 2004 lawsuit in Chicago for contributing to the terrorist killing of a U.S. citizen by providing support to Hamas. Further, former CAIR employees and volunteers have been convicted on terrorism-related charges in Virginia and Texas.

Debate over CAIR has raged through Congress and courts. Voters in the Fifth District, which includes Minneapolis and nearby suburbs, are unlikely to resolve it.

Instead, their challenge will be to distinguish between issues and hardball politics, said John Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life in Washington.

"It would be legitimate for someone to say, 'I don't want to vote for Mr. Ellison because he gets support from CAIR, and I don't agree with CAIR,' " Green said. "But it would be quite another thing to say, "Because CAIR supports Ellison, then there's somehow a tie to terrorists.' That involves taking several steps for which there is probably no evidence."

Patrick Outpaces Two Rivals In New Poll Democrat Surges To A 21-point Lead As Vote Nears (BOS)

By Frank Phillips

The Boston Globe, September 17, 2006

Heading into the final days of the campaign, Deval Patrick has opened up a commanding lead in the Democratic race for governor, far outpacing his closest challenger, Christopher Gabrieli, and leaving Thomas F. Reilly a distant third, according to a new poll conducted for The Boston Globe and CBS4-TV.

Forty-six percent of those surveyed supported Patrick, 25 percent backed Gabrieli, and 18 percent were for Reilly in the poll of 523 likely voters in Tuesday's primary election. Only 6 percent said they were undecided, while 4 percent expressed support for other candidates in next Tuesday's election. The survey was taken Sept. 12-15 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percent.

The survey found voters shifted to Patrick in the last few weeks, despite the millions of dollars that Gabrieli and Reilly have spent on television advertising since late August. A Globe poll, taken Aug. 18-23, showed that the three were in a virtual dead heat, with Patrick at 31 percent, Gabrieli 30 percent, and Reilly 27 percent. In March, a similar poll gave Reilly a strong lead in the race.

Patrick took support from both of his rivals in the intervening weeks, though Reilly seems to have suffered the greatest, according to Andrew E. Smith, the director of the University of New Hampshire's Survey Center, which conducted the poll.

Smith said that Patrick has succeeded in building his support beyond his base of liberal, upper income, well-educated voters that made up the initial core of his coalition. Patrick, who began the race 18 months ago as a political novice who was virtually unknown to voters, now leads in almost all the categories of the primary electorate, the survey shows.

``Patrick has broadened his support across the board," Smith said.

He said Reilly, the state's two-term attorney general, and Gabrieli, a wealthy venture capitalist, lost ground partly because some of the moderate and conservative voters -- a group Smith says are less politically involved and less motivated to vote in a Democratic primary -- have decided not to participate in the election. Support for Reilly and Gabrieli is rooted among moderates and conservative Democrats and independents.

In contrast to the contest for the gubernatorial nomination, the three-way primary race for lieutenant governor appears to be wide open. Deborah Goldberg, the former chairwoman of the Brookline Board of Selectmen, received 26 percent support in the survey; Tim Murray, the mayor of Worcester, 20 percent; and business consultant Andrea Silbert, 18 percent. Twenty-seven percent are undecided.

But among those who say they will definitely vote, the race tightens. Goldberg and Murray both get 27 percent, and Silbert gets 16 percent. The margin of error for those 300 likely voters in the sample is about 5.5 percent.

In the only other Democratic contest, Secretary of State William F. Galvin, seeking his fourth term, is far out in front of his challenger, voting rights lawyer John Bonifaz, getting 45 percent support from the respondents. Bonifaz received only 7 percent, while 38 percent are undecided.

In the race for governor, voters seem to be making their decisions because they generally like the candidates or their overall philosophies, rather than basing the decision on the candidates' stances on specific policies. While all three candidates have different views on rolling back the income tax rate from 5.3 percent to 5 percent -- the most hotly debated issue in the race -- only 11 percent cited the issue as the reason for supporting their candidate.

The current survey found 70 percent of the Democratic primary view Patrick favorably, 9 percent unfavorably. The poll three weeks ago found Patrick with a 51 percent favorable, 10 percent unfavorable rating.

The voters' view of Reilly has dropped dramatically in the last weeks. Forty-two percent of those surveyed viewed Reilly favorably, down from 52 percent in the Globe's August poll. His unfavorable rating jumped from 24 percent to 38 percent. Most analysts, including his closest advisers, attribute Reilly's free-fall to his poor debate performance on Sept. 7, when he went on the attack against both Gabrieli and Patrick.

But the second televised debate, held Wednesday, in the middle of the four-day survey, did not seem to hurt Patrick, even though he was seen as defensive under questioning by Reilly and Gabrieli.

The poll also found that Reilly's strategy of drawing on union support does not appear to have worked. In a small sample of 88 respondents, Patrick holds a 3-to-1 margin over Reilly among those identifying themselves as living in union households. Reilly, who has portrayed himself as a champion of working middle class voters running against two multimillionaires, receives his strongest support from older voters, those with lower levels of income and lower levels of education, according to the survey.

Patrick gets his strongest support from liberals and those with incomes of $100,000 a year or more, those with postgraduate educations, and those with no religious preference. He is especially strong among respondents who say they are most interested in the race and those who say they will definitely vote on Tuesday.

But Patrick's broader appeal is evident in the views of Sonja Bryant of Waltham, a 51-year-old hospital worker and a registered Democrat. She said that Patrick's positions on issues such as housing, crime, education, and affirmative action appeal to her. ``He will be do something about the causes that affect my family, some of his causes are my causes," said Bryant, a survey respondent who agreed to be interviewed after the poll.

Bryant, an African-American woman who describes herself as a liberal, said she was impressed with Patrick's ability to rise from a poor childhood to jobs as a top Clinton administration official and later a corporate executive. ``If you're able to do that with from where you came from, you can do something for the state," she said.

Gabrieli, despite spending over $2 million in ads in the last three weeks, has actually dropped slightly since the August poll. The recent survey gives him a 59 percent favorable rating, up four percentage points from August, but his unfavorable rating rose from 14 percent to 17 percent. He drew slightly more support from those who identify themselves as conservatives, but trailed Patrick among moderates, a targeted group that Gabrieli was hoping to use as a base for victory. Gabrieli also is trailing Patrick by a significant margin among independents, another primary voting bloc that he is counting on to carry.

Gabrieli has portrayed himself as bi partisan and results oriented. ``I don't think he is one of the insiders," said Joe Rosseau, a survey respondent and partially retired state worker from Methuen, explaining why he is supporting Gabrieli.

Rosseau, a 63-year-old registered independent who describes himself as a conservative, said he considered Patrick ``seriously" but worries that he would not get state spending under control. He rejected Reilly because he felt had not done enough to investigate the Big Dig problems.

Rosseau says he is more concerned about the state controlling spending that an immediate income tax cut. Indeed, only 15 percent of those surveyed favor Reilly's position for an immediate rollback, while 48 percent support Gabrieli's plan for a phased in cutback. Patrick's position of keeping the tax at 5.3 percent gets support from 30 percent of the respondents.

Gabrieli's hope for overtaking Patrick may lie with those who say they are most likely to change their minds, the survey findings show. Greg Gullotti of Waltham, self-employed antiques dealer, said he has been divided over whether to vote for Patrick or Gabrieli, but is moving toward Gabrieli.

``I'm leaning in his direction, because he appears to have the sense of self-convictions and has a personality that he would not be swayed by the stress and potential political ramifications of any given situation," said Gullotti, a registered independent who said he generally votes for Democrats. ``He strikes me as a fair and even keeled administrator."

But Gullotti, 37, said he is also drawn to Patrick, but finds off-putting what many say is his strength as a candidate. ``He is a fresh face, with a fairly good track record," he said. ``And he is certainly charismatic and energetic, but that is finally what is turning me against him," Gullotti said. ``The more support Deval Patrick gets, the more he is talking like a politician."

Patrick was considered by the likely primary voters to be the strongest candidate for the Democrats to run against the Republican s' choice, Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey. Some 40 percent in the survey say he has the best chance of winning in November, while 22 percent name Gabrieli, and 19 percent, Reilly.

The August survey found that 37 percent of voters believed Reilly would be the strongest Democrat, with Patrick and Reilly trailing.

Also running in the general election are independent Christy Mihos and Green Rainbow Party candidate Grace Ross.

DOJ_NMG_0065031

Asked which of the candidates cares most about ``people like you," 38 percent of those questioned chose Patrick, 23 percent said Reilly, and 20 percent said Gabrieli. Asked which candidate had the best television ads, 36 percent chose Gabrieli, 26 percent said Patrick and 12 percent said Reilly.

Pawlenty And Hatch Are Tied At 42% (MINNST)

By Rochelle Olson, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 17, 2006

With the rivals having locked in their bases, winning support of undecided and independent voters will be crucial.

Gov. Tim Pawlenty and Attorney General Mike Hatch are entering the fall campaign facing an electorate evenly divided on their candidacies for governor, according to the latest Star Tribune Minnesota Poll.

Among the 820 likely voters surveyed statewide Wednesday through Friday, just after the state's primary election, DFLer Hatch and Republican Pawlenty are in a dead heat, each with 42 percent support. Independence Party candidate Peter Hutchinson has the support of 7 percent.

With less than two months before the Nov. 7 general election, Hatch and Pawlenty appear to have locked down their partisan bases and are battling for a smaller pool of independent and undecided voters.

The results mirror a Minnesota Poll on the governor's race in July that showed Pawlenty with 43 percent support and Hatch with 41 percent.

"We've known all along this was going to be a close race," Hatch's campaign manager Jon Youngdahl said Saturday. "How we are going to win this race is with a positive message."

Pawlenty spokesman Brian McClung said Saturday that another finding in the poll -- the governor's lead among independents -- is "good news and reflects his mainstream appeal and success at growing jobs and strengthening Minnesota's economy."

Hutchinson, a former Minneapolis schools superintendent, went from 5 percent to 7 percent in the latest poll. Although he still struggles with name recognition among voters, he says Pawlenty and Hatch have stalled.

"Roughly 20 percent of the voters are saying, 'I know them well and don't want them.' My job is still visibility," Hutchinson said as he headed off to a parade in Plymouth on Saturday. When voters see a third option, he said, "They're going to take it."

Candidates Ken Pentel and Walt Brown each registered only 1 percent.

The results of the poll have a margin of sampling error no greater than 3.4 percentage points, plus or minus.

Hatch and Pawlenty have secured their party faithful, according to the poll. Hatch has 85 percent of those who identify as Democrats. Pawlenty has 87 percent who identify as Republicans.

Meanwhile, Pawlenty has an edge over Hatch and Hutchinson among independents, according to the poll. Pawlenty gets 40 percent of those votes to 30 percent for Hatch and 13 percent for Hutchinson.

Hatch does best in Hennepin and Ramsey counties, with 47 percent of voters polled to 35 percent for Pawlenty and 8 percent for Hutchinson. Hatch and Pawlenty are at near parity for the other metro counties. a change from July.

In Anoka, Dakota, Scott, Washington and Carver counties, Pawlenty stands at 43 percent, while Hatch has 40 percent support. In July, the poll showed Pawlenty leading in those places 51 to 34 percent.

The governor's job-approval rating is unchanged since the July poll. He is at 54 percent now, compared with 55 percent then. About two in five voters rated him poorly in July; that number is at 41 percent now.

The poll also asked about the state's direction. Nearly half of voters, 48 percent, say Minnesota is headed in the right direction, while 42 percent say things are off on the wrong track.

Both Hatch and Pawlenty have a good image among likely voters. Fifty-three percent view Hatch favorably, compared with 50 percent for Pawlenty. The governor's unfavorable rating is 41 percent; Hatch's is 24 percent.

The good news for Hutchinson is that his name recognition is up from 27 percent in July to 37 percent now. But more than three-fifths of likely voters do not know his name.

Some voters' views

Some of those polled offered views on the candidates.

Lee Hammock is a Republican retiree from Hayfield who thinks Pawlenty is doing "a good job with what he's got." Hammock said he likes that Pawlenty signed a bill making it easier to get permits to carry handguns, but he thinks roads are falling apart.

Mike Carlson, an electrical engineer in Chaska who leans Republican, said he's not sure yet how to vote. "Hatch is probably a pretty good guy. Pawlenty, I don't think he's been doing that bad," he said.

Fred Ventura is an independent in Owatonna who works as a paraprofessional in schools and thinks the state is on the right track. "I'll probably vote for Tim Pawlenty. "He has a genuine interest in the education of the children. I don't think it's just lip service," Ventura said.

Peter Degeus of Rochester is an independent supporting Hatch. "I call our governor two-faced Tim, so I'm not voting for him," Degeus said. "He ran on this campaign pledge of no new taxes. Hennepin County's getting new taxes and they don't get to vote."

He was referring to the new sales tax for the Minnesota Twins ballpark. The state gave the county authority to levy it.

Degeus said he also supports gay rights. "I'm not gay. I don't know anyone who's gay, but it's got to do with taking away somebody's rights. That's what the Republican Party seems to about these days," he said.

Diane Weiss, a typist from Barnum, is also an independent concerned about gay rights and keeping abortion legal. She said she doesn't know who she will vote for and doesn't think Pawlenty has done too badly. But she's upset with him because he "tried to strong-arm Indian tribes into giving the state more money. I thought that showed a lack of integrity."

But Rebecca Grundhoefer, a Democrat from Foley, said the state is going in the wrong direction because of tight school and public safety budgets. She isn't sure who she will vote for, but she's not happy.

"You don't see any police," she said. "It kind of feels like we're on our own a lot out here, and that's kind of scary. It seems like so many things are eroding."

'Teflon Ed' Rendell Unbruised Despite Tough Year (PPG)

By Tom Barnes, Post-gazette Harrisburg Bureau

CAMPAIGN 2006 / GOVERNOR

HARRISBURG -- In his first four years in office, Gov. Ed Rendell pushed hard to increase the state income tax, signed the infamous legislative pay raise, failed to enact middle-class property tax relief and oversaw state budgets that regularly exceeded the inflation rate.

So his bid for re-election has to be in trouble, right?

Well, no. For months, the Democratic incumbent, who was mayor of Philadelphia in the 1990s, has led his Republican challenger, former Steeler Lynn Swann, by double digits in every poll.

"I call him 'Teflon Ed' because nothing bad seems to stick to him," said Clay Richards, director of the Quinnipiac Poll, which put Mr. Rendell up by 19 points recently.

"Rendell is the consummate politician," added Mr. Richards. "He can neutralize defeats and even use them to his advantage. He came into office promising property tax relief and he hasn't really delivered on it, but he's able to put the blame for that on the Legislature.

"Even though he signed the pay raise, he hasn't paid any political price for that, while many of the legislators who voted for it have been defeated."

Perhaps the highest-profile issue of Mr. Rendell's first term was the advent of 14 casinos in Pennsylvania, with as many as 61,000 one-armed bandits. The first ones could open early in 2007.

Politically, slots have been a two-edged sword. Gamblers are happy because they won't have to trek to Atlantic City casinos or racetracks in West Virginia or Delaware to get their slots kick. And the state's horse-racing industry is pleased because some of the revenue generated at casinos will go to boost prize money for thoroughbred and harness races and help the horse-breeding and agricultural industry.

But religious conservatives and others think easier access to slots will just increase gambling addiction and generate huge social costs.

There also have been complaints that the promise of $1 billion in slots revenue to lower property taxes has been too slow in coming and won't be fully realized until 2009 at the earliest. Even then, critics say, it won't help average homeowners that much, trimming most annual property tax burdens by only $200 to $250.

Mr. Rendell, 62, took office in January 2003 and spent his first 18 months pushing for Act 71, the slots law. It was finally enacted on July 4, 2004, and he signed it one day later.

In Western Pennsylvania, it authorized one slots parlor in Pittsburgh and another at The Meadows racetrack in Washington County, each with up to 5,000 slots. There also will be smaller casinos (with 500 slots each) at two resorts, Nemacolin Woodlands and Seven Springs.

While some skeptics claim Mr. Rendell is overestimating the $1 billion he expects to get from slots, he say he's sticking with his forecast once all 14 casinos are fully up and running.

In his television commercials, Mr. Rendell boasts that 200,000 low-income seniors already have had their property taxes eliminated as a result of the anticipated slots revenue, and more modest reductions for the bulk of the state's seniors already have been enacted.

High-energy booster

One reason for Mr. Rendell's steady lead in the polls is his high level of energy and savvy use of the power of incumbency. Not bad for a guy who's 62 and fighting his weight. Last week he checked in at a hefty 257 pounds.

He has been tireless in flying around the commonwealth, handing out checks for local economic development projects.

Asked once what's the best perk about being governor, he quipped, "The plane."

Sometimes he even crisscrosses the entire state in one day -- hitting a breakfast in Pittsburgh and a dinner in Philadelphia, for example.

Much of what he doles out comes from the $650 million state capital fund, something all governors have used. But he also persuaded the Republican-controlled Legislature two years ago to approve a $1.3 billion economic stimulus package, another source of bond funds (i.e., borrowed money) to pay for projects.

The list of booster projects is seemingly endless: a new museum in downtown Hershey about the life of chocolate king Milton Hershey; the expansion of a museum dedicated to author James Michener near Philadelphia; Civil War trails near Gettysburg; a photographic equipment plant in Allentown; a music academy in Lancaster; a Dupont plant in Bradford County; a biomedical plant in Montgomery County, and many more.

In the Pittsburgh area, Mr. Rendell developed "Plan B" for ensuring the financing of a new $290 million multi-purpose arena for hockey and other events. He also agreed to advance the city and county $26.5 million to do site preparation work for a new arena.

At a recent Allegheny County Democratic picnic, Mr. Rendell had to correct County Chief Executive Dan Onorato when he thanked the governor for giving the county "about $1 billion."

"It's $1.1 billion," Mr. Rendell said, adding the Allegheny County share is the highest of any county.

That comment was aimed at deflecting criticism from Republicans who are fond of jibing that Mr. Rendell is "the governor of Philadelphia."

They cite items such as Mr. Rendell having state troopers patrol state roads in Philadelphia and help the city reduce costs; advancing planning funds for a major expansion of the city's 13-year-old convention center; and the $42 million from the state for a new Comcast skyscraper being built in Philadelphia.

Republicans claim Mr. Rendell has a conflict of interest on the latter item because he earns $20,000 a year as a Comcast football commentator on Sundays after Philadelphia Eagles games. Mr. Rendell said he donates the money to charity and said he saved several thousand Comcast jobs from going to New Jersey. Pointing out that state troopers patrol state roads in Pittsburgh and all other cities, the governor said he was merely putting Philadelphia on the same footing.

Working the crowd

One reason Mr. Rendell is a successful politician is that he genuinely seems at home in a crowd of people, even those he hardly knows.

At public events like the Harrisburg Farm Show each January, he wolfs down sausages and milk shakes as he shakes the hands of hundreds of show-goers. It's the same gregariousness he's displayed throughout his 30-year political career, which included eight years as Philadelphia district attorney and two terms as mayor of the city, a time when he garnered national attention for turning the economy of the city around. His success as mayor, and as a fund-raiser, led to Mr. Rendell serving as Democratic national committee chairman in 2000-01.

He showed the same affability in late August, when he went to two African-American churches in East Liberty to deliver a short secular sermon.

The pastor of Pentecostal Temple Church of God in Christ, the Rev. Loran Mann, a former television reporter, gave the governor a warm introduction, calling him "my friend" and thanking him for "naming me last year to the commission that sets policy for public television in the state."

A few blocks away, Mr. Rendell walked up to the pulpit of the St. James AME Church to the sound of hands clapping, tambourines banging and voices raised in shouts of "Amen" and "Praise Jesus."

"My core belief is that government can and should do things that make a difference in people's lives and take care of our vulnerable citizens, older people, poor people and young people," he said.

He listed what he considers his proudest achievements as governor: increasing state funding for public schools, for tutoring in math, pre-kindergarten education and all-day kindergarten; funds to put laptop computers in all high school classrooms within four years; for not cutting anyone off welfare rolls despite decreased federal funding; raising more money through Lottery sales to increase drug coverage for senior citizens; trying to reduce gun violence by limiting handgun sales to one per month.

He said Republicans are always "yelling about Democrats spending money. Well, we're not just spending money. We're spending money to improve education and that is investing in our future."

Mr. Rendell might have been expected to be at a political disadvantage in Pittsburgh's black neighborhoods, since Mr. Swann is black, lives in Allegheny County and remains popular among sports fans from his starring days as a receiver with the Steelers' Super Bowl teams of the 1970s.

But St. James choir member Genie Beckom said that even though she and Mr. Swann are black, it was Mr. Swann's political party that she had a problem with.

"I personally wouldn't put any Republican in the governor's office," she said. "It's not to the advantage of my race. Republicans are about cutting back on things we need, such as health care, welfare and education."

Sylvia Allen, another St. James member, also likes Mr. Rendell, saying of Mr. Swann, "I'm not getting the feeling he's tuned in to us [African Americans] or connected to our problems. He's of a different status."

Obviously Mr. Rendell is pleased about his continuing lead in the polls, but when talking to supporters he downplays it, noting that in 2002, he trailed his Democratic primary opponent, then-Auditor General Robert P. Casey Jr., but came back to win the Democratic nomination for governor.

"No poll three months before an election means a thing," he told an Allegheny County Democratic picnic three weeks ago. "Don't get complacent. Work like heck. This is our year if we don't get overconfident."

Taylor, Perdue Talk The Talk Of Tax Cuts (AJC)

By Jim Galloway, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 17, 2006

Tax cuts became the language of the race for governor on Saturday, as Democratic nominee Mark Taylor vowed to eliminate the state property tax on more than 2.5 million Georgia homeowners.

Lifting the .25 mills now assessed by the state would force a $76 million cut in the state's annual budget, and would average $30 a year per homeowner — the amount varying according to the value of each house.

"There's one tax-cutter running for governor, and you're looking at him. The big guy likes big tax cuts," Taylor told several hundred screaming delegates attending the annual state Democratic Party convention in College Park.

Local government and school taxes make up the largest part of property taxes on Georgia homes. Campaign spokesman Rick Dent admitted that eliminating the state's share wouldn't have a huge impact on most taxpayers' household budgets.

"We won't say that it's a lot, but it's more than they've gotten from Sonny Perdue in four years. And it doesn't mean that's where [Taylor] is going to stop," Dent said.

Only days earlier, Republican incumbent Sonny Perdue, before a similar gathering of his own partisans, promised to eliminate the state income tax on retirement income — from pension funds and investments — for Georgians older than 65.

Perdue's cut would cost the state $142 million a year, and apply to between 250,000 and 400,000 people.

Derrick Dickey, a spokesman for Perdue, belittled Taylor's property tax proposal — pointing out that the Democrat was also promising increases in state spending on health insurance for children and education.

"He will no doubt promise every Georgian a Porsche and a shiny new toaster by Election Day," Dickey said on Saturday.

Neither Taylor nor Perdue offered budget cuts to offset their proposed reductions in state income. However, after three years of tight budgets, a strengthening economy and increased tax collections have resulted in a significant surplus.

The one-day gathering of Democrats was a chance for party activists to see the statewide and congressional candidates they had nominated in sometimes fierce primary battles over the summer.

Trying to broaden support base

As each candidate spoke, a common theme was the need for Democrats — ousted from power in the state Capitol in 2002 and 2004 — to broaden their base of support.

"Even if we turn out every Democratic vote, that will not be enough. We have to reach out to every independent, every Libertarian. Democrats have to move away from their comfort zone," said state Labor Commissioner Michael Thurmond, who faces Republican Brent Brown in November.

A platform passed by the convention backed positions staked out by Taylor, including a call to help local governments build more jail space in order to keep more violent offenders off the street.

The party platform took several shots at Perdue, with references to news reports of 2005 legislation sponsored by a business associate and state legislator that gave the governor a $100,000 tax deferral on a land sale.

"Public officials should not use their office for private enrichment," the platform reads, adding that future governors should be required to place their holdings in a blind trust.

Perdue also was a major foil for Taylor — on the issue of tax cuts.

"Sonny Perdue gave Georgia corporations a billion-dollar tax cut. But you didn't get a tax cut.

"He could find the money for corporations, but he couldn't find the money for you. How did Sonny pay for his corporate giveaway? He cut your local schools by over $1 billion," Taylor said.

A spokesman for Perdue pointed out that the Republican governor had permanently extended the homestead exemption on property taxes, worth $434 million in the state's 2007 budget.

Taylor noted that Perdue had tried unsuccessfully to eliminate that exemption, which would have resulted in an increase in property taxes, when he first became governor in 2003.

Blue America, In More Ways Than One (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

In this autumn of their discontent, Republicans tremble as November nears. But now comes yet another book by a gloomy liberal anticipating permanent Republican dominance. Thomas B. Edsall of The New Republic, in "Building Red America: The New Conservative Coalition and the Drive for Permanent Power," argues that inexorable social forces, augmented by the conservatives' superior reservoirs of anger, ruthlessness and cynicism -- he neglects only the word "wickedness" -- favor Republicans, "the party of the socially and economically dominant."

The parties are almost at numerical parity, but Edsall, who until recently was a Washington Post political reporter, says Republicans represent people "more broadly skilled in economic combat" and "more accustomed to the rigors of the market." Hence Republicans can maintain "a thin but durable margin of victory." Their technique is "the symbolic manipulation of controversial sociocultural issues touching upon national security, patriotism, race, sex, and religion."

"The GOP," Edsall laments, "has achieved a gradual erosion of the popular consensus behind the major progressive and social-egalitarian movements of the twentieth century." But what actually "achieved" that? Edsall says the principal Republican objective has been to break "the trust . . . between the government and millions of its less advantaged citizens." But he acknowledges that Republicans have been helped "inestimably" by "the daily inefficiencies of government": "The monopoly nature of government guarantees that the public services will often lag in quality behind those delivered in the competitive private sector." Hence "the declining credibility of non-market solutions to economic problems" and the demoralization of "backers of a redistributive agenda."

Edsall complains that conservatives pursue an agenda that does not have the public's "decisive support." Whatever that means, liberals such as Edsall are ineligible to make that complaint. They increasingly have abandoned persuasion and legislation and resorted to litigation and judicial fiats to advance an agenda the public finds unpersuasive.

If Edsall is symptomatic, liberalism is lost in a time warp, thinking in antiquated categories. Edsall approvingly quotes a Democratic activist's opinion that there are twice as many angry conservatives as there are angry liberals: "Liberals by their very nature don't get as angry as conservatives do." Edsall, who evidently has not noticed the vitriol of the liberal blogosphere, is so blinded by his own anger he misperceives Republican realities.

The GOP, he says, courts whites "whose interests are overwhelmingly focused on tempering, if not altogether rolling back, the civil rights movement." Please. Who favors rolling back guarantees of voting rights and equal access to public accommodations?

If Edsall really thinks Republicans are marching efficiently in lock step, he has missed bitter intraparty arguments about spending, immigration and nation-building. Edsall says the conservative agenda is "to dismantle the welfare state." Oh? With a prescription drug entitlement that is the largest expansion of the welfare state since enactment of Medicare in 1965? With a 38 percent increase in discretionary domestic spending unrelated to homeland security -- including a 135 percent increase in the Education Department's budget -- since 2001?

When Edsall says middle- and working-class cultural conservatives vote for Republicans who then use their power "for noncultural objectives," he is voicing a familiar liberal lament: All would be well if voters would vote based on important issues -- material, economic concerns; their wallets -- rather than unimportant ones such as abortion, the definition of marriage, the coarsening of the culture and other moral anxieties. But if those issues are unimportant, why is it that liberals, adamantly supporting partial-birth abortion and celebrating judicial redefinitions of marriage, are so uncompromising about them? As Edsall says, liberalism has become bifurcated. The largest faction looks to government for material help. But the socially liberal "post-materialist" cadre "overwhelmingly sets" the party's agenda.

Edsall notes that one-third of American children -- and almost 70 percent of African American children -- are born to unmarried mothers. Then, in an astonishing passage about this phenomenon, which is the cause of most social pathologies, from crime to schools that cannot teach, he explains how Americans differ concerning what he calls "freedom from the need to maintain the marital or procreative bond."

"To social conservatives," he writes, "these developments have signaled an irretrievable and tragic loss. Their reaction has fueled, on the right, a powerful traditionalist movement and a groundswell of support for the Republican Party. To modernists, these developments constitute, at worst, the unfortunate costs of progress, and, at best -- and this is very much the view on the political left as well as of Democratic Party loyalists -- they constitute a triumph over unconscionable obstacles to the liberation and self-realization of much of the human race."

At Ford, Restructuring Now Job 1 (WT)

By Sean Lengell, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

When he stepped down this month as Ford Motor Co.'s president and chief executive, Bill Ford Jr. acknowledged the ailing, 103-year-old automaker must reinvent itself to survive in an increasingly competitive industry.

With the company announcing a deeper and accelerated restructuring plan Friday, it's obvious the auto giant's new chief executive, Alan Mulally, formerly executive vice president of Boeing, will lead a leaner, smaller and possibly more focused automaker.

But will that be enough?

"Right now, with so many variables, I would have to say the jury's still out," said Jeff Schuster, automotive analyst with J.D. Power and Associates, a global marketing information services firm. "I don't think Ford is going to disappear. ... But they will not recover that ground they've lost in the marketplace.

"So the question is: Can they operate profitably and can they have the image they once had? And I think it's all possible."

The road won't be simple or easy.

The company founded by Mr. Ford's great-grandfather, Henry Ford, lost $1.4 billion during the first half of the year. It is under pressure from Wall Street to make more cuts and roll out new cars and trucks more quickly.

Ford on Friday announced it was cutting more than 10,000 additional salaried jobs, offering buyouts to all of its 75,000 U.S. hourly workers and shutting down two more plants than previously announced.

The cuts are on top of Ford's previous plans to close 14 plants and will reduce its North American work force by almost one-third.

About 6,500 of the 82,000 Ford workers represented by the UAW have taken buyout and early-retirement offers made earlier this year, mainly at plants slated for closure.

The announcement came after the board of directors met for two days last week to discuss plans to cut jobs and shut factories at a rate faster than previously planned.

Wall Street didn't think the moves were enough, sending Ford shares down nearly 12 percent Friday to $8.02 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The cuts have the UAW's blessing.

"Once again, our members are stepping up to make hard choices under difficult circumstances," UAW President Ron Gettelfinger said.

Blurry focus

The biggest challenge for Ford is simple, analysts say: Produce cars and trucks the public wants.

Ford's U.S. vehicle sales in August dropped 11.6 percent from a year earlier as the market continued to shift away from trucks and sport utility vehicles. Sales of SUVs and trucks, which the automaker has depended on for most of its revenue, fell 20.8 percent, compared with August 2005.

"Ford is really in the middle of a crisis right now that has been unfolding for some time," said Charlie Hughes, former head of North American operations for Land Rover and Mazda. "Certainly, the seeds of the problems were sown before [Mr. Ford] took over."

Ford had success in the 1980s with smaller cars such as the Escort and particularly the Taurus, which sold nearly 7 million vehicles during the past 20 years and had a longer run as the country's top seller than the Model T.

The company's F-series pickups and high-end sport utility vehicles also sold well from the 1990s through last year.

"Ford has three pillars of profitability, and they're all trucks: full-size pickups, full-size sport utilities and midsize sport utilities," said John Wolkonowicz, an automotive analyst with Global Insight, an automotive research and consulting firm. "Those are the products that make up about 100 percent of Ford's corporate profitability."

But they aren't enough to sustain the company, industry analysts say.

And with the SUV and pickup market as competitive as ever, and higher gasoline prices slowing sales of larger vehicles, Ford's future profitability remains in question.

"They're not producing very many products that get the consumer very excited," Mr. Wolkonowicz said. "When you have a product that the customer gets excited about, they beat a path to your showroom."

'Late in the game'

With the exception of the popular Mustang, the company's car lineup has been devoid of top sellers that can help offset slowing sales in the SUV and truck divisions.

"The market is much more competitive, and the margin of error is just so much smaller than it was, so you really can't afford to make any mistakes in terms of product," Mr. Schuster said. "Right now, that's the difference between Ford's position and GM's position; GM is showing some progress on the product side, and while at Ford there have been some bright spots, if you look at their whole [vehicle] lineup, they're lacking in that area with what the market has shifted toward."

The company turned to a large incentive and rebate program in an effort to attract customers.

"Ford is selling cars at incredible incentives and rebates with zero-percent financing and all these things that in my opinion tends to devalue the brand," said Laurie Harbour-Felax, a manufacturing analyst who specializes in the automotive and aerospace industries.

The company has high expectations for its new CUV, or cross-utility vehicle, called the Edge -- a smaller, more fuel-efficient version of larger SUVs.

"CUVs really are where the market is going, and Ford is a little bit late in the game," Mr. Schuster said.

Still, the Edge, scheduled to hit the showrooms later this year, has potential to be a big winner for Ford, analysts say.

"This will be an important vehicle for Ford," Mr. Schuster said.

Partnership options

A merger of Ford with another automaker, similar to the German-American partnership of DaimlerChrysler, remains a possibility.

"Mr. Ford himself said that a merger is something he would certainly entertain," Mr. Wolkonowicz said. "And I don't think you'd need to limit it to a European company."

Automakers Renault SA and Nissan Motor Co. are interested in purchasing a significant stake in Ford rival General Motors. A similar partnership with an Asian automaker "could help" Ford, Mr. Wolkonowicz said.

Others aren't so sure, saying a joint venture with another automaker would do little to cure Ford's ills.

"Would a merger help? In my opinion, no, because the issues they face are things that they need to clean up within the company," Mr. Hughes said.

A less formal relationship, such as the partnership between Japan's Nissan and France's Renault, is more likely, Mrs. Harbour-Felax said.

Ford was reported this summer to be considering taking the company private, but on Friday denied it was entertaining that option.

"I wouldn't rule anything out," Mrs. Harbour-Felax said. "These guys surprise me every day."

Expand or streamline?

Rather than expanding through a merger, many specialists say Ford instead should streamline its product line, which they say is bogged down with too many poor sellers. It already is getting out of the minivan business.

Mr. Hughes said Ford overextended itself by acquiring so many companies over the years, which muddied the automaker's focus and diluted its image.

Ford has sought a buyer for its Aston Martin division. Some analysts add the company also should consider eliminating some other properties, which include Land Rover, Mazda, Volvo, Jaguar and its American icon Lincoln-Mercury line.

"The world we live in today is an oversaturated world. There are too many brands and too many products which are not distinguishable," Mr. Hughes said.

Ford must focus on strengthening its identity and image by producing more signature products such as the Mustang and F-series trucks, Mr. Hughes said. It also must do a better job branding and marketing those products.

He added the company should focus on its Ford, Volvo and Jaguar lines because each is a well-known worldwide brand.

"A signature product should be an extension of what the brand promises. It can't be something you stick a badge on at the end," Mr. Hughes said. "To set yourself apart in the marketplace, you have to stand for something. And whatever you stand for has to permeate in every bit of the company -- in everything you do."

Ford officials Friday made a point of saying that the exclusive Jaguar brand would not be sold.

"Jaguar is not for sale, and we'll let you know if that changes," Mark Schulz, president of Ford's international operations, said during a conference call with analysts after the restructuring announcement.

Selling off divisions may be a tough call for Ford because the company has invested heavily in "commonalization," a process of sharing parts and designs among many car platforms.

"So to sell off one of those brands I think poses some challenges for Ford if they want to move forward," Mrs. Harbour-Felax said. "The reason the Japanese are beating us is they have common platforms and common components that you can share."

Cutting costs

No matter what restructuring path Ford takes, the company will have fewer employees, factories and expenses in coming years.

The company announced in January a "Way Forward" restructuring plan intended to restore it to profitability by 2008. The plan called for $5.5 billion to $6 billion in cuts companywide, primarily centering on reduced hourly labor costs. As many as 30,000 jobs may be cut and 14 facilities closed by 2012.

Ford accelerated those plans in July when the Japanese automaker Toyota Motor Corp. outsold Ford in the U.S. for the first month ever.

On Friday, Ford announced it was cutting an additional 10,000 salaried jobs and closing two more plants.

Despite the cuts, relations between Ford and its unions may not be as frosty as in the past. Industry specialists say there seems to be a willingness in the UAW and other auto-related unions to work with Ford on drafting long-range plans to save the company.

"The unions seem to realize that it's in their best interest to at least try to be part of a solution and not hold steady to a position that is just outdated," Mr. Schuster said.

Mr. Mulally is an aggressive leader not shy to make cuts. He cut or outsourced some 50,000 positions at Boeing, his former company, and streamlined its product line.

His tactics paid off, and Mr. Mulally is credited with turning around the once-struggling airplane manufacturer.

"If anyone has a chance to turn around Ford, it's him," said Richard Aboulafia, an aviation analyst with the Teal Group. "He's got tremendous success. He's got virtually limitless energy, a lot of charisma -- he's a great leader."

'No time to waste'

Still, the challenges Mr. Mulally faces at Ford are daunting.

"A lot of people have tried to change the Big Three and failed," Mr. Aboulafia said.

And Ford lacks a key executive who can foster product development and branding, Mr. Schuster said.

"Ford is only halfway there," he said. "They have the turnaround guy. They don't have a product guy."

Product development in the industry is a laboriously slow process, typically taking five years or more from conception to production. But whatever changes occur must be done quickly, analysts say.

"Nobody in this industry has any time to sit back and be patient," Mrs. Harbour-Felax said. "Things [in the automotive industry] are moving almost as rapidly as the computer industry.

"There's no time to waste."

Richards 'Never Gave Up On Texas,' Clinton Says (DMN)

Tearful leader praises former governor while crowd lines up to pay respects

AP Cecile Richards, daughter of former Texas Gov. Ann Richards, escorts former President Bill Clinton past her mother's flag-draped casket to introduce him to family members during a ceremony in the Capitol Rotunda.

AUSTIN – Former President Bill Clinton wiped away tears as he stood near his friend Ann Richards' flag-draped casket at the Texas Capitol on Saturday, describing a woman with "big hair, big bright eyes, big blinding smile ... big heart and big dreams."

"We loved her," he said of the former Texas governor. "We loved her because we knew she loved us, and because she made us bigger. ... I love that she never gave up on Texas."

Nearby, her granddaughter Lily Adams, whom Ms. Richards bragged about in her famous speech at the 1988 Democratic convention, cried as she hugged the flag that was flying over the Texas Capitol on the day Ms. Richards died – a gift from Gov. Rick Perry.

DOJ_NMG_0065039

A friend of Bill and Hillary Clinton for three decades, Ms. Richards, 73, died of esophageal cancer at her home in Austin on Wednesday. Mr. Clinton joined the Richards family Saturday in escorting the casket to the rotunda; Ms. Richards' body is lying in state there over the weekend.

Somber setting

Her painted portrait, draped by a black scarf, hangs among those of myriad male governors, a few frames away from the painting of the only other female Texas governor, Ma Ferguson.

Sprays of white tulips and lilies on either side of her casket adorned the intimate elegance of the rotunda, in the center of the Capitol. It's where tour groups usually gather to take pictures and listen to their voices bounce off the marble floors and up inside the massive dome.

A Richards family friend, advertising executive Roy Spence, contributed short scaffolds with more than two dozen images of Ms. Richards: arms in the air during a speech, shaking hands with supporters, beaming her megawatt smile in almost all of them.

Outside, Texans from all over the state stood in line, waiting to pay their respects to the governor they said made an immeasurable impact on their lives – as friends, as strangers, as women and minorities and children and grandparents.

"I was in the front line when Ann took the governor's office. I walked up Congress Avenue that day," said Austin resident Melissa Gonzales, who came with her 13-year-old daughter, Elena Gonzales-Melinger. "It was kind of important for me to be here when she was back in the Capitol, as sad as it is. And it's nice that it's the same color line. It's all women, and women of color."

Inside the building, a small group of Ms. Richards' loved ones listened as Mr. Clinton spoke for about eight minutes about his "spontaneous, unedited, earthy and hilarious" friend.

Then he walked over to the casket, touched the Texas flag draped over it, bowed his head, and then nodded and began comforting her friends and family members.

In the balcony overhead, the Conspirare Children's Choir of Austin sang a somber, melodic version of "Sing a Song," a tune first performed by The Carpenters for an episode of Sesame Street, with lyrics that seemed written for Ms. Richards.

Mr. Clinton, who struggled to compose himself as the casket was brought out of the hearse and into the Capitol, was escorted through the building by Ms. Richards' daughter Cecile Richards.

Ms. Richards' daughter Ellen and son Daniel cried as they thanked him for being a friend and honorary pallbearer.

Mr. Perry and his wife, Anita, greeted the family in a private gathering in the lieutenant governor's meeting room before attending Mr. Clinton's remarks in the rotunda.

It took Mr. Clinton several seconds to control his emotions and start speaking. He told of a woman of inspiration, fire and humor, and, as most do, he had stories.

In New York a few years ago, Ms. Richards invited him to lunch. At the table were Billy Crystal, Robin Williams, Diane Sawyer, friend Liz Smith and a few others.

After two hours of laughing so hard he was crying, Mr. Clinton said, he thought to himself, "I bet this is the first time in their lives that Billy Crystal and Robin Williams have been the second- and third-funniest people at the table."

"I've had three people tell me since she died that they only wish they had written down every single thing she ever said," he said.

Saturday was the first time the public was able to pay respects to the popular governor. Austin resident Bobby Adcock was there at 7 a.m. to be first in line. By 9 a.m., the crowd was lined up around the side of the building.

The closed-casket public visitation lasts through today.

'Wonderful person'

"I appointed myself as Ann's stalker many years ago," said Ms. Adcock, a retired state employee who has a framed, autographed picture she says she'll "cherish for the rest of my life."

"Every time I saw her I'd say, 'Hey, Annie! Go get 'em!' I just really loved her," Ms. Adcock said. "I admired her for what she stood for, her integrity, her honesty, her wit. She was a wonderful, wonderful person."

Students from Austin school bands paid her a tribute before a scheduled parade down Congress Avenue. People left flowers – yellow roses, mostly – and candles and notes of admiration next to the Capitol steps.

Marjorie and Jaime Garcia of Corpus Christi were in town visiting. "We admired her for years. I never met her, but every time she came on TV, we would watch her," Ms. Garcia said. "This is my chance to honor a great lady."

Former Texas Governor Richards Lies In Repose (WP/AP)

By April Castro, Associated Press

Clinton Recalls the Champion of a 'New Texas' as a Woman With 'Big Dreams'

AUSTIN, Sept. 16 -- Former president Bill Clinton on Saturday tearfully escorted the flag-draped casket of former governor Ann Richards into the state Capitol, where she will lie in repose for two days until her funeral and burial.

Clinton delivered poignant and at times funny recollections of the woman he called "spontaneous, unedited, earthy, hilarious."

He told mourners about a lunch he shared in New York with a group that included Richards.

"I thought to myself, I bet this is the only time in their entire lives that Billy Crystal and Robin Williams are the second- and third-funniest people at the table," he said, drawing chuckles from misty-eyed family members.

Richards, the Democrat known for her big, frosty-white hair and sharp wit, died Wednesday at the age of 73 from esophageal cancer.

"In this case, goodbye is also a celebration, because of the big things that Ann Richards did," Clinton said.

Clinton called Richards "Texas on parade."

"For 30-plus years, that is certainly what she was to me and Hillary," he said. "First she was big: big hair, big bright eyes, big blinding smile. She also had a big heart, big dreams, did big deeds."

During her one term as governor, from 1991 to 1995, she championed what she called the "New Texas," appointing more women and minorities to state posts than any of her predecessors.

Clinton described the world that Richards wanted for her grandchildren as one "where young girls grew up to be scientists, engineers, police officers and teachers . . . where the dreams and the spirit were as big as the sky in her beloved home."

When Clinton finished speaking, Richards's daughter Ellen thanked him for "all the great times that you shared with our mom."

Clinton paused for a moment beside the casket, then greeted family members, hugging or shaking hands with each one in attendance. At one point, he bent down to comfort Richards's 8-year-old grandson Wyatt, who broke down in sobs.

The Academic Blues (NYT)

By Michael Bérubé

DOJ_NMG_0065041

So far as I know, my department, like many university departments of English, consists of wall-to-wall Democrats. If my faculty colleagues have any good words to say about George Bush's fiscal or foreign policies, they're keeping them to themselves.

Every year around this time, you'll hear complaints about the liberal campus elite — usually from the political right, one wing of which has talked itself into believing that, as George Will phrased it in The Washington Post two years ago, "Many campuses are intellectual versions of one-party nations — except such nations usually have the merit, such as it is, of candor about their ideological monopolies." The political tilt of American college faculties is a fact well established, though the actual ratio of liberals to conservatives — just under 3 to 1, according to the most comprehensive survey, conducted by U.C.L.A. researchers — is routinely exaggerated (10 to 1! 20! 30!) by those who believe that we liberals are actively conspiring to keep dissenting voices off the faculty roster. But the truth is that no one knows what the applicant pool looks like. For all we know, in the arts and humanities (and even some of the biological sciences), the number of bright young conservative aspirants may be no greater than it is for your average Broadway production of "Torch Song Trilogy." But charges of pervasive "liberal bias" on campus tend to play better than demographic reports on how young conservatives go about choosing their career paths, so every year the preponderance of Democrats in English departments is trotted out as if it were a decisive refutation of everything for which liberalism claims to stand.

Last year, legislators in my home state, Pennsylvania, were so perturbed by reports of liberal bias that they created a House committee on academic freedom to determine whether conservative students were subject to discrimination at Pennsylvania's public universities. In one way, the very formation of the committee was a triumph for conservative culture warriors — in particular, the conservative culture warrior David Horowitz, who has spent the past three years promoting his "Academic Bill of Rights," which seeks to protect students from "biased" courses and lecturers. But the committee also dealt a blow to Horowitz's campaign: in his own testimony to the committee, Horowitz himself admitted that he had no evidence for his claim that a Penn State biology professor subjected his class to Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 9/11" on the eve of the 2004 election, and Penn State revealed that it had received all of 13 student complaints about political "bias" over the past five years — on a campus with a student population of 40,000. Those 13 complaints didn't fit any clear red-blue pattern either: a Muslim student suggested that a professor was disrespectful to Islam; another student said that a professor was too conservative.

Last February, Horowitz also published "The Professors: The 101 Most Dangerous Academics in America," a book in which I was pleased to be included — until I learned that the dangerous were merely listed alphabetically, and that I was not assigned a rank or degree of dangerosity. And every so often, someone on the academic left does Horowitz and company the favor of saying something foolish or simply outrageous about 9/11 or Iraq, and the grist meets the mill once again.

Whenever that happens, people lose sight of two critical features of campus life. The first is that most cases of "politically correct" limits on student speech do not involve radical teachers in the classroom; rather, they tend to arise from clashes between students and university administrations, as when a Penn State art student was told by a campus gallery that he could not exhibit his paintings of various Palestinian leaders, which he'd titled "Portraits of Terror" (a decision later reversed). Sometimes, when college administrations and student-affairs offices ask that everyone treat everyone else with civility and respect (whether out of liberal convictions, or a simple desire to keep the boat from rocking), they do it incompetently or counterproductively. But those episodes are not the work of Dangerous Professors.

The second is that classroom dynamics are more dynamic than most accounts admit. In a discussion of Richard Powers's novel "Prisoner's Dilemma," I had a student who insisted that the wartime internment of Japanese-Americans was perfectly justified; in a class on bioethics, a colleague of mine had a student who complained that the class wasn't doing justice to all the benefits of experimenting on unwitting human subjects. There is no easy way for professors to handle these remarks, no matter what their political convictions; all we know is that we must try to treat our students fairly — and try to make sure their peers treat them fairly, a far more difficult task — even when they say things we might consider uninformed or obnoxious, no matter where on the ideological spectrum those remarks might fall.

Every responsible teacher should think of the classroom as a relatively safe space, free of intimidation or coercion. But in return, every responsible student should realize that the classroom is only relatively safe, because arguing about ideas isn't risk-free. Of course, students sometimes have qualms about taking classes with overtly partisan professors. "As conservatives," Julie Aud, a student at the University of Indiana and press secretary for her chapter of the College Republicans, told CBS News, "we should never have to feel uncomfortable in the classroom because of our beliefs." Perhaps so, but as students, you should expect to feel uncomfortable about your beliefs as a matter of course — that is, if your professors are doing their job properly, and keeping the floor open for every reasonable form of debate and disagreement.

U.S. Asks Finance Chiefs To Limit Iran's Access To Banks (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

DOJ_NMG_0065042

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

SINGAPORE, Sept. 16 — The United States pressed the top finance officials of the world's leading industrial nations on Saturday to crack down on what Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. said was the exploitation of their banking systems by at least 30 Iranian front companies involved in illicit activities.

Mr. Paulson said he had told the finance and economic ministers that the front companies were identified by American intelligence agencies as funneling money to terrororist groups using banks in Europe and elsewhere, many of them "blue chip banks."

Mr. Paulson said that many leading trading companies in Iran with legitimate business operations were also involved in the illicit activities, and that it behooved any legitimate bank to realize that it was risky to continue doing even legitimate business with the companies.

He called on banks around the world to be "vigilant" in opposing such risks and to avoid "inadvertently facilitating the kinds of activities that they wouldn't want to facilitate."

"Iran is a country that has broad, deep and commercial relationships with much of the world that have gone on for some time," Mr. Paulson told reporters here. "This was nothing more than an educational briefing to prepare financial institutions for dealing with some of the risks that are out there."

He said banks around the world also needed to stop doing business with North Korea, but added that North Korea was already almost entirely isolated from the world's financial system. By contrast, Iran is still a major player globally.

The Treasury chief's comments came after he met with his counterparts from Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Canada, Japan and the European Union, who had come for the annual gathering of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

The comments appeared to reflect the emerging Bush administration strategy on Iran as efforts to impose sanctions by the United Nations Security Council have faltered.

The administration charges that Iran has a secret nuclear weapons program, a charge that Iran denies. Iran is also accused of transferring funds to Hezbollah and other Islamic militant organizations through regular commercial banks.

Last week, in what administration officials call a major escalation in the effort to squeeze Iran economically, the Treasury Department announced that Bank Saderat, a major bank in Iran, would no longer have even indirect access to the United States financial system.

Banking experts say that the decree means that Iran will have difficulty selling anything for dollars through Bank Saderat, because any commercial exchange that uses dollars normally obtains them from an American bank. Oil in particularly is always traded in dollars. Many banking experts say the administration may make other banks off-limits soon.

After the announcement on Bank Saderat, two senior Treasury officials visited Europe to try to persuade regulators and banks to stop doing business with Bank Saderat and any other banks that are alleged to be involved in illicit activities. Some European banks have already curtailed their activities with Iran, but many leading banks have refused.

Stuart Levey, under secretary of the Treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence, visited Britain, France, Switzerland, Italy and Germany, and the deputy Treasury secretary, Robert Kimmitt, went to Germany. France, Italy and Germany have extensive commercial relations with Iran and its trading companies.

The Treasury Department has declined to say whom they met with.

Iran was only one of many subjects in Mr. Paulson's meetings with the finance ministers. Also on the agenda was a discussion of the world economy, which Mr. Paulson said had grown in recent years at rates that he and others had not seen in a generation. Despite that, he acknowledged risks arising from the failure of recent global trade talks, high energy prices and the problem of what are called "economic imbalances."

That phrase is a euphemism for a broad set of problems, including the fact that the United States imports much more than it exports and has thus become the world's leading debtor, owing hundreds of billions of dollars to China, Japan and other trading partners. The United States says this problem can be remedied by the trading partners importing more from the United States and also by China allowing its currency to rise in value in relation to the dollar.

In a statement Saturday, the finance ministers of the leading industrial countries said, "Greater exchange rate flexibility is desirable in emerging economies with large current-account surpluses, especially China."

As the finance ministers hold their meetings, representatives of more than 500 nongovernmental groups — many of them dissenting from the policies of the bank, the fund and rich countries — are holding meetings on the sidelines.

But Singapore's initial refusal to allow many of the representatives into the country gave them too little time to get here, even after Singapore relented under political pressure. As a result, several of the most outspoken critics of globalization are not at the meetings.

Paulson Describes Financial Network to Help Nuclear Drive

SINGAPORE, Sept. 16 -- U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. used his first meeting of world finance chiefs on Saturday as a venue to press the Bush administration's mission to isolate Iran and choke its nuclear aspirations.

Emerging from a meeting of finance ministers representing the Group of Seven industrialized nations, Paulson said he urged his counterparts to intensify efforts to prevent banks and private companies in their countries from being used as unwitting conduits for financing and materials aiding Iran's ambitions. He said scores of seemingly legitimate businesses are fronts in what the United States contends is a broad Iranian campaign to gain weapons of mass destruction and support terrorist groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas.

"There's a broad network of front companies, and these are not front companies that say 'Nuclear Acquisition Corp.' or 'Weapons Production Corp.,' " Paulson said at a news conference after the meeting. "These are mundane-sounding companies that do many legitimate activities, but in addition, do some of these untoward and illicit activities."

The Treasury Department's campaign comes after the Bush administration's failure to secure United Nations sanctions against Iran. Paulson portrayed the initiative as "an education job," giving his counterparts the ability to act voluntarily. Treasury officials have been dispatched worldwide in recent days to meet with finance ministers, banks and private companies, sharing intelligence aimed at illuminating how the Iranian network operates.

"There are finance ministers all over the world who want to do the right thing," Paulson said.

In a statement issued after the meeting, the G-7 finance ministers lent general support.

"We agreed to intensify our efforts to combat money laundering, proliferation network[s], as well as terrorist and illicit financing by addressing global financial vulnerabilities, particularly those associated with jurisdictions that have failed to recognize international standards," they said. (The G-7 consists of the United States, Japan, Britain, Germany, France, Canada and Italy.)

Paulson also pressed to resurrect a stalled effort aimed at boosting global trade. The Doha round of trade talks disbanded in July after years of fruitless wrangling, with poor countries accusing the United States and Europe of killing the chance for a deal by refusing to sufficiently reduce protective tariffs on agricultural goods. Paulson said the Bush administration remains willing to lift more tariffs, provided that U.S. exporters gain greater rights to sell their products abroad.

Paulson, who is to visit China on Tuesday, also reiterated the administration's long-standing contention that China must increase the value of its currency, the yuan. Manufacturers in the United States and elsewhere complain that a low-price Chinese currency makes Chinese goods unfairly cheap on world markets, effectively stealing jobs. China maintains that it is being cast as a scapegoat for the demise of U.S. manufacturing.

"I discourage high expectations for immediate results," Paulson said of his trip. "That's not the way the world works when you're dealing with important issues. I'm going to be listening."

He declined to put a number to his hopes for the yuan's increase.

"I certainly don't have a specific target for China," he said. "That would be presumptuous of me."

Echoing language it used in April, the G-7 singled out China and its controls over the value of its money as a source of "disorderly movements" in the global economy. "Greater exchange rate flexibility is desirable in emerging economies with large current account surpluses, especially China, for necessary adjustments to occur," the finance ministers said in their statement.

Paulson was largely focused on Iran, which stems not from any new intelligence but rather from having come to the job fresh in June, and then absorbing briefings, Treasury Department officials said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak as individuals.

Paulson realized that while North Korea -- another source of concern about nuclear weapons -- was already sealed off from the international financial system, Iran remains integrated, with banks and trading firms throughout the world, including Western Europe, continuing to do business with the country.

Last week, the Bush administration announced that it had shut down access to the U.S. financial system for an Iranian state-owned institution, Bank Saderat, asserting that in recent years it has funneled some $50 million to organizations branded terrorist by the United States and the European Union.

Overall, Iran has in recent years delivered about $200 million a year to terrorist groups, including $50 million to Hezbollah in 2001 and again in 2002, said Stuart Levey, Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

In recent days, Levey and other Treasury officials have been in England, France, Switzerland, Italy, Germany and the United Arab Emirates to meet with officials of banks and private companies, offering counsel on how to limit their vulnerability to being used by Iran. Visits are planned in Asia.

U.S. Lobbies Countries, Bankers To Sever Financial Ties With Iran (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, September 17, 2006

SINGAPORE -- Frustrated in its efforts to secure U.N. sanctions on Iran, the Bush administration is trying to convince individual governments and banks to sever financial relationships that allegedly allow Tehran to finance its nuclear ambitions and foreign terrorist groups.

Speaking to reporters on the sidelines of the Group of Seven meeting, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said he has dispatched aides to Europe and the Persian Gulf in recent days, where he has instructed them to lay out the U.S. case that Iran has been using dozens of front companies to fool banks into facilitating illicit financial transactions.

"There are a lot of ministers and banks around the world that are honorable and want to do the right thing," Mr. Paulson said.

The lobbying campaign comes on the heels of Treasury's decision this month to ban Iran's Bank Saderat from access to the U.S. financial system, either directly or through its relationships with foreign banks. Stuart Levey, undersecretary of the Treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence, claimed that, among other transactions, the bank had helped funnel $200 million to Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim extremist group whose capture of two Israeli soldiers touched off the recent spate of fighting between Israel and Lebanon.

Mr. Paulson, the former chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., decided to approach banks and foreign governments individually not long after he took over at Treasury in June. After a staff briefing on Iran's use of front companies to move money illicitly, Mr. Paulson wondered aloud whether commercial bankers knew they were, in essence, doing business with sponsors of terrorism.

He then instructed Mr. Levey to put together an unclassified road show that would detail Iranian practices. Last week Mr. Levey presented it to bankers and officials in Britain, France, Italy and Switzerland, with other Treasury aides presenting the case in Germany, the United Arab Emirates and elsewhere. Treasury plans to continue the campaign indefinitely, regardless of whether the U.N. Security Council decides to impose sanctions on Tehran.

The officials selected banks and countries they felt confident would use the information to shut down illicit flows.

Mr. Paulson himself discussed the situation with his G7 counterparts during Saturday's Singapore meeting. "We agreed to intensify our efforts to combat money laundering, proliferation network[s], as well as terrorist and illicit financing by addressing global financial vulnerabilities, particularly those associated with jurisdictions that have failed to recognize international standards," the G7 ministers said in a communiqué issued that evening.

The G7 includes the U.S., Britain, Germany, Japan, France, Italy and Canada.

Paulson Surprised By Iran `Front' Companies' Access (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Kevin Carmichael

Bloomberg, September 17, 2006

Sept. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Henry Paulson, who left Goldman Sachs Group Inc. in May to become the U.S. Treasury Secretary, said he was surprised to learn the extent to which Iranian front companies had infiltrated the financial system, prompting him to organize an ``education" program for banks and governments.

``This is a perspective that I brought to Treasury," Paulson said today at a press conference in Singapore. ``In my former job, if there was a risk like that, I would have liked someone to explain it to me. It would be quite easy for a financial institution to inadvertently facilitate the kinds of activities they wouldn't want to facilitate."

The remarks help explain a stronger focus on Iran at the Treasury in the past couple of weeks.

On Sept. 9, the Treasury barred Americans from doing business with Bank Saderat, one of Iran's biggest state-owned lenders. Stuart Levey, Paulson's top lieutenant for terror finance, followed that move with a week-long trip to Europe, where he presented banks and governments with evidence of how Iran might be using the financial system to funnel money to terrorists and buy materials to build a nuclear weapon.

Paulson continued the effort today in Singapore, where he used a meeting of finance ministers and central bankers from the Group of Seven nations to encourage his counterparts to disrupt the financing of illicit activities in Iran and North Korea. He told reporters that his department had evidence that many banks, including ``blue chip" institutions, are ``inadvertently" supporting nefarious activities in Iran.

`Broad Network'

``There's a broad network of front companies, and these are not front companies that say `Nuclear Acquisition Corp.' or `Weapons Production Corp,'" Paulson, who quit as Goldman's chief executive officer to replace John Snow at Treasury, said at the press conference. ``These are mundane sounding companies that do many legitimate activities, but in addition, do some of these untoward and illicit activities."

Treasury's effort comes with a veiled warning that international banks risk losing access to the U.S. financial system by doing business with the wrong Iranian company.

``Our goal is to make it harder, costlier and riskier to raise funds and move the funds through the international financial system," Daniel Glaser, Treasury's deputy assistant secretary for terror finance, said in an interview in Washington on Sept. 12.

UN Sanctions

The Bush administration also is pushing the United Nations to sanction Iran for defying a UN demand that the Islamic Republic stop enriching uranium. European nations are taking a more conciliatory approach, seeking talks with Iran before penalties are imposed. Iran said it's willing to talk and is seeking negotiations without delay.

The U.S. accuses Iran, which has the world's second-biggest oil and natural gas reserves, of trying to make a nuclear weapon. Iran says its program is intended only to fuel power stations.

International banks including HSBC Group and Credit Suisse Group are doing less business with Iran after the U.S. said they risk being cut off from the U.S. banking system, said Daniel Glaser, a Treasury deputy assistant secretary.

HSBC and Credit Suisse have ``limited their exposure to Iranian business," and UBS AG cut off all dealings with Iran earlier this year, Glaser said in testimony to the Senate Banking Committee on Sept. 12. Other banks have refused to issue new letters of credit to Iran, he said.

``This is noting more than an educational briefing to prepare financial institutions for the risks that are out there," Paulson said in Singapore. ``The point I made to finance ministers is that we have a job to do."

Two Tracks On Iran: Keep Talking, And Weigh Penalties (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 16 — After intense talks about Iran's nuclear program, the United States and other major world powers face two unappealing choices as the United Nations General Assembly opens this week: introduce a resolution in the Security Council for sanctions against Tehran that may not be tough enough to make a difference, or delay any punitive measures, rendering their diplomacy on Iran meaningless.

So the Bush administration, along with Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany, have quietly shifted their strategy.

In June, the six global powers offered Iran a take-it-or-leave-it package of incentives in an effort to persuade the country to abandon its nuclear ambitions. No negotiations would start unless Iran first froze its uranium enrichment activities.

Now the six countries have offered a major concession. They are embarking on a two-track approach that allows the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, to conduct open-ended negotiations with Iran on the conditions for a suspension while the Security Council weighs punitive measures.

Mr. Solana and Iran's chief negotiator, Ali Larijani, met twice last weekend and plan to hold talks on Sunday in New York, a senior Bush administration official said.

"I think there's a chance that Iran sees it has to move," a European diplomat said Friday. "We want to get those people to the table. The key thing here is to leave the door open."

In diplomatic terms, the embrace of what is being called the practical, two-track approach looks like a subtle change. But in reality it is a fundamental shift and an admission of how few options President Bush and his European allies have.

The Iran negotiations have a certain "Groundhog Day'' quality. In the fall of 2003, the United States was raising pressure on its European allies to refer Iran to the Security Council for sanctions. But with Russia and China threatening to veto, Britain, France and Germany worked out a deal with Iran: no referral of Iran's nuclear program to the Security Council if Iran suspended uranium enrichment, the first step in making fuel for nuclear power or a bomb.

A lot has happened since then, but one thing is the same: Iran is still enriching uranium.

The Bush administration is again ready to push forward on a sanctions package at the United Nations, but it is doubtful whether the United States and Europe will get Russia and China to sign on to anything but relatively mild sanctions, at least at first. Many analysts contend that Iran can withstand most of the measures under consideration, which include a travel ban against Iranian officials working in the nuclear program and restrictions on the sale of nuclear components to Tehran.

If Europe and the United States insist on tougher sanctions, Russia and China might balk, and the coalition — fragile, but a conduit for pressure nonetheless — could fall apart. That is why, despite the expiration of the Aug. 31 deadline for Iran to suspend enrichment or face sanctions, the United States and Europe remain willing to keep talking.

Or rather, the United States remains willing to speak through Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0065046

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pushed President Bush to offer to end Washington's policy of nearly three decades against direct talks with Iran if it suspended uranium enrichment. Iran has been seeking direct talks on any subject, seeking recognition of its growing regional influence and validation from its longstanding opponent.

But even though the Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is also scheduled to be in New York for the General Assembly, Mr. Bush has dismissed the possibility of the two meeting.

At a news conference on Friday, he said: "I have made it clear to the Iranian regime that we will sit down with the Iranians once they verifiably suspend their enrichment program. I meant what I said."

Nor will Ms. Rice or R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, meet with Mr. Larijani, American officials said.

But, they said, administration officials will certainly be monitoring the Larijani-Solana talks.

Foreign ministers from the six countries are planning to meet to discuss Iran on Tuesday or Wednesday.

European and American diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity according to normal diplomatic protocol, are still trying to determine whether Iran is serious about an offer they say Mr. Larijani made to suspend uranium enrichment for two months.

The diplomats say that Mr. Larijani has made the same overture several times, only to take it back, leaving the impression that he does not have the full authority to negotiate and that Iran's leadership is divided on nuclear strategy. The Iranians' 20-page response to the European Union on the proffered incentives — rambling and imprecise — strongly suggests that there are differing camps within Iran.

Indeed, in remarks to reporters on Friday, Mr. Solana acknowledged that there are divisions in Tehran, which he said were the reason he did not meet with Mr. Larijani this week. "A little bit more time was needed in order to reach a consensus in his own country among his own leadership" to "convey to me a possible positive answer," Mr. Solana said.

The European foreign policy chief's inclination to continue talking, meanwhile, has frustrated the Bush administration.

"Larijani and Solana have been engaged in this minuet," a senior Bush administration official said. "The U.S. view is that those talks are worthwhile, but not sufficient. We will be moving early in the week to move forward on a sanctions resolution."

If Iran does take up the offer, it is one that the United States and Europe should not refuse, said Robert J. Einhorn, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies and former assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation under President Bill Clinton.

"If the Europeans and Iranians can cobble together even a limited-duration suspension, we could dodge another bullet, at least for a while," Mr. Einhorn said. But, he added, "it's not at all clear we're going to get to that point. Even their initial offer had a lot of provisos."

Some analysts say that neither the international pressure on Iran, nor Iran's enrichment program, is likely to end soon.

"Next year," said George Perkovich, a nonproliferation expert at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, "we're going to be at the same spot still."

Analysis: Bush Sees Fewer Policy Options (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 17, 2006

When President Bush addresses world leaders at the United Nations this week, he will have fewer options and lower expectations on almost every major foreign policy front than a year ago.

The United States is relying more readily on international institutions and alliances for help in Iran, Lebanon, North Korea, Sudan and elsewhere. Yet, according to analysts, the Bush administration has less room to maneuver.

Bush and his foreign policy advisers have tried with some success to dispel the caricature of Bush abroad as a Texas cowboy riding alone and herding the U.S. into an unpopular war in Iraq.

But the war, now in its fourth year, devours resources and energy for other global objectives and feeds mistrust about U.S. intentions, experts say.

"I'm not sure they have changed their mind about to what extent to proceed unilaterally and how much to use military force so much as they have run out of options," said Richard Stoll, a political science professor at Rice University who studies foreign policy and national security.

With Bush nearly halfway through his final term, time is dwindling for him to accomplish his signature goals of confronting terrorism and spreading democracy, and he faces more distractions at home, said Andrew Bacevich, a professor of international relations at Boston University.

When the president speaks to the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday, he plans to carry a strong message, "based upon hope, and my belief that the civilized world must stand with moderate, reformist-minded people and help them realize their dreams.

"I believe that's the call of the 21st century," Bush told reporters Friday.

A scan of the globe, however, points up the defensive posture for the U.S. these days and the changed circumstances from a year ago:

_In Afghanistan, a military setback at the hands of a reconstituted Taliban took the administration by surprise this summer. Five years after the U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban from political power, the militant Islamic group is proving a resilient enemy for NATO forces in the south while suicide attacks have spread to the capital, Kabul. President Hamid Karzai's credibility has been undermined by the bloodiest fighting since the Taliban's fall, failure to control the drug trade and wide disparities between rich and poor. Karzai is a U.S. favorite whom Bush will see at the White House this month.

_In North Korea, the breakthrough weapons agreement announced during last year's U.N. opening session fell apart weeks later. Now the communist government is boycotting talks with the United States and other nations. The situation worsened when North Korea tested a long-range missile theoretically capable of reaching the U.S.

_In Iraq, political gains and the capture of a terrorist leader have not stopped the wholesale killing. U.S.-backed Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, whom Bush will see in New York, has failed to make his security plan stick. Washington shelved plans to withdraw some American troops this year despite declining public support in the U.S. for the war and growing calls from Congress for a phased withdrawal. Bush has acknowledged that U.S. forces will remain there for years.

_In Iran, the government has accelerated its nuclear program and defied U.N. demands. The U.S. is still the main force for U.N. penalties that allies find unappealing or of questionable value. With Tehran trying to undermine a fragile U.S.-built consensus, the weeks ahead may show whether the U.S. can persuade the Security Council to impose meaningful penalties or whether the administration will concede the futility of a course pursued for more than two years. Meanwhile, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is trying to deflect suspicion that the U.S. intends to topple Iran's ruling mullahs or bomb its nuclear sites.

_In the Mideast, the prospects for progress for peace between Israel and the Palestinians look more remote than at this time in 2005. Former Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is unconscious from a stroke; his successor, Ehud Olmert, has political problems after an inconclusive war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon. Humanitarian and political crises followed the victory of Hamas militants in Palestinian elections and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas was vastly weakened.

_Hamas' victory was the biggest blow to Bush's goal of spreading democracy in the region. Yet the U.S. said little about political reform in Egypt and Saudi Arabia while appealing to those Arab allies for help during the recent Israeli-Hezbollah war.

Bush may need help around the globe, but he could not resist taking a swipe at the United Nations during his White House press conference Friday. He stopped just short of calling the United Nations feckless in its response to the death and destruction in Sudan's Darfur region.

"I think a lot of Americans are frustrated with the United Nations, to be frank with you," Bush said.

Europeans May Meet With Iran, Sans U.S. (AP)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

European diplomats are considering a meeting with Iran on the sidelines of next week's U.N. General Assembly in hopes of de-escalating the standoff over Tehran's nuclear program — but the United States won't be getting an invitation.

The Bush administration, which is pushing for U.N. sanctions against Iran, has said it will join European-led negotiations with Iran only if it stops its uranium enrichment work first.

That has led European negotiators to work on having a meeting — without America — in which Iran could say it is temporarily suspending enrichment activities because new negotiations had indeed begun.

A U.S. official confirmed that European diplomats were contemplating the meeting, but White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore would say only that President Bush has consistently supported talks with Iran, led by Britain, France and Germany. "He is hopeful that ongoing negotiations will encourage the Iranian government to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities," she said.

The U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the volatile nature of the discussions, said the Bush administration is not expecting that such a meeting would be a major turning point in the dispute. The Bush administration has little confidence that "Iran will come through to meet the conditions" of verifiably suspending its enrichment work, the official said.

At a news conference Friday, Bush said he will send a signal at the United Nations that the United States will not tolerate delay tactics by Tehran. "Stalling shouldn't be allowed," Bush said.

Bush also stressed that he believes there is a strong consensus in the international community to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapon, although Russia and China — two members of the U.N. Security Council that have veto power — have been hesitant about imposing U.N. sanctions against the Iranian government.

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, is to meet Sunday in New York with Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator. If their discussion goes well, then the meeting — without the U.S. — could be arranged, the U.S. official said.

The idea would be to schedule such a meeting ahead of another gathering Tuesday night that's being attended by representatives of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and a few other nations. In that meeting, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is poised to push for more clarity about sanctions that could be imposed on Iran.

"Absent that change in the status quo, our plan is to push ahead on Tuesday," the U.S. official said.

Abbas And Bush To Meet On U.N. Sidelines (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Sept. 16 (AP) — The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, will meet with President Bush in New York on Wednesday, on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly, a Palestinian official said Saturday.

The meeting will be preceded by talks on Monday between Mr. Abbas and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the official, Saeb Erekat, said.

Mr. Bush and Mr. Abbas last met in October 2005 at the White House.

Mr. Erekat said the discussion would touch on a wide range of issues, including the coalition government that Mr. Abbas is trying to form with the Hamas political movement and the fate of an Israeli soldier seized by Hamas-allied militants in Gaza in June. Mr. Abbas is seeking United States support for the coalition government, in hopes of restoring international aid to the cash-starved Palestinian Authority. The foreign money dried up after Hamas, regarded by Europe and the United States as a terrorist organization, came to power in March.

The United States wants clearer statements that Hamas recognizes Israel and renounces violence.

Palestinian President Abbas To Meet Bush (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, September 17, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas will meet President Bush in New York next week and will likely seek to promote his planned coalition with Hamas, a Palestinian official said Saturday.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said the meeting with Bush would take place Wednesday on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly. The White House would not confirm the meeting and it was not clear whether Bush's final schedule in New York had been set. The two men last met in October 2005 in Washington.

Abbas, a moderate who leads the Fatah Party, and the militant Islamic group Hamas, which currently rules alone, agreed last week to form a national unity government that would strive to establish a Palestinian state alongside Israel — implying recognition of the Jewish state.

Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction, swept to victory in January legislative elections, defeating Fatah, and formed a government by itself. The West and Israel reacted by cutting off hundreds of millions of dollars in aid, accusing Hamas of being a terrorist group.

Without the foreign aid, the Hamas-led Palestinian government has been unable to pay salaries to its tens of thousands of civil servants, causing widespread hardship. In a sign of desperation, women have parted with their dowry of gold jewelry — their only financial security in the event of divorce.

Abbas hopes a unity government with Hamas could restore international funding to the cash-starved Palestinian Authority. But the United States has said it wants clearer statements from Hamas that it recognizes Israel, accepts existing peace deals and renounces violence.

The European Union on Friday held off on renewing direct aid to the Palestinian Authority. EU ministers said they supported Abbas' steps to form a broader coalition, but wanted assurances the new government would back peace efforts.

Erekat said Abbas would discuss with Bush the emerging coalition and the fate of an Israeli soldier seized by Hamas-allied militants in Gaza in June, whose capture led to an Israeli military offensive in Gaza.

Erekat said delegations led by Abbas and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni would also meet next week, but would not say what would be on the agenda.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev had no comment on the reported meeting, which would be a precursor to expected talks between Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Hamas has been pressured by tough international sanctions to force it to temper its anti-Israel stance. But Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas suggested Saturday that his group would go no further than it already has in agreeing to the unity government.

The agreement on the national unity government "does not discuss the recognition of (peace) agreements signed with the Israeli occupation," Haniyeh told Associated Press Television News. "We will work with these agreements according to what serves the higher Palestinian interests, but that does not mean we recognize them."

Israel has been boycotting the Hamas government but considers Abbas, who favors peacemaking, an acceptable partner for talks.

Israelis Lose Faith In New Generation Of Leaders (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Doubts Heightened By War in Lebanon

JERUSALEM, Sept. 16 -- Frustration over the outcome of the war in Lebanon has spurred many Israelis to question the abilities of a new class of political professionals who are stepping into roles long held by the men and women who founded the Jewish state.

The mostly East European immigrants who brought Israel into being are steadily ceding power to a more ethnically and ideologically diverse generation raised here. Now the uncertain aftermath of the first war to be managed by a prime minister from outside Israel's founding generation -- Ehud Olmert, a 60-year-old lawyer elected this year -- has sharpened debate over whether the best of the new generation are entering public life.

"How have we left our leadership to such mediocre people?" said Eliad Shraga, 46, head of the nonpartisan Movement for Quality Government in Israel who staged a nearly three-week hunger strike outside Olmert's office after returning from reserve duty in the Lebanon war. "We are asking ourselves how this has happened to us."

Olmert and others of his political generation embody a leadership shift that highlights the Jewish state's changing values and demographics.

Israel's original socialist character has evolved into a more free-market economy and less centralized government. The private sector and town councils are turning into training grounds for new political leaders, who once emerged largely from the labor movement, the kibbutz collective-farm enterprise and the military. There are more former mayors than generals in Olmert's cabinet, which also includes ministers from university faculties and the secret services.

But prospective Israeli leaders have found the diverse economy more attractive than public life, a notoriously treacherous arena given the country's cutthroat political culture. Israel's mainstream political leadership now consists mostly of pragmatic men and women who have made politics their profession -- a sharp contrast to the ideological volunteers, shaped by persecution, who founded Israel nearly six decades ago.

Historians and sociologists describe the change as the kind of natural evolution that occurs in most countries. But it is proving more complicated here because of Israel's unique circumstances -- a state still defining its borders, in a region where many countries dispute its right to exist.

"A nation cannot always be in a revolutionary spirit," said Ephraim Yaar, a professor of sociology at Tel Aviv University who runs the Evens Program in Mediation and Conflict Resolution. "People want to live normal lives. But in some ways, Israel cannot give up this spirit because of the peculiar existential threat it faces. We are still in the process of nation-building."

His father, Chaim Herzog, built Israel's military intelligence agency before serving as ambassador to the United Nations and the country's president. His grandfather was Israel's first chief rabbi, and one of his handwritten prayers for the new state hangs on Herzog's office wall.

As a boy, Herzog's neighbors in Zahala, a suburb of Tel Aviv, included Moshe Dayan, Yitzhak Rabin and Ariel Sharon, hero-generals of the wars and political battles that helped define the modern state.

"My father and his compatriots focused on security and the economy, but I became interested early on with talking to the Palestinians and in issues like the environment and human rights," said Herzog, who speaks Arabic.

"The whole system of values has changed," he continued. "I would say our generation is more willing to compromise, less willing to see ideology as holy."

Olmert is also a second-generation politician. Elected to parliament at the age of 28, he is Israel's third prime minister from outside the founding generation. When Sharon, 78, was felled by a stroke in January, Olmert assumed the top job and was elected on his own in March, on a platform to withdraw Israel from parts of the West Bank and define the state's final borders. The plan has been shelved since the war, and the Israeli public is waiting for another to replace it.

Olmert's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, whose popularity plummeted during the war, is the daughter of a leader of Irgun, the Zionist militia that attacked British forces and civilian targets before Israel's creation.

Both Olmert and Livni, 48, also a lawyer by training, left the Likud party last year to join Sharon's Kadima movement -- evidence, political analysts say, that the politicians now in charge are less ideological than those of the past.

The only member of Olmert's cabinet who played a vital role in Israel's political life before the founding of the state is Shimon Peres, the 83-year-old vice prime minister and Nobel Peace laureate who left the Labor Party last year after losing his bid to lead it.

"I think this shows we are now a more normal society, one without stars," Herzog said. "Stars just fall into the bureaucracy."

Recent opinion polls show that a large majority of Israelis believe the previous leaders were better than the current ones, while one in five Israelis does not think any of the senior party leaders is suitable to be prime minister. When the Marker, a business supplement published by the daily newspaper Haaretz, revealed its picks for the 100 Israelis with the most influence over the economy, no name appeared in the top slot, only the words: "Leader Wanted!"

"These new politicians don't regard themselves as mythological figures, nor does the public view them that way," said Tom Segev, a prominent Israeli historian and author of several influential books on the state's formative years. "And on the healthy side, the public no longer has giants it will blindly trust."

Segev contends that "for most Israelis, the founding giants are more about what they symbolized than who they actually were. They were overly mythologized, and now many enjoy an image that is just not justified."

While less trusting, the public is also more angry, particularly over a flurry of corruption scandals involving Israel's senior politicians and Olmert's refusal to allow an independent commission to examine the recent war's management.

The military, traditionally the country's most esteemed institution, is investigating itself at a time of pervasive anger among reserve officers. Many of them have criticized military commanders and civilian leaders for providing insufficient supplies and equipment during the fight, as well as for a tentative battle plan they contend prolonged the conflict and endangered Israeli soldiers and civilians.

Yaar's monthly "peace index" tracking poll showed a large drop last month in support for the military, along with other public institutions. Yaar noted that the marks for Olmert's government and the parliament "were already extremely low in the past and they did not have much space to shrink further."

"A war we don't win is a war we lose," said Zeev Sternhell, who fought in four of Israel's wars and is author of "The Founding Myths of Israel." "We have never been through such a loss of faith in the political and military leadership at the same time. I'm afraid people are beginning to lose confidence in the system itself."

Israeli politicians say the business sector could be the next source of political leadership. But sociologists argue that Israel's high-tech entrepreneurs, known for risk-taking and creativity, will likely be discouraged from entering the rough spectacle of Israeli politics.

"Israel has been very rude to people who want to volunteer their talents to public life, and by that I mean cynicism, which just kills everything," said Erel Margalit, managing partner of Jerusalem Venture Partners, a venture-capital firm with interests in high-tech businesses. "I think a few of us will jump, whether it's me or someone else. It depends on the timing and opportunity."

Margalit, 45, is mentioned frequently as a possible candidate for mayor of Jerusalem, where he lives and supports a number of arts projects. He was raised on a kibbutz and supported Labor Party leader Amir Peretz's bid for the prime ministership in March. Peretz, now Israel's highly unpopular defense minister, once embodied the promising rise of Jewish immigrants of North African and Middle Eastern descent in a society long dominated by European Jews.

"For a lot of us, the legacy of our grandfathers -- that we came here not just to make a profit -- is still there," Margalit said. "We don't want to be socialist, or at least not a part of the 1917 revolution. But we do want to use the same kind of sensitivities found on the kibbutz when things get difficult."

The idealists of today are lonely.

Daniel Kayros, 35, passed up the large-salary life of a corporate lawyer to run the fiscal litigation department of the Movement for Quality Government in Israel. He manned a tent for weeks across from Olmert's office festooned with banners declaring, "You Lost The North," a play on words meaning the government had lost both its support in the Galilee region and its direction.

"Against the backdrop of the amazing historic story of this country, to see the crumbling of government morals is extremely discouraging," said Kayros, who immigrated to Israel from Wisconsin at 19. "To me, it is an emergency call to the flag. I only wish more of the country felt that way."

Nonaligned Nations Blast Israel Attacks (AP)

By OLGA R. RODRIGUEZ, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Representatives of 118 Nonaligned Movement nations condemned Israel's attacks on Lebanon and supported a peaceful resolution to the U.S.-Iran nuclear dispute in the final declaration Saturday of a summit that brought together some of the United States' staunchest foes.

The 92-page declaration also broadly condemned terrorism. But it said movements for self-determination and battles against foreign occupiers should not be considered terrorism.

And while declaring democracy to be a universal value, the movement said no one country or region should define it for the whole world and defended the right of Venezuela and other countries to determine their own forms of government.

The final statements, many of which contain veiled criticisms of the U.S., were approved by unanimous consent after another round of speeches Saturday night by leaders of the movement.

"No one in the Nonaligned Movement thinks that the United States is responsible for all the problems, but many think that it is for some," Cuba's Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque said.

An ailing Fidel Castro was named president of the movement, but he stayed home on doctors' orders while acting Cuban President Raul Castro presided over the meeting of two-thirds of the world's nations.

The meeting brought together the leaders of Iran, Venezuela, North Korea, Zimbabwe among other leading U.S. adversaries. Raul joined them in saying a bellicose America had made the world more dangerous.

North Korea's No. 2 leader, Kim Yong Nam, claimed his communist nation "would not need even a single nuclear weapon if there no longer existed a U.S. threat," and said U.S. financial sanctions have "driven the situation into an unpredictable phase."

Kim, the leader of Parliament, blamed the lack of world peace on the United States, saying its failure to respect the sovereignty of other nations has destroyed "the international order."

The resulting imbalance in global politics constitutes "grave threats to world peace and security," he said.

The United States declined an invitation to the summit and said it would have no comment on any of the proceedings.

Many at the summit demanded the United Nations take action against U.S. veto power in the Security Council.

"The U.S. is turning the Security Council into a base for imposing its politics," Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad complained. "Why should people live under the nuclear threat of the U.S.?"

Others held onto hard-line positions: North Korea defended its nuclear weapons program, Sudan's leader rejected a U.N. peacekeeping mission for Darfur and Ahmadinejad insisted on Iran's right to develop nuclear energy.

The final document supported Iran's position while encouraging it to continue cooperating with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

Earlier on Saturday, Iraq's vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, asked the movement for a statement calling on all countries to stop interfering in Iraq and to recognize the sovereignty of his nation's land and airspace. He complained that "life has degenerated" in his country and Iraqis are suffering because "a war machine has destroyed the infrastructure."

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan agreed the Security Council must be more responsive to less powerful countries.

"The Security Council must reform - for the sake of the developing world, and for the sake of the United Nations itself," Annan told the Nonaligned leaders.

The Nonaligned Movement was formed in 1961 to establish a neutral third path in a world divided by the United States and the Soviet Union. Cuba last hosted the group in Havana 27 years ago.

It was unclear whether the 80-year-old Castro will recover enough from intestinal surgery to guide the group for the next three years. The ailing rebel icon met in his home with a handful of leaders including Annan and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

The Fight To Rebuild Lebanon (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065052

Sunni governments vie with Shiite-ruled Iran and Hezbollah to prove who is doing more.

BEIRUT — The rush to rebuild this war-crushed country has gotten tangled up with a high-stakes sectarian competition, as Sunni Arab governments in the region race against Shiite-ruled Iran and its ally Hezbollah to prove political clout and capture grass-roots loyalty, analysts say.

A steady stream of foreign delegations crunches over the rubble of the southern suburbs for photo opportunities; spokespeople churn out competing press releases; catty cut-downs are exchanged between Hezbollah and the Lebanese government. Milk trucks on remote farm roads near the Israeli border proclaim that their boxed milk is a gift from the Saudi people; an Iranian flag emblazons water tanks in Beirut.

For decades, Lebanon has been an oft-abused host to its neighbors — a sun-warmed playground for the wealthy, but also a proxy battlefield for tensions that wash over the Middle East. In the current struggle, the region's power players jockey not with guns but with charity dollars, boxed food and showy displays of compassion.

"There's a kind of competition between the Arab governments and Iran," said Kamel Mohanna, general coordinator for Arab NGOs Forum. "It's a competition to have political influence here … to decrease the influence of Iran, to show that not only Iran has sent money to this area."

The unmistakable oneupmanship is a stark reminder of the panic that has gripped the region as the power of Iran has swelled. Animosities between Sunnis and Shiites stretch back into the origins of Islam, and have sharpened in recent years as the oil-rich Sunni Arab states of the Persian Gulf compete for influence against Iran. Sunni Arabs watched with unease as Iranian influence spread among Shiites in Iraq after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, and sat by nervously while Tehran squared off against the West over Iran's nuclear program.

This summer's war in Lebanon upped the ante. The perception that Hezbollah guerrillas drove Israel out of Lebanon has swept the coffee shops and streets of the Arab world. Hezbollah chief Sheik Hassan Nasrallah has been lionized, even among Sunni Arabs who might previously have viewed the Shiite with suspicion, analysts say.

As soon as the bombing stopped, Hezbollah foot soldiers waded into devastated streets and handed bundles of cash to families that had lost homes to Israeli bombing. Hezbollah has been coy about its ties to Iran, but most of the cash is presumed to have come from Tehran.

The Lebanese government, dominated by Sunnis and Christians, has struggled to counteract the perception that Hezbollah is chiefly responsible for the aid and reconstruction efforts.

"Iran may be trying to come into play here, saying, 'Hey, we're not bad guys, we're benevolent,' " said Mohammed Mamlouk, the prime minister's aide in charge of coordinating foreign aid. "But they're not fooling anybody. I bet even the Shiites here know better."

Mamlouk sat among a sea of chiming telephones and scurrying people in Beirut's government center. Aid was pouring into government coffers from all over the Arab world and beyond, but not from Iran. The money from Tehran was going straight to Hezbollah, Mamlouk said.

"It's our government, and our job to take care of the people," he said. "Every time you send an engineer, you don't send a TV crew with him just to show that the government is working."

Persian Gulf states, including Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, have come forward with immense donations, Mamlouk said. He is careful to note the Saudi prince who stayed on the Syrian border all night to supervise the transfer of aid into Lebanon during the Israeli bombardment.

"Hezbollah believes it's important to show they're paying and taking care of their own people. They're overplaying it with the media," Mamlouk said. "So we're making shows now. We're drumming it up."

Lebanon's Shiites, believed to be the largest sect in the country's religious mosaic, have a long-standing tradition of taking care of their own, developed in response to government neglect.

Now the central government is working to show Shiites that their needs are taken seriously in Beirut. The outreach is driven in part, analysts say, by suspicions across the region that Shiite Arabs are secretly more loyal to their Iranian coreligionists than to their countrymen.

"Arabs are trying to get the Shias to integrate more in Lebanon and forget Iran," said Hilal Khashan, an expert on the region's Shiites and a professor at the American University of Beirut. "This is the challenge: How do you get Shias to pledge allegiance to the Lebanese state and forget foreign influence?"

Hezbollah hasn't helped. Its political leaders dismiss government aid efforts as corruption-riddled traps that snare money long before it reaches the needy. They sometimes speak of the government as a foreign force, and accuse Beirut of secretly rooting for Israel to win the war and obliterate Hezbollah.

"We are ready to rebuild Lebanon, we are planning to do that, and the Shia of the world will help us," said Khodor Nour Eddin, a senior political officer for Hezbollah. "It's better for us to do that. We don't want to take money from the government, like charity."

In the heart of the destruction wrought by Israeli bombs, Nour Eddin sat in the sprawling tent erected by Jihad Construction, Hezbollah's large band of reconstruction workers. Behind him, a delegation of religious leaders from Syria gave speeches and posed for photographs.

Dust choked the air, and the streets rang with the clang of steel and the scrape of machinery. The long yellow arm of a Caterpillar pawed at the piles of debris. Women picked their way through the rubble of their homes, holding the hems of their chadors out of the dust.

"If Hezbollah didn't give us money to rent a house, we'd be on the street," said Muna Raed, whose home was ground to rubble in the bombardment.

"The government?" She paused. "There's a promise. We'll see. We've learned from previous wars that the government will steal and we won't see anything."

Vatican Says Pope Benedict Regrets Offending Muslims (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

ROME, Sept. 16 — A top Vatican official said Saturday that Pope Benedict XVI "deeply regretted" that a speech he made this week "sounded offensive to the sensibility of Muslim believers."

The statement, by Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, the new Vatican secretary of state, was made as denunciations from Muslim leaders over the speech continued for a third day around the world.

And in the West Bank town of Nablus on Saturday, a day after street protests and grenades were thrown at a church in the Gaza Strip, two churches were lightly damaged in fire bombings. A group calling itself the "Lions of Monotheism" said the attacks were in reaction to the pope's remarks.

The Vatican statement stopped short of the direct personal apology from Benedict that many Muslims have been demanding. Still, the statement tried to tamp down rising anger among Muslims about the speech, in which Benedict quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as calling Islam "evil and inhuman."

Cardinal Bertone, named the second-in-command at the Vatican on Friday, said that the pope's comments had been interpreted in a way that "absolutely did not correspond to his intentions." He said that Benedict, whose stance on Islam has generally been more skeptical than that of his predecessor, John Paul II, respected Islam and believed strongly in dialogue among faiths.

The quotations, Cardinal Bertone said, were part of a scholarly address aimed at refuting a "religious motivation for violence, no matter where it comes from."

On Tuesday, at Regensburg University in Germany, Benedict delivered a long, scholarly address on reason and faith in the West. But he began his speech by recounting a conversation on the truths of Christianity and Islam that took place between a 14th-century Byzantine Christian emperor, Manuel II Paleologus, and a Persian scholar.

"The emperor comes to speak about the issue of jihad, holy war," the pope said.

"He said, I quote, 'Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached,' " the pope said.

While making clear that he was quoting someone else, Benedict did not say whether he agreed or not. He also briefly discussed the Islamic concept of jihad, which he defined as "holy war," and said that violence in the name of religion is contrary to God's nature and to reason.

He also suggested reason as the basis for "that genuine dialogue of cultures and religions so urgently needed today."

Nonetheless, Muslims around the world called the speech provocative, especially coming from the leader of the world's billion Roman Catholics.

In Jordan, the state-owned daily newspaper Al Rai said called the pope's statements "shocking." It said the pope should apologize "so as to ease the fears of Muslims who sense they are becoming the target of an orchestrated campaign."

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq called on Iraqis to refrain from violent protest over the remarks, urging people not to "carry out actions that will harm our Christian brothers here," according to his spokesman, Ali Dabbagh.

Mr. Dabbagh said he had heard only one unofficial and unconfirmed report of any violence in Iraq related to anger over the pope's comments. That episode involved a church in Basra, but he said he had no details.

"The pope misinterpreted Islam," he said. "The most important thing is that such incidents should not be converted into violence in Iraq."

Morocco recalled its ambassador to the Vatican over the remarks, according to the official MAP news agency.

And the president of Yemen, Ali Abdullah Saleh, threatened to sever diplomatic ties unless Benedict apologized.

In Somalia, a radical cleric was reported to have urged Muslims to "hunt down" the pope for remarks that he called "barbaric."

"Whoever offends our Prophet Muhammad should be killed on the spot by the nearest Muslim," the cleric, Sheik Abubakar Hassan Malin, told worshipers in Mogadishu on Friday, Agence France-Presse reported.

But in Turkey, amid questions about the pope's planned visit in November, the main English-language newspaper, The Daily News, urged an end to the criticism.

While denouncing his comments, the paper said, "We just disagree with this vendettalike approach of continuing to abuse the pope after his spokesman made a statement saying that he respected Islam and did not intend to offend Muslims."

The newspaper was printed before Cardinal Bertone spoke Saturday and was referring to a Vatican statement released on Thursday.

Security around the pope's residence at Castel Gandolfo, near Rome, would be strengthened for the pope's Sunday blessing, Agence France-Presse quoted the Italian ANSA news agency as saying. "Meticulous" security checks over an extended area were planned.

Aide Says Pope 'Regrets' Comments On Islam (WP/AP)

By Frances D'emilio, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

VATICAN CITY, Sept. 16 -- Pope Benedict XVI "sincerely regrets" offending Muslims with his reference to an obscure medieval text that characterizes some of the teachings of Islam's founder as "evil and inhuman," a senior Vatican official said in a statement Saturday.

But the comment stopped short of the apology demanded by Islamic leaders around the world, and anger among Muslims remained intense. Palestinians attacked five churches in the West Bank and Gaza over the pope's remarks in a speech Tuesday to university professors in his native Germany.

In a broader talk rejecting any religious motivation for violence, Benedict cited the words of a 14th-century Byzantine emperor who characterized some of the teachings of the prophet Muhammad as "evil and inhuman," particularly "his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

The pontiff did not endorse that description, but he did not question it, and his words set off a firestorm of protests across the Muslim world.

The new Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, said the pope's position on Islam is unmistakably in line with Vatican teaching that says the church "esteems" Muslims.

Benedict "thus sincerely regrets that certain passages of his address could have sounded offensive to the sensitivities of the Muslim faithful and should have been interpreted in a manner that in no way corresponds to his intentions," Bertone said in the statement.

Bertone said the pontiff sought in his speech to condemn all religious motivation for violence, "from whatever side it may come." But the pope's words only appeared to fan outrage.

Bertone's statement, released by the Vatican press office, failed to satisfy critics.

Mohammed Bishr, a senior member of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, said the statement "was not an apology" but a "pretext that the pope was quoting somebody else as saying so and so."

"We need the pope to admit the big mistake he has committed and then agree on apologizing, because we will not accept others to apologize on his behalf," Bishr said.

Morocco recalled its ambassador to the Vatican on Saturday to protest the pope's "offensive" remarks, and Afghanistan's parliament and the Foreign Ministry demanded that the pope apologize.

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan insisted the pope apologize, saying he had spoken "not like a man of religion but like a usual politician." Benedict plans to go to Turkey in November in what would be his first papal visit to a Muslim nation.

Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, spiritual leader of the world's 200 million Orthodox Christians, issued a statement saying he was "deeply" saddened by the tensions sparked by the pope's comments.

"We have to show the determination and care not to hurt one another and avoid situations where we may hurt each others' beliefs," the Istanbul-based Patriarchate said.

DOJ_NMG_0065055

In the West Bank, Palestinians used guns, firebombs and lighter fluid in attacks on four churches, leaving church doors charred and walls scorched by flames and pocked with bullet holes. Nobody was reported injured. A Greek Orthodox church in Gaza City also was attacked.

A group calling itself "Lions of Monotheism" told The Associated Press by phone that the attacks were a protest of the pope's remarks on Islam.

The grand sheik of Cairo's al-Azhar mosque, the Sunni Arab world's most powerful institution, condemned the pope's remarks as "reflecting ignorance."

Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi, whose Southeast Asian country has a large Muslim population, demanded that Benedict retract his remarks and not "take lightly the spread of outrage that has been created."

Coptic Pope Shenouda III, head of Egypt's Coptic Orthodox Church, criticized Benedict, saying, "Any remarks which offend Islam and Muslims are against the teachings of Christ," according to the pro-government newspaper al-Ahram.

British Muslims sought to calm the situation, praising the Vatican statement on behalf of the pope.

"We welcome his apology and we hope now we can work together and build bridges. At the same time we would condemn all forms of violent demonstration," Muhammad Umar, chairman of Britain's Ramadhan Foundation, a youth organization, told Sky News.

But Muhammad Abdul Bari, secretary general of the Muslim Council of Britain, said the pontiff needed to repudiate the views of the emperor he quoted in order to restore relations between Muslims and the Roman Catholic Church.

Pope Is Regretful That His Speech Angered Muslims (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

A Vatican statement includes no apology, though, saying his words were misunderstood.

VATICAN CITY — With furor spreading throughout the Islamic world, Pope Benedict XVI expressed deep regret Saturday that a speech he gave at a German university last week had offended Muslims.

A statement released by his new secretary of State said of Benedict: "In reiterating his respect and esteem for those who profess Islam, he hopes they will be helped to understand the correct meaning of his words."

It did not seem likely that the expression of regret would satisfy clamor from many corners of the world that the pope apologize. He distanced himself from the language that Muslims found objectionable, but he did not retract the words or ask for forgiveness.

The Muslim Brotherhood, one of the largest and most influential Islamic organizations in the Middle East, issued an initial response that Benedict's overture was insufficient.

Hostility to the pope's speech — a dense lecture in which he quoted a medieval Byzantine emperor as saying, "Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman" — has plunged Benedict's 17-month-old papacy into its most difficult diplomatic crisis.

Muslim communities in Europe, Egypt, Pakistan and elsewhere have expressed anger at the pontiff.

His effigy was burned in India, and he has been compared to Hitler and Mussolini.

Morocco on Saturday became the first Islamic country to recall its Holy See ambassador.

In Cairo, Coptic Christian leaders joined their Muslim counterparts in condemning the pope.

Earlier on Saturday, Palestinians firebombed four churches in the West Bank city of Nablus and shot at one in the Gaza Strip. No injuries were reported. And Iraqi and Somalian militants threatened to kill the pope or attack Rome.

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan demanded a retraction of Benedict's "ugly and unfortunate" comments, saying that "the pope spoke like a politician rather than as a man of religion." Benedict's scheduled trip to Turkey in November, his first to a Muslim country, may be in jeopardy, though Vatican officials hoped Saturday's statement would help clear the air.

Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, the secretary of State who issued the communique, said the pope in no way endorsed the passage he quoted from Emperor Manuel II Paleologus and meant only to illustrate the rejection of religious motivation for violence.

"The Holy Father thus sincerely regrets that certain passages of his address could have sounded offensive to the sensitivities of the Muslim faithful, and should have been interpreted in a manner that in no way corresponds to his intentions," Bertone said.

The pope expressed hope of "quickly surmounting this present uneasy moment," Bertone added.

Tuesday's speech was delivered at the University of Regensburg, where Benedict, when he was known as Joseph Ratzinger, taught theology in the 1970s.

Benedict's return was part of a six-day tour of his native Bavaria.

The Regensburg speech was meant to be one of the most important documents of his papacy. Benedict labored long hours drafting it over his summer holidays. It lays out the central tenets of his papacy, including the importance of the partnership of reason and faith in Western Christianity.

His few references to Islam seemed to portray it as a historically violent faith reliant on forced conversions and jihad, which he translated as holy war. Christianity's own bloodstained past was not mentioned.

Vatican experts were divided over whether Benedict miscalculated the depth of anger his words would inspire, or whether he might not care. As a consummate theologian, the role he played for the last quarter-century, he is not averse to debate and controversy, and he clearly wanted to stake out his positions in stark and dramatic terms.

But it is one thing to conduct such discussions as an academic and another to do so as pope, who is also a world leader, a politician and head of 1.2 billion Roman Catholics.

"Pushing these buttons of protest will not help the future of religious dialogue, neither for Muslims nor for us," said Alberto Melloni, a church historian. "The pope does not live on an island but in Rome, and it's hard to see that this controversy will simply be disregarded."

Perhaps more important, the Regensburg speech reflected Benedict's conviction that Christianity is a superior religion and that Islam must be treated more cautiously. His predecessor, John Paul II, frequently embraced Christians, Muslims and Jews as "the children of Abraham" and promoted interfaith dialogue.

In his first homily as pontiff, Benedict dropped any reference to Islam when mentioning respect for other faiths. This year, he demoted the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, which oversees relations with Muslims and members of other religions. He sent its Rome-based president, a leading expert on Islam, to Cairo to serve as an envoy to Egypt instead.

In Regensburg, "the pope was thinking he was writing an academic treatise, but in writing an academic treatise, his deep mistrust of at least part of Islam came to the surface," said Marco Politi, Vatican specialist for the Italian newspaper La Repubblica.

Several Vatican watchers said Saturday's more conciliatory statement reflected the hand of Benedict's newly installed aides, most notably Bertone, a longtime associate. Bertone assumed the post of secretary of State, No. 2 in the Vatican, on Friday.

Vatican officials were said to have been especially taken aback by criticism from moderate European Muslims.

Benedict's associates, Politi said, "understood that more than 40 years of evolving good relations between the Catholic Church and the Islamic world were at stake."

Muslims Erupt In Anger At Pope's Comments About Muhammad (MCT)

By Miret El Naggar

McClatchy Newspapers, September 17, 2006

CAIRO, Egypt - Gunmen firebombed five churches in the Palestinian territories Saturday over remarks by Pope Benedict XVI this week that outraged Muslims and prompted the Vatican to issue a mildly worded apology.

The pope "sincerely regrets that certain passages of his address could have sounded offensive to the sensitivities of the Muslim faithful," said Deputy Pope Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, insisting that the pontiff didn't mean to portray Islam as violent. Instead, the pope meant only to stress his "clear and radical rejection of religiously motivated violence," Bertone said.

Muslims around the world interpreted the pope's words as criticism that Islam endorses violence.

Pope Benedict XVI made the remarks earlier this week during a trip to his native Germany as he was citing a conversation between a Byzantine Christian emperor, Manuel Paleologos II, and a Persian Muslim scholar on the truths of Christianity and Islam.

"Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached," were the emperor's words that the pope read before a group of professors at Regensburg University in Germany, without commenting on them.

In the days since, fear has spread of a wave of violence like what followed a Danish newspaper's publication last year of cartoons that lampooned Islam's prophet Mohammed

Palestinian gunmen targeted five churches in Gaza and the West Bank with firebombs, causing charred doors and bullet holes in walls, but no one was injured.

A day earlier some 2,000 Palestinians demonstrated in Gaza against the pope's remarks.

Elsewhere in the Muslim world politicians and clerics in Lebanon, Egypt, Malaysia, Pakistan, Turkey and several other countries all reproached the pope.

DOJ_NMG_0065057

The Grand Sheikh of al-Azhar institution in Cairo, the highest religious authority in the Sunni world, issued a statement criticizing the pope for repeating the emperor's quotes without further explanation.

Egypt's Parliament demanded an immediate apology. Speaker of Parliament Fathy Sorour said the remarks showed a "severe ignorance of Islam."

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit issued a statement in which he expressed "concern that the Pope's comments would spark clashes between cultures and weaken efforts to narrow the gap between East and West."

Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood discarded the Vatican's mild apology as "insufficient."

"This statement is not enough," said the Brotherhood's deputy leader Mohamed Habib. "The pope's comments insulted Muslims' feelings and revered beliefs to an extent that can only be mended by a personal apology."

Turkey's ruling party compared the pope to Hitler and Mussolini.

In Pakistan, scores of people demonstrated and parliament unanimously passed a resolution condemning the pope for making "derogatory" comments about Islam.

Morocco's official news agency announced that King Mohammed VI had recalled his ambassador to the Vatican for consultations.

Malaysia's Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmed Badawi commented that the Pope should not take the public outrage lightly.

"It is unfortunate that such an eminent figure like the pope has not shown leadership in promoting good relations between religions," Badawi said in a statement.

Sudan's President Rejects U.N. Troops (AP)

By Olga R. Rodriguez

AP, September 17, 2006

Sudan's president again rejected the deployment of U.N. peacekeeping troops in the war-torn Darfur region during a meeting with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan on Saturday. But one of the country's two vice presidents said he would accept international intervention.

Annan urged the government of Sudan in an editorial distributed Saturday to accept the U.N. Security Council's decision to replace the largely ineffective African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur with better-equipped U.N. troops.

"There can be no military solution to the crisis in Darfur," Annan wrote. "All parties should have understood by now, after so much death and destruction, that only a political agreement in which all stakeholders are fully engaged can bring real peace to the region."

Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir rejected his appeal.

"Justice is and remains our objective but through diplomatic, political and other means," he said, according to the English translation of his speech in Arabic. "That's why we reject this position." Al-Bashir made the remarks at a news conference in Cuba, where he and Annan were attending the Nonaligned Movement summit.

At least 200,000 people have been killed in Darfur and more than 2 million have fled their homes since 2003 when ethnic African tribes revolted against the Arab-led government. The government is accused of unleashing brutal Arab militiamen known as janjaweed in the remote western province.

First Vice President Salva Kiir Mayardit welcomed U.N. intervention. He heads the Sudan People's Liberation Movement — a former southern rebel group that made peace with Khartoum in January 2005.

"The aggravation of the humanitarian and security situation in Darfur necessitates intervention of international forces to protect civilians from the atrocities of the janjaweed militias so long as the government is not capable of protecting them," Kiir was quoted as saying in remarks published Saturday by the independent Al-Sudani daily.

The Darfur Peace Agreement, signed in May, calls for a cease-fire, disarmament of militias and a protection force for civilians — but does not specify the composition of such a force.

Last month, the Security Council passed a resolution demanding a better-funded, larger and more well-equipped U.N. mission take over Darfur peacekeeping duties from the African Union, whose mandate expires Sept. 30.

But the resolution was unlikely to take effect without the consent of the Sudanese government, something nations including the United States have worked — without success — to acquire. Al-Bashir has said that a switch in command would violate the country's sovereignty and has warned that his army would fight any U.N. forces sent to Darfur.

On Friday, President Bush said it could be time to send international peacekeepers into Darfur over the objections of the government in Khartoum.

"What you'll hear is, 'Well the government of Sudan must invite the United Nations in for us to act,'" Bush said. "Well, there are other alternatives, like passing a U.N. resolution saying we're coming in with a U.N. force in order to save lives."

Sudanese VP Backs U.N. Troops In Darfur (AP)

By Mohammed Osman

AP, September 17, 2006

One of two vice presidents in Sudan's power-sharing government said in remarks published Saturday that he would accept the deployment of U.N. peacekeepers in the country's war-torn Darfur region.

First Vice President Salva Kiir Mayardit told the independent Al-Sudani daily that the Sudanese government was incapable of protecting civilians in Darfur, and called on the U.N. to intervene.

He spoke at a meeting Friday of his former rebel group, the Sudan People's Liberation Movement, in the southern city of Juba.

"The aggravation of the humanitarian and security situation in Darfur necessitates intervention of international forces to protect civilians from the atrocities of the Janjaweed militias so long as the government is not capable of protecting them," Kiir was quoted as saying.

Kiir's group signed a peace agreement with the Sudanese government in January 2005, laying down its arms after 21 years of civil war — Africa's longest conflict.

Some see that peace deal as a model for resolving the conflict in the western region of Darfur. Kiir's organization is believed to have influence over the Darfur rebels, though the conflicts were not related.

Sudan VP Takes Issue With President On UN Darfur Force (AFP)

By Mohammed Ali Saeed

AFP, September 17, 2006

Sudan Vice President Salva Kiir said a UN peacekeeping force is vital for the protection of civilians in Darfur, putting himself at odds with the country's veteran president.

Kiir, whose southern former rebel movement forms part of a national unity government with President Omar al-Beshir's National Congress, said UN peacekeepers were essential to protect civilians from the "atrocities" of Arab militias.

"The aggravation of the humanitarian and security situation in Darfur necessitates the intervention of international forces to protect civilians from the atrocities of the Janjaweed militias so long as the government is not capable of protecting them," Kiir told the independent daily Al-Sudani Saturday.

"Our National Congress partners believe that peace in Darfur can only be achieved by ... military force," the vice president was quoted as saying at a meeting Friday of the politburo of his Sudan People's Liberation Movement in the southern regional capital of Juba.

The SPLM, which signed a January 2005 peace deal with Beshir's regime that paved the way for the national unity government, said it would press the president to heed mounting international pressure to accept the UN force.

The SPLM's stance on the presence of international troops could threaten the implementation of peace accords, an analyst said.

"This position announced by the SPLM by welcoming international troops in Darfur will definitely weaken the position of the government in front of the international community," Adel Al-Baz an independent Sudanese analyst told AFP.

"The government will not find any support from its smaller partner if it insists on its position and tries to impose security and stability in Darfur alone without international troops," he said.

"But while this position will not lead to a split between the National Congress and the SPLM, it will shake the required trust needed to implement the peace agreement," he said.

Before the talks that led to last year's peace deal, the SPLM championed the rights of all Sudan's ethnic minorities, including those in the western region of Darfur, the central Nuba mountains and the east, as well as the south where it fought a two-decade war with the Arab-dominated regime.

Ethnic minority rebels launched their own uprising in Darfur in early 2003, prompting Beshir's regime to unleash the Janjaweed militias in a scorched earth policy which Washington has described as genocide.

The UN Security Council adopted a resolution late last month calling for an extension of the UN peacekeeping mission in south Sudan to Darfur to take over from an overstretched two-year-old African Union force.

But the resolution called for the government's approval of the UN mission, something Beshir has so far defiantly withheld.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair criticised the Sudanese government Saturday over the "completely unacceptable" situation in Darfur and accused it of breaking ceasefire agreements signed with the rebels.

"I am committed to stepping up international efforts to bring a change of mind and action from the government of Sudan," he said, adding that the international community could not "just watch as this tragedy deepens".

Darfur has been in the throes of a civil war since 2003 which has pitched rebel groups against the Khartoum government and allied Arab militia.

The conflict has killed around 300,000 people and displaced more than 2.5 million, according to the UN.

Letter From A Sudanese Prison (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

EL FASHER, Sudan

I came bearing gifts I imagined would be useful to a foreign correspondent trapped in a grubby African prison -- mosquito repellent, books, two recent issues of the Economist and an oversized bar of dark Lindt chocolate. And I came with one big question: How did Paul Salopek, a two-time Pulitzer Prize winner for the Chicago Tribune, a veteran of dicey Third World travel, land himself in a Sudanese lockup?

The answer, on the surface, seemed simple enough. Salopek, 44, had been on assignment for National Geographic when, on Aug. 6, he crossed over the border from Chad, entering the intractable war zone of the Darfur region without a visa. Within two hours, he was picked up by former rebels who had cut a deal with the government. A few days later, including one when a helicopter carrying him took ground fire, Salopek was in the hands of Sudan's notorious secret police. The charges included not just the visa violation, but also espionage and writing "false news." The possible punishments included many years in prison.

I met Salopek four weeks later while on a reporting trip to Darfur. With stamped and signed travel papers in my pocket, I walked into the sandy court compound that had, at this late stage in his captivity, become his home. In late afternoons, the steel-barred doors to his concrete-box lockup were left open, allowing Salopek and his two Chadian colleagues -- a driver and an interpreter -- to move about freely, talk on the phone, chat with visitors and order out for dinner from one of El Fasher's few restaurants.

Salopek, lean and bookish-looking in short hair and glasses, had approached his time in prison as he would a story -- immersing himself in the place with the passion of a devoted observer. He picked up a bit of Arabic, and studied the names and personalities of his captors, all of whom eventually came to treat him as a friend. They talked and shared food and played soccer. And when a senior guard challenged him at chess, Salopek wisely lost 10 of 13 games and muffled his shock that the queen in the Sudanese version is called "the minister," stripping the game of its legacy of female power.

Most of all, he appeared at peace with his situation, which I knew took much effort for a man uncomfortable in the spotlight. The Tribune, National Geographic and a host of U.S. officials were working hard for his release, and despite some encouraging signs, Salopek was preparing himself and his two Chadian associates for a long stay. "If I have to spend two years in Shalla prison," he said, referring to North Darfur's prison, "I'll work on my Arabic."

He said this in an even tone, without a smile or bravado. In fact, the only time his blood pressure seemed to rise was when he contemplated another possible outcome of his captivity -- that he would go free but that other journalists, chastened by his experience, would stop coming to Darfur. It pained him to imagine that his plight might lead to less attention for one of the world's great ongoing tragedies.

Salopek knew better than most what the stakes were. For whatever he learned before entering Sudan (including through visits with rebels and refugees in Chad) he had spent a month mastering firsthand the brutality of the government here. And despite what he suffered -- I leave this for him to tell, but he came far closer to death than has been widely reported -- Salopek expressed much more concern for the hundreds of thousands of people who had died and 2 million made homeless in Darfur.

Salopek was convinced, as was every aid official and African Union officer I met here, that the conflict was about to become worse as the government moved to finish off the rebels who had not signed a May peace deal. With the AU preparing to leave and a planned U.N. mission blocked by the government, the thin margin of safety for journalists and aid groups was about to disappear as well. Salopek was distraught over what could happen to civilians once all the outside witnesses left Darfur, as the government seemed determined to make happen.

When I questioned him about his decision to enter without a visa -- something many foreign correspondents have done in recent years -- he acknowledged the misjudgment. He was in a hurry to complete a project on the Sahel region running along the Sahara's southern edge. Obtaining a visa to Sudan took months, if it came at all, and he wanted a single scene from Darfur for his story. With luck, he would have been back in Chad the next day. But all his luck that day was bad. And he made other mistakes, too, such as carrying several notebooks that he had filled in Chad. They gave Sudan's government plenty of evidence to convict him. To make matters worse, rain flooded a gully on his potential escape route. When the rebels arrived, there was nowhere to retreat to.

Salopek had made a career of illuminating the lives of the world's least powerful people caught in forces beyond their control; now, he had become a character in a quintessential Paul Salopek-type story, though when I spoke to him it was not clear whether he would ever publish it.

He seemed untroubled when I left each night, usually after two hours or more of conversation. He was ready to stay if that was his fate. But he appeared frustrated, knowing that I was leaving to report on the conflict that had drawn him here, but that was now out of his reach.

The last few days we met, it became clear that Salopek's situation was set to improve. His wife, Linda Lynch, Tribune Editor Ann Marie Lipinski and National Geographic Editor Chris Johns were on their way to Khartoum, the capital of Sudan, as part of a mission led by Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, where Salopek has a home. It was unlikely, we all knew, that President Omar Hassan al-Bashir had summoned them only to send them away empty-handed. As the endgame approached, the small contingent of U.S. diplomatic and military officials who had made it their mission to keep Salopek as safe and comfortable as possible began preparing for his departure. A Marine major wielding electric clippers gave him a high-and-tight haircut beneath a full moon. An Air Force lieutenant colonel shared some of his stash of premium cigars. The Americans also stepped up their quiet campaign of bribery for the courthouse staff -- delivering food, water and the occasional plastic tarp to make sure the mood at the prison stayed upbeat.

The day Salopek was freed, Saturday, Sept. 9, he and his two Chadian colleagues sat behind a small row of orange-painted bars, waiting for the judge to rule. It was the only time I saw Salopek bend his head in the pose of defeat, though maybe it was submission or exhaustion or relief. Moments later, at Bashir's request, the judge pardoned them all. They walked out free men, after 35 days in captivity.

In the glare of sunlight, Salopek exchanged hugs with most of his captors, including the judge, who urged him to write "a good story" about his time in Sudan. Salopek's many saviors -- his wife, his editors, Richardson and the U.S. officials -- were jubilant as he drove away, then boarded a plane to Khartoum for the first leg of the long journey home to New Mexico. I could see by the body language of the guards, who had grown accustomed to the warm smiles and steady bribes delivered by their star prisoner, that they were sorry to see him go.

In a strange, selfish way, so was I.

North Korea's No. 2 Leader Blasts U.S. (AP)

By Vanessa Arrington, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

North Korea's No. 2 leader blamed the lack of world peace on the United States Saturday at the Nonaligned Summit, saying that because of its failure to respect the sovereignty of other nations, "the international order is destroyed."

Parliament leader Kim Yong Nam said desires for peace by the 118 countries in the Nonaligned Movement were "confronted with grave challenges owing to the high-handed acts and unilateralism of the superpower, which denies countries and nations the independent choice of development."

The resulting imbalance in global politics constitutes "grave threats to world peace and security," he said.

It was the latest anti-American statement at a meeting that has brought together some of the staunchest U.S. foes, including the presidents of Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe.

The summit opened Friday when Cuba took over the three-year leadership of the group from Malaysia. Cuba's Defense Minister Raul Castro stood in place of his ailing brother, Fidel Castro, who is recovering from intestinal surgery.

The United States has declined an invitation to attend the Nonaligned summit in Havana and said it would have no comment on any of the proceedings.

Fidel Castro has yet to make an appearance at the summit, but has met with individual leaders in private, including U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika. Photos and video of the one-on-one encounters in Cuban state media show Castro in his pajamas — likely an unusual sight for summit participants.

Kim also defended the North's nuclear program amid concerns the communist country may be preparing to carry out an atomic weapons test.

North Korea "has been left with no other option but to possess nuclear weapons as a self-defensive deterrent," he said. "The DPRK would not need even a single nuclear weapon if there no longer existed a U.S. threat."

DPRK stands for Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the North's official name.

DOJ_NMG_0065061

Kim said U.S. financial restrictions aimed at Pyongyang have created a deadlock in six-nation talks on its nuclear program, pushing the issue into "an unpredictable phase."

Recently, the United States has moved to sever North Korea's connections to outside banks, alleging any transactions conducted by the Pyongyang regime are suspect and could be connected to illegal activity — including money laundering and counterfeiting U.S. dollars.

Nuclear talks among the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States were last held in November, when negotiators failed to make progress on implementing an agreement in which the North pledged to give up its nuclear programs in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

"The DPRK will never go back to the talks under U.S. sanctions," Kim said.

Also Saturday, Pakistan and India agreed to restart peace talks that were suspended after train bombings killed more than 200 people in Mumbai in June — part of a wave of attacks India blames on Pakistan-based militants.

Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed to Cabinet-level talks by their foreign secretaries after meeting on the sidelines of the summit. Singh also accepted an invitation to travel to Pakistan to further the peace process.

"I look forward to a purposeful visit at a time to be determined through diplomatic channels," Singh said after the meeting with Musharraf.

The Pakistani leader added: "We had a cordial, frank exchange of views on all aspects of India and Pakistan relations. It was agreed that the peace process must be obtained."

New Delhi blames Pakistan's support of the militants for stalling the peace process between the nuclear-armed neighbors, which have fought three wars since gaining independence from Britain in 1947, two over the Himalayan region of Kashmir.

More than a dozen militant groups are fighting to make Kashmir independent from Hindu-majority India or merge it with Muslim-dominated Pakistan. The insurgency has claimed 65,000 lives.

The Nonaligned Movement was formed during the Cold War to establish a neutral third path in a world divided by the United States and the Soviet Union.

Anti-U.S. Allies Back Iran Nukes (WT)

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

From combined dispatches

HAVANA -- Developing countries yesterday wrapped up a multinational summit with North Korea charging that U.S. threats drove it to acquire deterrent atomic weapons and Iran winning solid support for its nuclear ambitions.

Iran, Venezuela and Cuba joined North Korea in leading efforts to forge an anti-U.S. alliance. Summit leaders, in a statement on Iran, "reaffirmed the basic and inalienable right of all states to develop research, production and use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes."

They warned that any attack or threat against any nuclear facility used for peaceful purposes was a violation of international law.

North Korea took the opportunity to assail the United States for unilateral actions against individual countries and called for a revitalization of the 118-nation Non-Aligned Movement (NAM).

"The United States is attempting to deprive other countries of even their legitimate right to peaceful nuclear activities," said North Korea's second-ranking leader, Kim Yong-nam.

Mr. Kim blamed Washington for "threatening Korea using all sorts of maneuvers, accusing it of being part of an 'Axis of Evil.'"

He added: "Korea has nuclear arms as a deterrent to firmly guarantee the peace and security of the Korean Peninsula and the region."

The leaders' statement on Iran, released as the meeting ended, was an updated version of a document adopted in May at a NAM ministerial meeting in Malaysia.

They stressed that the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency found that all nuclear material declared by Iran had been accounted for.

Governments with friendly ties to Washington, among them India, Pakistan, Chile, Peru and Colombia, sought to steer the summit away from confrontation and finger-pointing at the United States.

"I do not see this summit as anti-U.S.," Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi told reporters. "NAM has been set up not to be anti-any country."

The NAM leaders called for a negotiated settlement to the nuclear dispute with Iran. The United States is pushing for sanctions to force Tehran to stop producing enriched uranium, which can be used both for both nuclear power and atomic weapons.

Leaders took turns on the podium to decry global poverty, unfair trade practices and "arbitrary" actions by the United States and other powerful nations that they complained controlled the United Nations.

In a concrete result, nuclear-armed neighbors India and Pakistan agreed to resume formal peace negotiations that were frozen after the July train bombings in Bombay that killed nearly 200 people.

Cuban President Fidel Castro, a symbol of opposition to Washington, was scheduled to preside over the summit, but was too ill to attend.

Mr. Castro received U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan in a dressing gown in his hospital room. The 80-year-old communist leader, who took power in a revolution in 1959, ceded power temporarily to his brother, Raul, on July 31 after undergoing surgery to stop intestinal bleeding.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, with his penchant for banter and controversy, dominated the summit opening Friday, pledging support for Iran if it is attacked by the United States.

Other countries called for moderation. A Colombian delegate said friendlier nations had tried to soften the anti-U.S. content of the final statement.

The summit brought together some states not only impatient with what they see as a U.S.-dominated United Nations, but eager to strengthen the NAM as an alternative and to foster cooperation within the Third World.

"The United States is turning the Security Council into a platform for imposing its policies. ... We should reinforce NAM, and it should play its role more efficiently," Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Friday at the summit.

Group Puts Focus On N. Korea Rights (WT)

By Se Jeong Kim, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

Liberty in North Korea, a 2-year-old organization with a global reach, has found success drawing attention to human rights atrocities in the isolated communist state.

Its latest effort featured an airing of the movie "Seoul Train" at the American University in Northwest last week. The film opens with a small North Korean boy wandering around a market, searching the ground for bits of food to eat.

In another scene, a family of five attempts to enter the Japanese Embassy in Beijing, but Chinese guards drag them out. According to the film, all were arrested but were eventually granted asylum in South Korea.

The 1995 documentary by filmmakers Jim Butterworth, Lisa Sleeth and Aaron Lubarsky depicts the life-and-death struggle faced by North Koreans who attempt to flee their homeland through China.

"I didn't know specifically how many refugees there were, how many people tried to leave so often, how many were sent back, and how hard it was at all," said Mark Devries, a sophomore at the American University.

Established in 2004, Liberty in North Korea (LINK) coordinates programs raising awareness of North Korean human rights issues, said its executive director, Adrian Hong. LINK has 70 chapters around the world, including in Japan, South Korea and Belgium.

"The more public opinion is shaped on the issue, the more likely governments [will] move on the issue," Mr. Hong said.

That awareness, he said, is bringing tangible results. In 2004, Congress passed the North Korean Human Rights Act unanimously.

In 2005, Jay Lefkowitz was appointed as special envoy for North Korean human rights by President Bush. This year, for the first time, the United States granted asylum to six North Korean refugees.

"Silence is death. By purposefully ignoring the suffering that's happening there [North Korea], it causes more death and despair to North Korean people," said Suzanne Scholte, chairman of a separate organization, North Korean Freedom Coalition. "South Korea must stand up for the rights of the Korean people, whether born in the North or South," she said. Mrs. Scholte's group is part of Freedom House, founded by Eleanor Roosevelt.

The North Korea regime of President Kim Jong-il has endured famine during the past decade, leaving millions of people dead. Tens of thousands have fled to China, hoping to eventually resettle in South Korea or some other country. If caught they are automatically repatriated to North Korea, where they are sent to detention camps and sometimes beaten to death.

Far Across The DMZ (NYT)

By Mary Chi-whi Kim

DOJ_NMG_0065063

Last December, after 55 years, members of our South Korean family reunited with northern relatives for two hours via satellite. It was one of hundreds of such virtual reunions that the Red Cross has organized for families who have been separated since the 1953 armistice split the country in half.

This was the first time I had ever seen my aunt Bo Ok. My father talked about her in his long prayers blessing our Thanksgiving feasts in America, where we have made our home, but he had not seen her since he was 14. Living in Seoul decades ago, my grandfather could not raise school tuition for both Bo Ok, his firstborn, and my father, his eldest son. He chose his eldest son and sent Bo Ok away to a country village to take the government-financed teacher training there. Persuaded by teachers to pursue more free education, she chose to go north. My grandfather was the last family member to see her; this was on Sept. 27, 1950, just before the United States reoccupied Seoul, still smoldering from bombardment.

On screen, in front of tan drapes in a modest office, Bo Ok flickered alive — a gray-haired matriarch sitting upright at a conference table stocked with bottled water. Her black traditional hanbok dress glimmered with silver beading and 12 military medals. I was startled to see her plump cheeks; I wondered if perhaps extra rations had been allotted before this reunion. She resembled my grandmother, but her fierce eyes cut through the screen. Seated to her right was her eldest son, in his 30's, with jutting cheekbones and a crew cut, dressed just as an American would dress for a funeral. He folded his handkerchief into a perfect square and repeatedly swabbed his gaunt forehead, cheeks, chin and eyes.

In a half-strangled voice, Father read his six-page letter, prepared over the previous two weeks. He had heard about the experience of others who participated in these reunions, in which the northern relatives kept expounding Communist rhetoric, essentially blocking dialogue with southerners. So Father spoke without letting up for an hour and a half, releasing 50 years of memories and dreams about his sister. He told her of our family's life in the United States.

"Sister, in his last moments, our father called for you," he said. "Our mother, on your birthday every March, stared out the window for you. We all did. I'm 70 now. Whenever I see a high-school girl with hair like yours, I become 14 again, searching for my big sister. Had I known, I would have told you this: I love you."

I was stunned by his open declaration. Bo Ok smiled, seemingly indulgent of the American influence that would allow him to speak this way. But sobs escaped from other constricted throats, and tears glistened on both sides of the Demilitarized Zone and on both sides of the Pacific.

He described their ancestral graveyard, which rests on a hometown hillside in the South. "When we got your letter in 2002, we were able finally to have every descendant's name engraved in the lineage on the back of headstones. When you come south," he paused for one second, "you will see all your names waiting there for you." He detailed the lineage on the southern side, counting off the children of his other sister and brother and introducing us, his four grown daughters.

"Rich in daughters, eh?" Bo Ok said. Everyone laughed.

"I have three daughters," she said. "Two sons." Her eyes lighted up. "My eldest daughter is a basketball player who heads the athletic program. Lots of awards. Takes after me, good athlete, good runner."

Bo Ok took 15 minutes to recount 50 years. She was serving as a nurse during the Korean War when a bomb severed her left leg. She was working as a technical editor when she met her husband. After another bomb, both his legs were amputated. "Two cripples married and raised five kids," she said. "Only possible through government help.

"Since I came north, the Honorable Leader cared for us — no hardship, plenty of food, enough to live. How else could two cripples do it? Fifty-five years since I left, I am treated well as a wounded veteran." I looked to my cousin's hollowed cheeks and then at Bo Ok's medal-covered chest.

My father spoke up: "Let us sing 'Tong Il Jang' together." The song was written by southerners to blend the national anthems of both Koreas and is now well known in the North and the South alike. My father's tenor took up the words: "Our hope is for one country, we pray even in dreams." We clapped and sang in unison, and the two-hour satellite meeting began to end.

My aunt's eyes clouded as the screen darkened to black.

Peacekeeping Grows, Strains U.N. (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Group's Troop Numbers Across Globe to Hit New High

UNITED NATIONS -- The United Nations is set to field its largest peacekeeping enterprise in its 61-year history, with more than 100,000 troops and police to be deployed by year's end in missions around the world.

The number could climb -- past 115,000 -- if Sudan accepts a new peacekeeping mission for Darfur, and costs for the forces could surpass $7 billion a year, more than double the $3 billion spent in 2000.

The unprecedented growth in peacekeeping operations is placing strains on the United Nations' capacity to respond to emerging crises in various parts of the world and is draining the pool of available troops both for the world body and for NATO.

Global leaders will address those issues this week at annual appearances before the U.N. General Assembly. "When you look around the world today, we are stretched," U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan told reporters last week as he highlighted major themes for the session.

The latest surge in U.N. peacekeeping surpasses the previous peak, in the early 1990s, when more than 80,000 troops served in more than a dozen international missions, including major operations in Cambodia, Bosnia and Somalia.

It also marks the end of a retreat in funding for new missions by the United States, which was reluctant to approve risky and costly undertakings in Rwanda and other conflict zones after the deaths in 1993 of more than 18 U.S. Army Rangers at the hands of Somali militias. The United States still refuses to place its ground troops under U.N. command.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said that the Bush administration continues to have misgivings about the organization's fitness to effectively manage its peacekeeping operations but that a proliferation of crises has forced U.S. support. "The requirements to establish or change existing peacekeeping missions are dictated by circumstances in the world, and that's why we have responded as we have," Bolton said.

The U.N. Security Council last month authorized an increase of more than 40 percent in the overall size of the peacekeeping force, including 1,600 police officers for East Timor and 13,000 additional troops for Lebanon, where the United Nations is trying to prevent a resumption of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah. The council also authorized more than 22,000 peacekeepers for Darfur, where government-backed militias are believed responsible for the deaths of hundreds of thousands of civilians and the displacement of more than 2 million people.

The Sudanese government, however, has refused to allow the United Nations to send peacekeepers to Darfur and has ably played on Western fears of entering a military quagmire. "The Sudanese have been very clear in exploiting some of these issues, saying, 'If you want to have another Iraq, come,' and this scared away some governments," Annan said.

U.N. officials have expressed concern that creation of these large missions carries risks for some of the organization's less visible operations, particularly in African countries such as Ivory Coast and Congo.

"The risk that there is going to be political neglect is high," Jean-Marie GuÃ©henno, the U.N.'s undersecretary for peacekeeping, said in an interview. "Darfur could be a victim of that overstretch."

According to a paper by Security Council Report, a private monitoring group, "There is simply no precedent in the United Nations for an increase in operations of this magnitude in the space of twenty days." The paper added: "It will present huge management challenges for the United Nations, which has been struggling to improve its capacity to manage the growth in peacekeeping operations."

The United Nations' critics in Congress have highlighted its failure to stamp out corruption in spending programs and to rein in sexual abuses against minors in several peacekeeping missions. The House has passed legislation threatening to cut off funding to the organization if it fails to prove it can better manage its costs.

"I can't say we go into this with a great deal of confidence, but we go into this with a sense that this has got to be done," Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) said of the new missions in Lebanon and Sudan. "The bottom line is right now there aren't a lot of choices."

The Bush administration has struggled to contain U.N. peacekeeping costs by ending or scaling back existing operations to make way for new ones. That strategy backfired in East Timor, where violence erupted between military factions after U.N. troops pulled out. The United States and other Security Council members responded last month by approving a new force of 1,600 U.N. police for East Timor.

Despite its initial reservations about the virtues of U.N. nation-building, the Bush administration has led efforts to reinforce existing operations and create new ones for Haiti, Liberia, Sudan and Lebanon. It has repeatedly approved operations in countries where it has few national interests.

"You still have this rhetoric about the United Nations being a broken, fractured, incompetent and undependable organization," said James Dobbins, a senior foreign policy emissary for the Clinton and Bush administrations and author of a recent study by the Rand Corp. on U.N. peacekeeping. However, "There is no doubt that the Bush administration . . . embraces the concept of nation-building to a degree the Clinton administration couldn't have gotten away with it."

Dobbins credits the United Nations with providing some of the most inexpensive peacekeeping services in the world, saying it costs $45,000 a year to fund a U.N. peacekeeper, compared with $200,000 to deploy one NATO soldier. He also said the organization relies on a small number of military planners and headquarters staff members to launch a mission. "Four hundred to 600 people are managing the largest expeditionary force in the world other than that of the United States. It's bigger than NATO and the European Union put together," he said.

By James Traub, James Traub's Latest Book, "The Best Intentions: Kofi Annan And The U.n. In The Era Of American Worl

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Kofi Annan has revalidated and sharpened the U.N.'s role, regardless of his reputation to the contrary.

THE CAREER of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, which will come to an end Dec. 31 with the completion of his second five-year term, has been bookended by dramatic peacemaking trips to the Middle East.

During the first, in February 1998, he headed off an impending U.S. bombing attack on Iraq by persuading Saddam Hussein to permit U.N. weapons inspectors to return to the country. The Daniel-in-the-lions'-den imagery of that meeting cemented his budding reputation as a moral hero. Last month, the 68-year-old Ghanaian returned from a lightning tour of Middle Eastern states with an agreement to lift Israel's suffocating embargo of Lebanon and reassurances about the brittle cease-fire established by a Security Council resolution.

This is the stuff of diplomatic melodrama — save that the props often turn out to be made of papier-mache. The Baghdad entente of 1998 began to fall apart soon after Annan returned to New York, and by December, British and American warplanes were striking targets in Iraq during four nights of heavy bombardment. As for the recent cease-fire between Israel and Hezbollah, it could give way at any moment because the United Nations lacks the mandate and the capability to disarm the Shiite militia.

In both cases, Annan did everything humanly possible, but a secretary-general, for all that we romanticize him, can do very little to alter the fundamental calculations of states. As the United Nations begins in earnest to choose a replacement for Annan, we must bear in mind that a secretary-general is, in the end, a creature of the geopolitical moment.

A U.N. truism holds that secretaries-general have good first terms and bad second ones. The arc of Annan's career certainly conforms to type. But that's not because he ran out of gas or because he exhausted his store of political capital. Rather, Annan had good luck followed by very, very bad luck.

From 1997 through 2000, the world was largely at peace, none of the horrific civil wars in the Third World rose to genocidal proportions, and the White House was occupied by an internationalist Democrat. Then, in rapid succession, a unilaterally-minded Republican took office, 9/11 shattered the interval of peace, the U.S. invaded Iraq in the teeth of international opposition and one of Sudan's interminable ethnic conflicts erupted into a scorched-earth war. The man who had won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2001 suddenly looked hapless, even pitiful.

Annan's detractors see it differently. They believe that he is very much the author of his own misfortunes. In late 2004, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) called for the secretary-general to resign, accusing him of tolerating an atmosphere of corruption inside the U.N. as the Iraqi oil-for-food scandal unfolded. Others critics in the West have insisted that Annan is hostile to Israel and to Washington's legitimate security interests.

In the developing world, on the other hand, Annan is regularly denounced as Washington's puppet, a charge often flung in his face during his recent swing through the Middle East. Others with no ideological ax to grind, including U.N. insiders, feel that Annan is far too much a creature of the U.N. (where he spent about 30 years before becoming secretary-general) to change its entrenched culture of patronage and idle paper-pushing.

But secretaries-general should be judged according to what they can do, and not what they can't. Even the great Dag Hammarskjold, the Swedish diplomat who served as the second U.N. chief, could do nothing to blunt the hostilities of the Cold War, including the Soviet invasion of Hungary in 1956. Hammarskjold's greatness lay elsewhere: in the immense prestige he lent to his office through the sheer force of his rhetoric and majestic impartiality, and in the development of a wholly new form of intervention known as peacekeeping. Hammarskjold made the U.N. matter as it had not before. Under him, it grew; under his successors — at least until Annan took over — it generally shrank. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, the gifted but sharp-tongued and imperious Egyptian who preceded Annan, so irked policymakers in Washington, including U.N. supporters, that he practically put the institution out of business.

Annan did not get the Nobel Peace Prize for temporarily averting war in Iraq. In fact, he did something harder: He restored the relevance of the U.N. The new U.N. head brought Washington back into the fold through a combination of unflagging solicitude and gentle prodding. Annan's promulgation of a new spirit of self-criticism brought the U.N. to anatomize the mistakes that led to the peacekeeping fiascos in Somalia, Bosnia and Rwanda in the 1990s. This, in turn, encouraged the U.S. and other states to fund new ventures in Sierra Leone, East Timor, the Congo and elsewhere. Finally, Annan restored the status of moral arbiter — of "secular pope" — with which Hammarskjold had first imbued the office.

Here one comes to the aspect of the job easiest to underestimate, or even to ridicule: The power of words. Does it really matter that in 1997, during his first trip to Africa as secretary-general, Annan preached to the continent's gathered heads of state about respect for human rights, admonishing them that to "treat it as an imposition, if not a plot, by the industrialized West" is "demeaning of the yearning for human dignity that resides in every African heart"?

Nine years later, that yearning for dignity is still routinely trampled. Yet Annan's insistence on the universality of human rights has produced a kind of atmospheric change: Third World potentates no longer dismiss human rights as a Western preoccupation. And Annan's willingness to upbraid African leaders on behalf of Western principles — something Boutros-Ghali would never do — gave him the freedom to make demands of the West on issues of development.

The U.N. Annan inherited was a protector of states and their prerogatives; the one he wishes, somewhat forlornly, to leave behind would be a protector of individuals — even against the state. Perhaps the most resonant words he has spoken during his decade in office came during his 1999 address to the General Assembly, when he defined the "core challenge" of the institution as ensuring that "massive and systematic violations of human rights — wherever they may take place — should not be allowed to stand."

Annan's support for the doctrine of "humanitarian intervention" was widely praised in the West and almost as widely condemned in the developing world, where it was seen as a license to violate sovereignty. The issue became unavoidable, and in its 60th anniversary meeting last year, the General Assembly formally accepted the principle that states had a responsibility to protect their own citizens and a duty to intervene to stop extreme cases of abuse in other countries.

To which, of course, one might say: Words are cheap. Indeed, Darfur's endless agonies seem to have been scheduled in order to expose the gross hypocrisy of "the international community." No country, including the U.S., which has been in the forefront of efforts to respond to the atrocities, has suggested sending troops against the will of the Sudanese government — the ultimate "responsibility" entailed in the responsibility to protect. But Annan, who as head of U.N. peacekeeping in 1994 was famously silent about the growing threat in Rwanda, has been a voice in the wilderness when it comes to Darfur.

In the end, the U.N. may be institutionally incapable of meeting this core challenge, in which case Annan's perverse achievement has been to demonstrate the limits of the institution to which he has devoted his life. But the moral imperative remains, as a club with which to beat the recalcitrant and a goad with which to prod the reluctant.

No matter what one thinks of Annan, there can be no doubt about the success of his campaign to revalidate the U.N. (for which many others also deserve to share credit). The U.N. fields more than 80,000 peacekeepers, and by deploying a muscular force in Lebanon, it is playing an indispensable role in the Mideast for the first time in decades. On matters such as development, in which in the past it had only a peripheral role, the U.N. has helped shape the debate by promulgating the Millennium Development Goals in 2000.

Annan wants the U.N. to be so much more than it is, but it sometimes feels like he's the only one who does. His highly ambitious campaign to reform the institution's doctrines and machinery barely avoided catastrophic failure; the achievements, on humanitarian intervention and human rights enforcement and "peace-building," were almost eclipsed by the divisiveness of the debate itself. And despite Annan's very cordial relations with President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the next secretary-general may face an even tougher job of incorporating the U.S. into the U.N. than Annan did.

One comes back, always, to the geopolitical facts of life. The U.N., at least that part dealing with issues of peace and security, cannot be any more effective than its most powerful members want or permit it to be. If China and Russia defend the sovereign rights of abusive regimes tooth and nail, if the U.S. treats the Security Council as either a nuisance or a rubber stamp, if leading Third World nations view reform as a conspiracy designed to rob them of power, then it won't make much difference who succeeds Annan.

The common ground to which Annan is forever beckoning his refractory members seems to exist mostly in his mind. For all Annan's emollient efforts, the atmosphere at U.N. headquarters right now is suffused with acrimony. You do have to wonder sometimes why anybody would want the job at all.

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

AS KOFI ANNAN'S tenure as United Nations secretary-general limps to its inglorious close, the prestige and even the future of the world organization he came into office determined to revitalize could scarcely seem bleaker.

In the minds of many Americans, the U.N. is little more than a glorified talking shop in which hostility to the United States is perhaps the only common denominator and whose impotence is matched only by its corruption.

Though popular with Americans when he first took over in 1997, Annan — who unwisely came back from a meeting with Saddam Hussein proclaiming that the Iraqi dictator was a man he could "do business with" — soon came to be seen as exemplifying all of the U.N.'s faults. Paradoxically, in much of the world, the U.N. and Annan are denounced for being too servile to Washington — an impression that was certainly bolstered during the recent G-8 meeting near St. Petersburg, Russia, when President Bush was caught saying on an open microphone that he was tempted to "tell Kofi" to call Syrian President Bashar Assad to get him to rein in Hezbollah.

In such an atmosphere of poisonous disenchantment, it is hardly surprising that many U.N. officials (including Annan himself, according to some insiders) despair of the organization's prospects. A few senior people remain upbeat, notably Undersecretary-General Shashi Tharoor, a longtime member of Annan's inner circle who is mounting a strong campaign to succeed him.

But for the most part, pessimism reigns, and understandably so: After all, the U.N., which was intended by its founders to be the premier institution for assuring peace and security in the world, now seems to lurch from crisis to crisis in a global environment that offers little peace and even less security.

In fact, despite the personal popularity Annan enjoyed before 9/11, the U.N. already had been marginalized institutionally as a guarantor of peace and security. The dismal failures of its peacekeeping operations in Bosnia (where at least 8,000 people died in Srebrenica alone in a U.N.-protected "safe area" in 1995) and Rwanda (where more than 800,000 Tutsis and moderate Hutus were killed while U.N. peacekeepers looked on impotently in 1994) seemed to suggest that the U.N. was simply too divided and too weak to keep peace, let alone restore it in a conflict zone.

By the same token, NATO's success (undertaken without Security Council authorization) in rolling back Slobodan Milosevic's campaign of mass deportation in Kosovo and other unilateral interventions, like that of the British military in Sierra Leone in 2000, which succeeded where a U.N.-sanctioned mission had failed, offered the prospect of effective global peace and security initiatives in which the U.N. would play little or no role. Instead of the sclerotic multilateralism that had failed to save the Rwandans or the Bosnians, we had entered an age of dynamic, unilateral peacekeeping and humanitarian intervention.

Or so ran the conventional wisdom, anyway. In retrospect, viewed through the prism of seemingly unwinnable wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, the picture looks rather different. In a world in which the so-called clash of civilizations is no longer an academic hypothesis but increasingly a reality, at least in the minds and hearts of enormous numbers of ordinary Muslims and Christians who each see the other as bent on all-out war (call it jihad or crusade, it makes little difference), the limits of what Western militaries can accomplish politically has become obvious.

To cite only one obvious example: If the population of Darfur were Buddhist, Hindu or Christian, there would be little risk in sending U.S. or Western European troops to protect them. But because Sudan is a Muslim country, the dispatch of a Christian army there is, rightly or wrongly, almost certain to be understood by much of the Muslim world at large not as a humanitarian effort but as an extension of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. Or, to put it another way, one of the unintended consequences of the Iraq war has been to render unilateral humanitarian intervention by the West in the Islamic world suspect in the eyes of many Muslims.

What this means is that unilateralism — and the reliance on "coalitions of the willing" — which seemed so promising in the late-1990s, has turned out not to be a viable alternative to the U.N. system after all. Anyone doubting this need only look at the central role that Annan and the U.N. Security Council played in halting the recent fighting between Israel and Hezbollah. From the outset, it was clear that the Bush administration would have to work through the U.N. and that only a peacekeeping force sanctioned by the world body could possibly be viewed as legitimate by the Lebanese or be effective in maintaining the cease-fire.

Even in the case of the Iranian nuclear program, which the Bush administration has described as posing an existential threat to U.S. security, Washington has opted to work through the traditional channels of Security Council resolutions and U.N.-sanctioned multilateral diplomacy.

In other words, and certainly not through lack of trying, even the most die-hard unilateralists have come to the realization that there is really no viable alternative to the U.N., however much they might wish it otherwise. How else to explain U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton — a man who is on record as having said that if 10 stories were removed from the U.N. headquarters building no one would notice the difference — behaving these days like a U.N. booster?

The hard fact is that, despite its fallen reputation and its many failures, the U.N.'s future is perfectly viable because no one has a good alternative to propose. Iraq has certainly demonstrated the American public's lack of willingness to tolerate long, costly exercises in imperial nation-building. And neither former colonial powers like Britain and France nor rising new powers like China and India want the job of securing peace and security in the world. Which leaves … the U.N.

Obviously, this is a negative endorsement, not a ringing accolade, and there is no reason to think that the world body is suddenly going to become more effective in guaranteeing global stability. But just as even Annan's severest critics have ended up appealing to him in many of the gravest international crises of the last decade, so they will likely tread the same path to the door of his successor, whether it turns out to be Shashi Tharoor of India, South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon or some other candidate.

Doubtless they will do so with bad grace, reluctantly and with the full knowledge of how powerless the U.N. actually is. But they will do so nonetheless because there is no viable alternative and because, in this age of civilizational clash and global turbulence, it is far too dangerous for them to do anything else.

Lighten Up On Bolton (LAT)

Jonah Goldberg

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

He's smart, tough and willing to stick it to the U.N.

I SPEAK NOW not so much in praise of John Bolton as in dispraise of Boltophobia. Bolton is a fine man, a sharp intellectual, a committed public servant and has the most aggressive mustache in American politics today. He's done a first-rate job as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations during his yearlong interim appointment, and were it not for the waffling of Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee, who has sorta-kinda-maybe changed his mind on Bolton in order to get reelected in liberal Rhode Island, we wouldn't be having this conversation.

Even Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio), who's had a feck transplant since his acute bout of fecklessness last year — when he melodramatically decided that he couldn't support Bolton — has changed his mind. His reason for his opposition back then: Bolton was a meanie. The U.N., Voinovich seemed to be suggesting, needs more Hallmark card moments, and Bolton doesn't come with heart-shaped candies and a tickle-me button on his tummy for the ambassador from Syria to poke when he's blue.

Instead, in Voinovich's view, Bolton was a "kiss-up, kick-down" kind of guy, which made a weepy Voinovich "worried about my kids and my grandchildren." We now know that Voinovich was simply a victim of Boltophobia, a kind of St. Vitus' dance that causes otherwise reasonable people to go into twitching fits over the fact that Bolton doesn't love the U.N. enough. The problem is most Americans agree with Bolton that the U.N. is a cesspool of its own crapulence, stealing American tax dollars intended for global do-goodery while working against American interests.

"We can't argue that this guy is unfit just because he's said mean things about the U.N.," a "top Senate Democrat" admitted to Time magazine last year. "Don't forget, most Americans agree with him."

So instead, his opponents went after him by launching a bizarre assault on his character, using partisan and sometimes loopy accounts of his behavior from more than a decade ago. (Remember Melody Townsel? The Dallas woman who said that Bolton had chased her down the halls of a hotel in Moscow in 1994, throwing things at her and "behaving like a madman.") Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut — who's reportedly hated Bolton for decades because of disagreements over Latin America policy — hysterically claimed that Bolton's behavior toward subordinates "ought to be indictable," and California Sen. Barbara Boxer wanted to send him to "anger management counseling." It was all nonsense, and everyone knew it.

The real, underlying issue was that Bolton (like most Americans) thinks that the U.N. is the problem, while those infected with Boltophobia think that it's the solution — and that the U.S. is the problem.

It is a conflict of visions. Bolton thinks that his role is to use the U.N. as a tool for advancing American interests, and if that means we need to work with others, then hurray for working with others. Boltophobes believe that working with others is its own reward and that any talk of U.S. interests that doesn't involve ceding more sovereignty to Turtle Bay is denounced as "cowboy unilateralism." Bolton believes that his job is to conduct the foreign policy of the president of the United States. Boltophobes think our ambassador to the U.N. should also work as the U.N.'s goodwill ambassador to us. Bolton thinks that he should follow the examples of Jeane Kirkpatrick and Daniel Patrick Moynihan as a vocal and principled defender of American ideals. Boltophobes think that this is hubristic Bush-speak.

Depending on which of these visions you subscribe to, Bolton has either been terrible or terrific. He has rallied the Security Council behind important resolutions on Iran, North Korea and the Israel-Hezbollah cease-fire. He scuttled Kofi Annan's attempts to ban weapons in space and to, in effect, tax wealthy nations through a wealth transfer scheme that ignores U.N. inefficiency and corruption. He stood on principle against the whitewash restructuring of the U.N. Human Rights Commission, which has been more likely to include human rights abusers than to condemn them (earning him praise from the New York Times). And he has put the onus on the U.N. to prove its relevance by fighting genocide in Darfur and cleaning its own Augean stables on the East River.

There's no cure for Boltophobia. The best we can do is keep it from controlling our lives. And that means Bolton should be confirmed. Let the man do his job.

Give Bolton The Boot (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

The U.S. shouldn't have an ineffective bully as its U.N. envoy.

ALL SUMMER, the Bush administration has been pressuring the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to make John Bolton the permanent U.S. envoy to the United Nations. Bolton is serving until January on a temporary assignment because his notorious anti-U.N. reputation and difficult temperament (among other things) made the Republican-controlled committee unwilling to confirm him to the post last year.

Now, Bolton has had 12 months to show his stuff. And frankly, there is still no evidence to suggest that he deserves a full-time posting.

Bolton has never been a diplomat — which, among his supporters, is regarded as a mark of honor. He hails from the Republican Party's extreme conservative wing. Bush chose him to please the most fervent right-wingers in his administration, most of whom either scorn or want to terminate the United Nations.

Bolton has for a long time been an excessive and unrestrained critic of the U.N. Among his infamous utterances: that it wouldn't make a difference if 10 stories were sliced off the U.N. building; that the U.S. has no obligation to pay its dues to the organization; that the Security Council should be reduced to one member, namely the U.S. And, perhaps his most notable sally, that "there's no such thing as the United Nations."

His record since taking over as ambassador in August 2005 has shown that his adversarial stance toward the institution has not softened. In his first month as U.N. envoy, he gleefully undermined the most comprehensive reform movement in U.N. history by insisting on the adoption of hundreds of irrelevant amendments that were never going to be accepted by the General Assembly.

Later, when the U.N. did agree on one important change — creating a new, reformed Human Rights Council — he argued furiously against it, rallied just three other nations to the cause (out of 191) and eventually saw the U.S. go down to a humiliating defeat. Then he turned around and said he would work with the council and help it financially but not join it. Which left Washington looking not just like a loser, but a whiny one at that. As Sen. Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.) remarked, Bolton was not just a bully, but an "ineffective" one.

In furtherance of his mission, Bolton also has promoted various pet causes at the institution. For example, when issues of population control or limiting the use of small arms come up, he brings into his office antiabortion activists and National Rifle Assn. members, respectively, to take the other side.

He has, on occasion, reportedly sneaked around his own nominal boss, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to Vice President Dick Cheney's office to get support for his own hard-line views at the U.N. — for example, his refusal last summer to endorse the U.N.'s Millennium Development Goals aimed at reducing poverty in the developing world. Rice eventually forced him to reverse that stance.

To the extent that he has been able to operate at all at the United Nations — most recently in the Israel-Hezbollah cease-fire — he has had to bow to a new realism within the Bush administration, and yes, sometimes, to international pressure. Even then, though, according to published news reports, he doesn't get along well with our allies. His bristling nature has left many bruised feelings among his colleagues. His accomplishments are marginal at best. He may be among the most ineffective envoys the United States has ever sent to the U.N.

Just when the administration thought Bolton was finally going to be approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) began to raise questions about Bolton's performance and pushed to delay the vote. The Bush administration is said to be exploring other ways to keep Bolton in the job.

A responsible nation that intends to harmonize differing viewpoints and work out compromises to further U.S. national security interests makes a serious error in appointing a Jacobin to work inside a collegial global body.

Bolton's presence on the same roster with previous U.S. envoys such as Henry Cabot Lodge, Adlai Stevenson, Arthur Goldberg, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, Madeleine Albright, Richard Holbrooke and Bush appointees John Negroponte and John Danforth — or, for that matter, with George H.W. Bush — is a blemish on our nation. His nomination should be rejected again by the Senate.

Cambodia Greets A Cash Invasion (LAT)

By Don Lee, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

The fledging democracy has opened its arms to a Chinese spending spree, but U.S. officials are watching warily

American diplomats made a big splash early this year when they opened an embassy near Wat Phnom, the sacred hill of temples where Phnom Penh was founded.

U.S. Ambassador Joseph A. Mussomeli trumpeted the three-story marble-and-granite outpost as a "powerful symbol" of American interests in the impoverished country.

On the other side of the capital, the Chinese also are giving their embassy a makeover. But they're doing a lot more in Cambodia.

The Chinese are digging up minerals and exploring for oil. They are cutting down forests and in some places planting saplings. And across Cambodia, they are building garment factories, power plants, bridges and roads, some into neighboring Laos.

DOJ_NMG_0065070

For centuries, the Kingdom of Cambodia has tried to fend off greater powers such as Thailand, Vietnam and France. But today Phnom Penh is welcoming the Chinese with open arms, praising Beijing as a government that offers its largess unconditionally.

By Phnom Penh's tally, Chinese state-owned and private companies plowed more than $450 million into Cambodia last year — a 460% increase over 2004 — making China by far the nation's top foreign investor. Beijing says it is also giving hundreds of millions of dollars in loans and aid to Cambodia, easily surpassing the $62 million in loans and aid from the U.S.

Some Western diplomats see China's growing influence here as a threat to American political interests in the region. Cambodia, a nation of 14 million, is a fledgling democracy. It conducted open elections in the wake of civil war a decade ago and the brutal Khmer Rouge regime in the 1970s. Its constitutional monarchy provides for a multiparty system, unlike neighbors Vietnam, Laos and China, each ruled by an unopposed Communist Party.

Cambodian politics are dominated by Prime Minister Hun Sen — who came to power in a bloody 1997 coup but has overseen the country's democratic reforms — and analysts say the rule of law and press freedoms have not taken root. Washington has tried to exert influence on Cambodia through its aid, which is earmarked mostly for health and education. But as Chinese support increases, some U.S. officials worry that it will ease the pressure on Phnom Penh to fight pervasive corruption and build democratic institutions.

Cambodia has embraced the Middle Kingdom because "China has proven different from other donors. They don't impose conditions," Cham Prasidh, the minister of commerce, said in an interview here. "Others say, 'You have to do this with human rights, you have to do that with democratic reforms.' China doesn't do that."

China's interest in this country — where income per person was $350 in 2004 — is largely driven by the same need that is sending Chinese to remote regions in Africa, Central Asia and South America: to secure natural resources to fuel its expanding economy and enhance its global political muscle.

China's trek is often secretive, as banker John Brinsden has learned.

The Briton is vice chairman of locally owned Acleda Bank. A field representative in Rovieng, a tiny farming village, recently called by shortwave radio to tell him that a potential client had moved to the remote area.

Brinsden drove eight hours north along mostly dirt roads to the village, which is surrounded by jungle — and land mines.

Next to the bank's outpost, Brinsden could see that a mining company was setting up offices behind a corrugated fence. But in his research later, he could find no permits or other records of the company. To the veteran banker, this was the Chinese way of doing business in Cambodia.

"They're very low-key," he said.

China's spending spree has helped Cambodia's economy come out of the doldrums. Tourism and garment production are growing briskly. Luxury sport utility vehicles are a common sight in the streets of Phnom Penh. The country's banks hold 30% more in deposits than a year ago.

The cash is certainly flowing at Naga's casino next to Buddhist temples on the eastern end of town. A construction firm from China is building a 500-room hotel by the gambling hall for its Chinese Malaysian owner.

"The big rollers are from mainland China," said Michael Nen, a former Long Beach policeman who runs security for Naga Resorts & Casinos here.

Yet many Cambodians are wary of China's growing presence in their homeland. Some talk bitterly about Beijing's support for Pol Pot, the man who engineered the Khmer Rouge's reign of terror, which left more than 1 million Cambodians dead on killing fields or from hunger.

Other Cambodians complain that the Chinese, along with other foreign companies, are plundering the nation and buying up vast swaths of land in secret deals with corrupt local officials. Such trade has uprooted families and made life harder for many people, they say.

Companies are racing to exploit oil and natural gas deposits found beneath Cambodia's waters last year. Chevron Corp. has locked up key drilling sites, but Chinese enterprises, including state-owned CNOOC Ltd., which lost its bid for Unocal Corp. to Chevron last year, are jockeying for an advantage in Cambodia.

Chinese officials in Beijing and Cambodia declined to talk about China's presence here.

Chinese academics said Beijing had good reason to extend its hand toward Cambodia.

"China needs Cambodia's cooperation on many important issues, such as Taiwan, Tibet and human rights," said Shen Shishun, director of Asia-Pacific studies at the China Institute of International Studies in Beijing.

Throughout Phnom Penh, hundreds of storefront signs are written in both Khmer and Chinese. Ethnic Chinese account for just 1% of Cambodia's population, but as in other Southeast Asian countries, they play a significant role in commerce. Chinese businesspeople are helping to build a $10-million Chinatown near the French Embassy.

Pung Kheav Se, who is ethnic Chinese and was born in Cambodia, is the founder of Canadia Bank, which holds one-fourth of the nation's bank deposits. He fled the country in the late 1970s and made a fortune trading gold bars in Montreal before returning to Phnom Penh in 1991. Pung said China Development Bank officials recently paid him a visit to discuss aid to Cambodia.

"I see a lot of change for the better," he said.

On a recent weekend, the city of Chongqing in central China was recruiting students for its schools at a domed conference center here. Across town, behind the gates of Universal Apparel Co., a red banner welcomed governors from China's Fujian province.

Cham Prasidh, the commerce minister, said the Chinese were not given preferential treatment.

If the United States has lost economic influence in Cambodia to China, the minister suggested, Americans have only themselves to blame.

"The investors from the U.S. say they want more transparency. They don't understand the Asian mentality; they are not flexible in negotiating," he said. "The Chinese feel very much at home in Cambodia."

The Rise Of Baidu (That's Chinese For Google) (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

BEIJING

IN the summer of 1998 at a picnic in Silicon Valley, Eric Xu, a 34-year-old biochemist, introduced his shy, reserved friend Robin Li to John Wu, then the head of Yahoo's search engine team.

Mr. Li, 30 at the time, was a frustrated staff engineer at Infoseek, an Internet search engine partly owned by Disney, a company whose fading commitment to Infoseek did not mesh with Mr. Li's ongoing passion for search. Like Disney, Mr. Wu and Yahoo were also losing interest in the business prospects of search, and Yahoo — in a colossal corporate blunder — eventually outsourced all of its search functions to a little startup named Google.

Mr. Xu, who had called together some friends for a documentary he was making on Silicon Valley, thought the two search guys would hit it off. Mr. Wu says he exchanged greetings with Robin Li, but what most impressed him was that despite all of the pessimism surrounding search, Mr. Li remained undaunted.

"The people at Yahoo didn't think search was all that important, and so neither did I," says Mr. Wu, who is now the chief technology officer at the Chinese Internet company Alibaba.com. "But Robin, he seemed very determined to stick with it. And you have to admire what he accomplished."

Indeed. A year after the picnic, in 1999, Mr. Li founded his own search company in China, naming it Baidu (pronounced "by-DOO"). Today, Baidu has a market value of $3 billion and operates the fourth-most trafficked Web site in the world. And Baidu is doing what no other Internet company has been able to do: clobbering Google and Yahoo in its home market.

While Baidu continues to gain market share in China — and does so with a Web site that the Chinese government heavily censors and that gives priority to advertising rather than relevant search results — some analysts question whether Baidu can withstand competition from Google and Yahoo, which possess superior technology and global work forces.

But Baidu's evolution, and Mr. Li's journey as an entrepreneur, offer textbook examples of the payoffs and perils of doing business in China and suggest that Baidu may prove to be far more resilient than some analysts believe. China has a population of 1.3 billion, about 130 million of whom are Internet users, an online market second in size only to the American market. Because China is the world's fastest-growing major economy, analysts consider it the next great Internet battleground, with Baidu uniquely positioned to prosper from that competition.

In exchange for letting censors oversee its Web site, Baidu has sealed its dominance with support from the Chinese government, which regularly blocks Google here and imposes strict rules and censorship on other foreign Internet companies.

In addition, analysts say, entrepreneurs in China have a knack for pummeling American Internet giants. "The globally dominant U.S. Internet companies have failed to take the No. 1 market share position in any category," says Jason D. Brueschke, a Citigroup analyst, of the Chinese market. "And they came with more money and major brand names. And so there's something fundamentally different about this market."

So fundamentally different, Mr. Brueschke believes, that Baidu will retain its hammerlock on the Chinese search industry. "The real battle in the competitive landscape is not about who's No. 1, it's about who's going to be No. 2," he says.

Google, of course, will have none of this, stressing the independence of its search results and the international reach it offers users. “People want information and they want global information,” says Kaifu Lee, the president of Google in China. “We can’t be bought.”

But Mr. Li says Baidu’s model is working supremely well and that the company has built a loyal base of users who value its search capabilities. “At the end of the day, if a user finds relevant information, they’ll come back,” he says.

ON its corporate Web site, Baidu says that it takes its name from a Song Dynasty poem written several centuries ago that “compares the search for a retreating beauty amid chaotic glamour with the search for one’s dream while confronted by life’s many obstacles.”

Mr. Li, born Li Yanhong in 1968 in what was then an impoverished city 200 miles southwest of Beijing, is familiar with life’s obstacles. The fourth of five children, he grew up during China’s brutal Cultural Revolution. Despite the oppression that surrounded him, he said he was always able to focus on stamp collecting, performing traditional opera and other interests — including, eventually, computers. He was bright enough to get into the country’s most prestigious school, Beijing University, where he majored in library science and dabbled in computer science.

The government infamously cracked down on pro-democracy demonstrations in Tiananmen Square in 1989 when Mr. Li was a sophomore, causing his college campus to be shut down. Mr. Li is mum on the events that followed, saying only that he was apolitical. But he does say that a year later he started thinking of studying abroad and that by the time he graduated in 1991 he was ready to leave his homeland.

He applied to the top three graduate programs in computer science in America, but did not get into any of them (perhaps, he says, because China was considered an also-ran in technology). “I blindly sent out 20 applications,” he says. “SUNY Buffalo was the only program willing to give me a fellowship.”

He enrolled at Buffalo planning to earn a Ph.D. in computer science but grew disillusioned with academia. He completed his master’s degree in 1994 and then joined a New Jersey division of Dow Jones & Company, where he helped develop a software program for The Wall Street Journal’s online edition. During that time, he also became enamored of the technology boom taking shape in Silicon Valley. He spent much of his time trying to solve one of the Internet industry’s earliest problems: sorting information.

A breakthrough came in 1996, he says, when he developed a search mechanism he called “link analysis,” which involved ranking the popularity of a Web site based on how many other Web sites had linked to it.

“The moment I created this thing I was very excited,” he says. “I told my boss and pushed him. But he wasn’t very excited.” Soon after, he attended a computer conference in Silicon Valley and set up his own booth to demonstrate his search findings.

William I. Chang, then the chief technology officer at Infoseek, met Mr. Li at the conference and recruited him to oversee search engine development.

“Robin is possibly the single most brilliant and focused person I know,” Mr. Chang says. “And his inventions, now widely adopted, are still the gold standards in Web search relevance.”

After Disney acquired the small fraction of Infoseek stock it did not already own in 1999, it shifted the company’s focus away from search and toward content, leading Mr. Li to form his own Internet company with Eric Xu, who had a Ph.D. in biochemistry and good contacts in Silicon Valley.

The partners raised $1.2 million from two Silicon Valley venture capital firms, Integrity Partners and Peninsula Capital, and with their seed money in hand flew to China and founded Baidu in a hotel room overlooking Beijing University’s campus. Nine months later, in September 2000, two other venture capital firms, Draper Fisher Jurvetson and IDG Technology Venture, pumped another $10 million into the startup.

So it was that on the eve of the Internet bubble bursting in the United States, Baidu took off in China.

“When I came back I was prepared for a rough life,” Mr. Li says. “It turns out it wasn’t so bad.”

Baidu started out offering search services to other Chinese portals before developing its own stand-alone search engine. Some members of Baidu’s board of directors opposed the shift, saying it would turn customers into competitors. But Mr. Li said he sensed a shift in the market after watching the success of Overture, a company in Pasadena, Calif., that sold advertising space correlated with search results (which meant, for example, that ads for dental clinics might pop up next to search results for cavities).

“We were skeptical about search,” says Scott Walchek, a partner at Integrity Partners and a member of Baidu’s board. “But we weren’t as smart as Robin. Robin said he had a unique opportunity to build a brand around search. And he was right.”

In September 2001, Baidu began its own site — Baidu.com — which looked almost exactly like Google’s no-frills home page. And even before Google did it, Baidu allowed advertisers to bid for ad space and then pay Baidu every time a customer clicked on an ad. Small and medium-size companies loved it, the site became deluged with traffic and Baidu turned a profit in

2004. By then, Mr. Li was pushing for an initial public offering in the United States, insisting it would be a huge branding event for a company that had come to be called "China's Google."

BAIDU went public on Aug. 5, 2005, at $27 a share. When trading ended that day, shares of Baidu closed at $122, up 354 percent, the biggest opening on Nasdaq since the dot-com peak in 2000. Suddenly, Baidu was a $4 billion company and Mr. Li held stock worth more than $900 million. But not everyone cheered. Many analysts said that by almost every measure Baidu's stock was ridiculously over-valued. It eventually tumbled to as low as $44 before rebounding. On Friday, its shares closed up $3.03 in regular trading, to $87.75, giving the company a market capitalization of about $2.94 billion.

At the time of the I.P.O., some critics attacked Baidu's zealousness for ad revenues. They noted, for example, that a Baidu search for the word "cancer" turned up ads for hospitals that paid for top spots in results rather than returning information on cancer itself. In comparison, Google and Yahoo more clearly separate ads from relevant search results by placing them on the right side of the page.

The company's revenue jumped 190 percent in the first half of this year, to $40.9 million; profit soared 550 percent, to $11.7 million. Baidu's Web site is drawing millions of young people eager to download music files, create blogs or search for pictures of China's "10 Most Beautiful Women." While Baidu is growing fast, its revenue is still anemic compared with Google's, which is expected to top $7 billion this year.

Analysts say Baidu is playing to a different audience than Western Internet companies because the Chinese are far more interested in entertainment than news, books or car rental rates. "The fact is 70 percent of China's Internet users are under the age of 30," says Richard Ji, an analyst with Morgan Stanley. "Most of them are single, only children. They're looking for entertainment."

That may explain why China's dominant Internet companies are all entertainment focused, like Tencent (which hosts online communities and instant messaging) and Netease and Shanda (which are online gaming sites).

Yet no Internet company in China is growing as fast as Baidu, which had more than 50 percent of the pay-per-click market in the first half of year, up from a 37 percent share in the same period a year ago, according to Analysys, a research firm in Beijing. Google and Yahoo both lost ground, with each company holding 16 percent pay-per-click shares for the first six months of 2006.

Still, Baidu faces significant challenges. The company's stock is in the stratosphere, putting pressure on management to deliver knockout growth every quarter. Google's shares closed up $5.90 Friday in regular trading, to $409.88, meaning investors pay a hefty $60 for every $1 of profit in the stock, far more than other Internet companies. But Baidu investors pay a whopping $190 for every $1 of profit.

Baidu also faces legal challenges, including lawsuits claiming it violates copyright laws on music files. Baidu has been sued over the issue, but continues to provide links to sites that offer music files. The company says it does not believe it should be held responsible for simply offering linking to other sites. In a country rampant with claims of click fraud, a Beijing hospital recently claimed that Baidu orchestrated a scheme in which a Baidu affiliate kept clicking on the hospital's ads to fatten the fees it had to pay Baidu. A Baidu spokeswoman says the company has not reviewed the case, but actively polices click fraud.

LOOMING on the horizon are Google and Yahoo. Google says it plans to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to compete in China, and Yahoo has merged its operations here with Chinese Internet behemoth Alibaba.com.

"Google is fierce," Morgan Stanley's Mr. Ji says. "And Alibaba has the best sales force. Baidu could get hurt on the technical side."

But the Chinese market is littered with the wreckage of American Internet companies that have failed to dominate here. In 2003, eBay bought the largest Chinese auction company — and then lost market share. In 2004, Amazon bought the largest Chinese online merchandiser — and then lost market share.

Now, the real fight begins. Google, which invested $5 million in Baidu just before its public offering last year, sold that stake for a hefty $60 million in June. And now, Google is building up a huge research team in Beijing, not far from Baidu's headquarters. But analysts say it won't be easy for Google.

"The American Internet giants are dominant in the U.S. and dominant in Europe," Mr. Brueschke at Citigroup says. "And then they come to China and fail. And so what I want to know is: What is Google going to do differently?"

For his part, Robin Li seems undaunted.

"Our traffic keeps increasing," he says confidently. "We're now the No. 1 Web site in China."

India And Pakistan To Resume Talks (NYT/AP)

HAVANA, Sept. 16 (AP) — Pakistan and India agreed Saturday to restart peace talks suspended since train bombings killed more than 200 people in Mumbai in July, part of a wave of attacks for which India blames Pakistan-based militants.

Describing their meeting as a breakthrough for peace, the Pakistani president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, and the Indian prime minister, Manmohan Singh, agreed on cabinet-level talks. Mr. Singh also said he had accepted an invitation to travel to Pakistan to further the process.

"I look forward to a purposeful visit at a time to be determined through diplomatic channels," Mr. Singh said after the leaders worked out the details Saturday morning on the sidelines of the Nonaligned Movement summit meeting in Havana.

"I am very happy — it's very good," General Musharraf said. "We had a cordial, frank exchange of views on all aspects of India and Pakistan relations. It was agreed that the peace process must be obtained."

Both leaders also said in a joint statement that they rejected "all acts of terrorism."

AP, September 17, 2006

Pakistan and India agreed Saturday to restart peace talks suspended since train bombings killed more than 200 people in Mumbai in July as part of a wave of attacks India blames on Pakistan-based militants.

Describing their meeting as a breakthrough for peace, Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed their foreign secretaries would pursue the talks, and said Singh had accepted an invitation to go to Pakistan.

Their joint statement said they had a "cordial, frank exchange of views on all aspects of India and Pakistan relations" and they "strongly condemn all acts of terrorism."

"I look forward to a purposeful visit at a time to be determined through diplomatic channels," Singh said after the leaders reached agreement Saturday morning on the sidelines of the Nonaligned Movement summit in Havana.

"I am very happy — It's very good," Musharraf said.

The breakthrough came when both sides agreed to set up a joint working group to identify and stop terrorists, said Shivshankar Menon, who becomes India's foreign secretary next month. India already has such anti-terrorism groups with more than 20 countries and regional groups such as the European Union, but working with Pakistan this way is unprecedented, he said.

"We're working at eliminating the trust deficit," he said. "This is a new step, a new way."

Earlier, Musharraf had expressed optimism that his meeting with Singh could lead to a cease-fire along their common border in the Himalayan mountains.

"A historic opportunity like this must be seized by the leadership of the two countries to bring to a close the chapter and tension in our region," Musharraf said in his address to the Nonaligned Movement meeting.

But Singh has said Pakistan must do more to control militant groups based in its territory.

"This terrorism will surely act as a dampener. I have said more than once, that I can't carry the Indian public opinion with me if terrorist acts continue to plague our polity," Singh said on his way to Havana.

A series of terrorist bombings have ripped across India in the past year. The most recent was the July 11 attack that hit seven Mumbai commuter trains during peak evening traffic, killing more than 200 people. The bombings have been blamed on Pakistan-based Muslim militants.

New Delhi blames Pakistan's support of the militants for stalling the peace process between the nuclear-armed neighbors, which have fought three wars since gaining independence from Britain in 1947, two over the Himalayan region of Kashmir.

Pakistan's government denies training and funding the Islamic militants, and said it had nothing to do with the train bombings, but it has acknowledged offering the rebels moral and political support.

More than a dozen militant groups are fighting to make Kashmir independent from Hindu-majority India or to merge it with Muslim-dominated Pakistan. The insurgency has claimed about 65,000 lives.

Mumbai was formerly known as Bombay.

Indian, Pakistani Leaders Agree To Resume Talks (AFP)

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed at breakthrough talks in Havana to resume negotiations on the disputed Kashmir region and jointly battle terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0065075

"The leaders decided to continue the joint search for mutually acceptable options for a peaceful negotiated settlement on all issues between India and Pakistan, including Jammu and Kashmir," the Indian premier said, reading a joint statement.

"It was agreed the peace process must be maintained and respected," said Singh, who was flanked by Musharaf.

"In this context, we have directed our foreign secretaries to resume dialogue," he said, adding they would meet "shortly" in New Dehli.

Saturday's talks, held on the sideline of a Non Aligned Movement (NAM) summit in Havana, were the first high-level meeting between the two countries since deadly bombings in Mumbai on July 11. India accused its neighbor of not reining in "terrorists."

"We met in the aftermath of the Mumbai blasts. We strongly condemned all acts of terrorism and agreed terrorism was a scourge that needs to be dealt with," Singh said.

The leaders also agreed the two countries would put in place a joint system to "identify and implement counter-terrorism initiatives and investigations."

India had earlier indicated a condemnation of terrorism was key to reaching an agreement on the resumption of negotiations over Kashmir.

The Himalayan territory is shared by the two countries but claimed in its entirety by both. It has been the source of three wars since 1947, and at least 44,000 people have been killed since the outbreak of an Islamic insurgency in Indian Kashmir in 1989.

Indian foreign secretary designate Shivshankar Menon said the agreement on terrorism "has made it possible for us to clear resumption of the dialogue."

"What we see is elements in Pakistan connected to terrorism in India. This is one way of dealing with it," he said of the agreement to set up an "anti-terrorism institutional mechanism."

"Terrorist incidents make it very difficult to deal with business as usual. Particularly if they come from Pakistan," he said at a news conference.

The Indian prime minister also held private talks with several of the leaders attending the NAM summit, including Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and Hugo Chavez of Venezuela.

Singh also met with Cuba's acting president Raul Castro, 75, who represented his convalescing brother Fidel Castro, 80 at the NAM summit.

Fidel Castro was named president of the NAM, taking over from Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Badawi, but officials said he would only assume those functions once he has fully recovered from intestinal surgery he underwent in July.

In Russia, Business-Class Killings (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

MOSCOW

VIOLENT deaths continuously punctuate the civic discourse in Russia. The list of victims and motives is grim and long: contract hits on rivals, bombs to settle business disputes, racist attacks on laborers from the Caucasus or Central Asia and students from Africa or South America, and the almost regular killings of police officers in Russian republics where ethnic and religious tensions are inflamed. These are all part of the unsettled life in a nation still recovering from Lenin's failed experiment.

But the murder last week of Andrei Kozlov, one of Russia's top bank regulators, served as a reminder that even the upper strata of society here are not immune from the vicious rules of the Russian street. Mr. Kozlov, who had been spearheading banking reform, was ambushed Wednesday night as he left a soccer game. Two assassins shot him in the torso and the head, then threw their pistols to the ground as they ran away. No arrests have been made.

Investigators and Mr. Kozlov's colleagues say he was almost certainly killed because of his work. He had been closing disreputable banks and pressuring money launderers — risky endeavors by any estimate. As Russia's middle class has grown and its larger cities have undergone surges of development, the image of a nation in the grip of businessmen flanked by thick-necked men with assault rifles has softened. But the violence continues, at a slower pace since President Vladimir V. Putin came to power in 2000, but alarming nonetheless.

The crusading Russian-American journalist, Paul Klebnikov, was murdered by contract killers in 2004; Mr. Klebnikov, an editor at Forbes, specialized in describing the links of Russian money and power. Anatoly Chubais, the architect of privatization who is now head of Russia's electricity monopoly, narrowly dodged a bomb-and-rifle ambush in 2005; he was saved by his armored car as his bodyguards opened fire to allow his escape.

Although the victims are rarely of such high stature, new examples abound of business disputes or efforts at business protection leading to gunfire and bombings. The nation reacts with resigned familiarity. Few foreign business executives have bodyguards, but the possibility of violence is part of the business fabric, along with endemic corruption and an arbitrary state bureaucracy.

While the squeamish may be steering clear, investors seem undeterred. The Russian economy is booming. There is money to be made. On the day Mr. Kozlov was pronounced dead, there was public hand-wringing, but the Russian stock market rose.

The Post-Putin Russia (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

A Smooth Succession Doesn't Guarantee a Prosperous Future

MOSCOW -- Democracy does not march very long or very far. It lunges forward into vacuums created by the collapse of colonial, communist or imperial systems. Democratic reforms must then often creep or ooze or simply abide until the next turn of the political wheel makes new progress possible.

That frustrating zigzag pattern is at work today in Russia as President Vladimir Putin deepens an authoritarian transformation underwritten by surging oil and gas revenue that buys him public calm. But the political and economic centralization he manages may carry the seeds of its own demise.

This transformation of Russia -- as dispiriting as it has seemed recently to many in the West and here -- is not carved in stone. The deep concern that the Kremlin's rulers show for the opinion of their relatively well-educated public is one sign that not even they believe democracy is totally dead here.

"They have created a political theater in which they write the script and set the stage," says a Western diplomat. "But the interesting thing is that they still care what the spectators think of the show."

That reflex surfaces in the already visible efforts being tested by the Kremlin to stage-manage the 2008 presidential elections. "Reformers" inside the Kremlin are said to be grouping around Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev, while "conservatives" cluster with Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov. Who says the voters won't have a choice?

Issues for the campaign are also being shaped. The Kremlin team is building up the image of a Communist Party resurgence that must be turned back at the polls, even though most independent analysts fail to detect signs of any such comeback.

Meanwhile, Western governments are being subtly advised that they should do nothing to undermine Putin's ability to choose his successor. That would play into the hands of a newly threatening left. Dead as a tactic in the West, the Red Scare is being resurrected in a land where communism was decisively rejected 15 years ago.

Not even Putin pretends that the managed democracy he has imposed on Russia is true democracy. He is too smart for that. He acknowledged last week while meeting with foreign visitors that Russia "lacks a real multiparty system." While declaring a hope to create such a system at an undetermined future moment, Putin offered no clues as to how he would do this.

His vagueness on the political future contrasted sharply with the detailed specifics he offered on Russia's economic outlook; he expects growth to reach 7 percent again this year. Windfall profits from the energy industry will be used to establish "high-technology zones" for new industry and increase social welfare spending, he claimed.

Economic power is also being concentrated in the hands of the state and of a small circle of Putin's advisers who sit on the boards of the nation's key natural gas and oil companies. His devotion to centralization also surfaced in his insistence on the need for long-term government-to-government contracts to cut out "intermediaries and speculators" who drive up world energy prices.

Putin's confidence and his competence in the art of control are impressive seen at close range. But will his highly centralized system be responsive when Russia has to face up to the pervasive "disease" of energy-exporting countries, which invariably fail to develop financial infrastructure, labor-intensive industries and the skills to run them?

"This is the Russian disease, which is even worse: We export our resources, our capital and our best people," senior economist Leonid Grigoriev said.

He is actually understating. The Russian population is shrinking not only because of emigration but because of a staggering mortality rate (double that of the United States) and a sharply declining birthrate. The population has fallen from 150 million to 142 million over the past decade, and the public health system is widely acknowledged to be a continuing disaster.

Putin is a successful manager of a Russia benefiting from good times. But it is far from clear that he, or the stand-in he hopes to name to succeed him, could muster the public support that would be needed to lead the country through crises that may lie ahead. It may take leaders with real democratic legitimacy.

An ambitious American effort to spread democracy into Russia under President Bill Clinton in the 1990s faltered and was stalemated when Putin came to power. But seen from today, it did help create a reference point and toehold for future advances.

This should offer some solace to Clinton, and perhaps for President Bush's beleaguered push for democracy in the Middle East as well.

From A Literary Lion In Caracas, Advice On Must-Reads (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela

PRESIDENT HUGO CHÁVEZ, it is well known, talks a lot. Whether at home or on the road, in Damascus or Minsk, his speeches can last hours.

Often, as he talks on, Mr. Chávez drops the names of books he is reading or has grown to love, giving insight into the various intellectual and literary influences on his thinking and what he calls his Bolivarian Revolution, an amalgam of socialist-inspired and anti-American policies.

Favorite authors include Victor Hugo, with "Les Misérables" at the top of his must-read list, with its description of passion amid revolutionary barricades. At the swearing-in of ministers for nutrition and the people's economy, Mr. Chávez recited a passage from the introduction about the need to stamp out ignorance and poverty.

"Don Quixote" by Cervantes also features prominently in his speeches, with Mr. Chávez identifying with the eccentric knight errant fighting injustice. To celebrate the 400th anniversary of the book's publication, the government last year paid for a million copies to be distributed free. Venezuela also paid for 70,000 copies in English for Caribbean neighbors and 5,000 in French for Haiti.

Mr. Chávez's supporters, who remain the majority in this country, love such displays, pointing to strides made in reducing illiteracy in recent years. His critics suggest that it is yet another way for the government to boost public spending.

If there is a whiff of 1970's-style third-world intellectual pretension in the populism of his campaign and his championing of certain books, Mr. Chávez does not seem to mind. Indeed, it reflects what seems a wider strategy on his part: he seems determined to articulate and spread a national ideology, in the way of a Castro or Perón.

The government is making more books available to the population through programs like the Kuai Mare Foundation, which operates a chain of more than 50 bookstores stocked largely with nationalist or left-leaning books sold at bargain prices.

Beyond the classics of European literature, Mr. Chávez recommends works by Latin American political theorists and historians and even the occasional North American. Mr. Chávez says he read John Kenneth Galbraith as a boy growing up humbly in Barinas, where his parents taught school.

Galbraith's "Economics of Innocent Fraud," a witty critique of the American economy, stands out for Mr. Chávez. Galbraith, who died this year at the age of 97, "is not a socialist but still he is a critic of capitalism," Mr. Chávez recently said on his Sunday television program, "Hello, President." He has described himself as "Galbraithiano."

Some of Mr. Chávez's reading preferences may be predictable, given his dislike of just about anything to do with President Bush. One of his anti-Bush staples is "Dude, Where's My Country?," a book by the filmmaker Michael Moore.

Other references are a bit more obscure, like "The Turning Point," by Fritjof Capra, an Austrian-born physicist. Mr. Chávez plucked a theme in the book, on moving away from centuries of exploitation, to discuss his opposition to American efforts to form a free trade zone across the Americas. Mr. Chávez cites books recommended to him by Mr. Castro, another voracious reader, including "The Hydrogen Economy," by Jeremy Rifkin, a look at moving the world beyond its dependence on oil. "The book is based on something which is no longer a hypothesis — it is a thesis," he said on a visit to Tehran in July. "Oil will run out one day."

Here in Venezuela, which has the largest oil reserves outside the Middle East, people have become accustomed to Mr. Chávez's literary recommendations. What really seems to interest many Venezuelans are books about Mr. Chávez himself.

Bookstores in Caracas carry more than a dozen titles about him, from unauthorized biographies to exposés of Bush administration efforts to oppose his government. Cristina Marcano, the co-author of a best-selling biography, "Hugo Chávez Without His Uniform," said that in his army days Mr. Chávez cited the influence of "The Green Book" by Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi of Libya, first published in the mid-1970's. "Chávez read Qaddafi with great admiration," Ms. Marcano said in an interview. One of Mr. Qaddafi's ideas was to ban commercial retail activity, an event inducing economic chaos that the Venezuelan leader has wisely ignored.

How does Mr. Chávez, burdened by other responsibilities, manage to read so much? One possibility is offered by Herma Marksman, the subject of "The Other Chávez," one of 16 books on Mr. Chávez by Alberto Garrido, a noted political analyst here.

Ms. Marksman, a history professor who was Mr. Chávez's mistress from 1984 to 1993, said he would often have her read aloud to him from books while he drove a car. "He would hang on every word, especially if it was fiction by García Márquez," she said in an interview.

However eclectic Mr. Chávez's taste in books might appear, there is one constant on his bookshelf. Mr. Chávez often refers to maxims by military or guerrilla leaders, admiring their rise to power through the barrel of a gun.

They include Simón Bolívar, the father of Venezuelan independence, Napoleon, Che Guevara and Mao Zedong. In an appearance this month at the national military academy, Mr. Chávez read from Mao's writings.

"No one does this anymore in China," the newspaper El Nacional said in an editorial, "though he hasn't figured this out in his five trips to the country of Deng Xiaoping."

Throng Calls Loser Mexico's 'Legitimate' President (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 16 — More than 150,000 supporters of the losing leftist candidate for president flooded into the capital's historic square on Saturday and declared him "the legitimate president" of Mexico.

As his supporters roared approval, the candidate, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, a former Mexico City mayor, vowed to set up his own government and to fight against "a band of white-collar crooks and corrupt politicians" who he has said stole the election from him.

"I accept the responsibility of being president because I reject the imposition of their candidate and rupture of the constitutional order," he said. "They can keep their pirated institutions and their phony president, but they cannot keep our fatherland and our national dignity."

Described as a national democratic convention, the massive rally seemed intended to keep Mr. López Obrador and his political agenda from fading out of the national debate.

Mexico's highest electoral court ruled Sept. 5 that Mr. López Obrador narrowly lost the July 2 election to Felipe Calderón, a conservative from President Vicente Fox's party. The leftist maintains there was a broad conspiracy among business leaders, the Fox administration and news media barons to keep him from winning, using tactics like illegal attack ads and old-fashioned fraud.

Having lost a court battle for a full recount, Mr. López Obrador resorted Saturday to a tactic with deep roots in Mexican history: he convened a "national convention" of his supporters to draw up a new agenda for the country.

By a show of hands, the crowd unanimously denied Mr. Calderón had won. They declared Mr. López Obrador president, asked him to form a cabinet and supported a constitutional convention. "It's an honor to be with Obrador," they chanted.

Some historians said the convention echoed the alternative plans for Mexico put forward by revolutionary heroes like Emilio Zapata and Francisco I. Madero 100 years ago.

"The slow, difficult, incremental construction of the Mexican nation and state has passed through dozens of plans, made in the heat of political conflict," said one historian, Lorenzo Meyer. "The idea of conventions and plans is something very much part of Mexican history."

By Lisa J. Adams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of supporters of leftist Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador elected him the leader Saturday of a "parallel government" opposed to President-elect Felipe Calderon's administration.

The symbolic "vote" — a show of hands in the packed Zocalo plaza — was the latest development in Mexico's nearly three month electoral dispute. Lopez Obrador claims fraud and illegal government spending were responsible for Calderon's victory by less than 234,000 votes in the July 2 election, and he has vowed to be the new leader's biggest opponent.

It was unclear what the "parallel government," complete with its own Cabinet, would entail.

Lopez Obrador supporters said they would travel the country and set up committees to spread Lopez Obrador's message of helping the nation's millions of poor and opposing the elite.

They also said they would continue protests against the government.

"This is the firm and honorable response to those who have converted our political institutions into a grotesque farce," Lopez Obrador said.

Lopez Obrador will be "sworn in" to his new post on Nov. 20. Calderon will be inaugurated on Dec. 1.

"They won't move forward. Today in our country there exists the collective will to stop them," Lopez Obrador said.

Convention delegates also agreed to boycott major national and international companies that they say supported Calderon's campaign, and agreed to support the formation of a "Progressive Front" to replace the former coalition of leftist parties that backed Lopez Obrador in the national election.

Lopez Obrador said the Front's principal objective would be to fight what he called a large right-wing bloc formed by Calderon's conservative National Action Party and the former ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party.

"Two groups will exist in the country: The rightists and the progressives," he said.

Lopez Obrador retains a strong following despite a Federal Electoral Tribunal ruling this month that rejected most of his fraud allegations and awarded the presidency to Calderon.

Organizers claimed 1.2 million packed the Zocalo and surrounding streets.

"This convention is the most palpable proof of how the people of Mexico feel," said Antonio Romano Hernandez, a 56-year-old baker from Mexico City.

Deeply Divided Mexico Marks Independence Day (AFP)

By Alexandre Peyrille

AFP, September 17, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of Mexicans turned independence day into a protest for a losing presidential candidate in Mexico City, while President Vicente Fox and the president-elect celebrated outside the capital citing fears of violence.

Organizers said 750,000 to a million of Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador's supporters chanted "The people united will never be defeated" in the capital's Zocalo square.

The crowd convened a so-called National Democratic Convention, which proclaimed Lopez Obrador the "legitimate president" of Mexico, set his inauguration for November 20, and, despite driving rain, even set to work on his political agenda.

Lopez Obrador, a former Mexico City mayor, has organized massive protests since his narrow July 2 defeat to conservative Felipe Calderon.

Calderon, a member of Fox's conservative National Action Party, is to be inaugurated December 1 as Mexico's new president after winning by less than a one percent of the vote.

Mexico's electoral court only last week handed down its final decision, declaring Calderon as Mexico's president-elect.

The ruling, which cannot be appealed, came after the losing side launched weeks of street protests and filed dozens of corruption allegations and scores of legal objections.

Although Obrador lost the election by a narrow margin, his protest campaign has drawn dwindling support among the wider public. A poll released last week showed some 74 percent accept the decision of the electoral court declaring Calderon the winner.

Lopez Obrador, however, vows to set up a parallel government. The three leftist parties that had formed a coalition for the presidential election have extended their alliance through 2009 and adopted as their campaign slogan: "For the Good of All, the Poor First."

Lopez Obrador's supporters temporarily struck their tent city in the heart of the capital for the independence day military parade, which took place without incident.

The occupation began July 30 to block major streets, at a cost in disrupted business estimated by a business group Friday at 709 million dollars.

For weeks, Fox had insisted he would not deviate from the regular presidential agenda, but on Thursday the Mexican Senate ordered him to find an alternative after reported threats of disruptions from the leftists.

The Mexican president traditionally appears on the balcony of the National Palace, rings a historic bell and leads crowds in chants of "Viva Mexico!" on the eve of the September 16 holiday.

However, on Friday, Fox backed down on appearing at the public ceremony for security reasons.

"The government had learned from intelligence services that some of the radical organizations within 'For the Good of All' plan violence against those attending celebrations in the Zocalo," presidential spokesman Ruben Aguilar said Friday.

Lopez Obrador vowed to deliver a rival ceremonial public call for independence late Friday at the Zocalo, the giant downtown square where the protests are centered.

Instead of marking the day in the capital, Fox celebrated in Dolores Hidalgo, 260 kilometers (160 miles) from Mexico City.

Dolores Hidalgo, in the central Guanajuato state, is where Father Miguel Hidalgo rang church bells and called on Mexicans to take up arms against Spain in 1810, starting the revolution that culminated in Mexico's independence from Spain in 1821.

Lopez Obrador insists he is the rightful leader of Mexico, and this week rejected Calderon as an "illegitimate president" responsible for a "coup d'etat" which he said was sending "Mexico's institutions to hell."

It was the second time in two weeks the leftists forced Fox to break with tradition.

On September 1, lawmakers from the opposition Party of the Democratic Revolution blocked Fox, who supported Calderon in the presidential race, from taking the podium to deliver his annual address to Congress.

He delivered the speech via television instead.

Mexico Crowd Vows Loyalty To Runner-Up (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Rally participants agree to recognize leftist Lopez Obrador as the rightful president and join his campaign of boycotts and civil disobedience.

MEXICO CITY — Hundreds of thousands of Mexicans celebrated their Independence Day in a mass rally to denounce the winner of the July 2 presidential election and pledge their allegiance to the losing candidate.

With a show of hands, the huge crowd of delegates to the so-called National Democratic Convention on Saturday agreed to recognize leftist politician Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador as the country's rightful president and join a campaign of boycotts and civil disobedience under his direction.

"This is the beginning of the road to building a new republic," Lopez Obrador said in an acceptance speech that lashed out at Mexico's rich and politicians who protect them.

Although it was unclear how Lopez Obrador would establish a parallel government, or whether the vote was merely a political threat, the rally was a strong rebuke of National Action Party candidate Felipe Calderon, who defeated Lopez Obrador by slightly more than half a percentage point.

Lopez Obrador's presidency has no legal standing, and federal government officials had no response to the convention late Saturday.

Delegates agreed Lopez Obrador should take office Nov. 20, a national holiday commemorating the start of Mexico's 1910 revolution. They also supported a boycott of major firms, such as Wal-Mart and Coca-Cola, that are among a group of businesses Lopez Obrador accused of illegally supporting Calderon's campaign.

The presidential election divided Mexico between those who believed the country was advancing well enough with expanded trade and investment, and Lopez Obrador supporters, who believed the global market was leaving many people behind.

Lopez Obrador, a charismatic speaker and hard-ball politician, has energized core supporters and alienated many others for failing to accept the election outcome.

International observers said the vote count was legitimate, but Lopez Obrador alleged it was illegally tilted in favor of Calderon.

After Lopez Obrador lost his court battle for a national recount, he began building an opposition movement that he promised would reduce Mexico's poverty, end corruption and expand public social services.

Critics say Lopez Obrador is more like an autocratic politician out of Mexico's past than a progressive democratic leader. The convention appeared mainly a popularity contest with no doubt as to the outcome.

The dozen questions put to a vote by delegates were printed before Saturday's assembly. One asked, for example: "Should Lopez Obrador be recognized as president? Or coordinator of the resistance?"

When the question was put to the multitude, the crowd began to chant, "Presidente, presidente, presidente," and it was quickly approved. When the convention's moderator asked whether anyone was opposed, the crowd jeered.

Delegates, unanimous in their support, appeared to represent a broad economic group.

"Everybody's trying to paint him as some kind of messiah figure, and that his supporters are fanatics," said Alfredo Campos Martinez, 51, who traveled nine hours from Tampico by bus. "But look at me. I'm a lawyer. The seeds of this movement may be among the poor, but it has support among the middle class. We just haven't seen this economic system working very well."

Saturday's rally filled Mexico City's central square, known as the Zocalo, and spilled into surrounding blocks.

Hours earlier, President Vicente Fox presided over the annual Independence Day military parade at the spot, drawing a few hecklers.

Fox had planned to give the traditional shout for independence — an echo of Miguel Hidalgo's call for rebellion against Spain 196 years ago — from a balcony overlooking the Zocalo on Friday night, as he did last year.

But Lopez Obrador, whose supporters had transformed the square into a protest camp, said he also planned to give the shout there.

Fears of confrontation with Lopez Obrador supporters forced Fox in last-minute negotiations to move his ceremony to Dolores Hidalgo, the site of Hidalgo's original call. The mayor of Mexico City, a Lopez Obrador ally, gave the cry in the Zocalo.

It is the second time this month that Lopez Obrador has faced down Fox.

The losing candidate had promised to block Fox's annual State of the Nation address to a joint session of Congress. Soldiers formed a perimeter around the congressional hall, expecting a wave of street protesters. Instead, congressional members of Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party took over the dais and turned Fox away.

Fox, who made history in 2000 by ending seven decades of single-party rule by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, leaves Calderon a country divided.

Both men have supported Mexico's decade-long transition to a more open, free-market economy that relies on private investment to create new jobs.

Now Calderon, who takes office Dec. 1, faces the difficult task of persuading Lopez Obrador supporters that he too is serious about Mexico's lackluster job growth, high rate of poverty and the concentration of wealth among a small elite.

Lopez Obrador appears ready to wage a civil resistance campaign that will use both street protests and his party's growing political clout to pressure the incoming administration on behalf of Mexico's poor. Delegates agreed to try to block Calderon's inauguration.

So far, the Fox government has resisted pressure to crack down on demonstrators who blocked streets in the capital for much of the summer.

Elected members of Lopez Obrador's party will also face pressure in the coming weeks as they decide whether to remain loyal to their leader as his movement shifts further left.

Lopez Obrador and his supporters seized the capital's central square and main boulevard July 30. He joined thousands of protesters who lived in tents through summer rain and hailstorms until the camps came down Friday.

Elections May Bring More Woe For Merkel (KCS)

By Stephen Graham

The Kansas City Star, September 17, 2006

BERLIN - Elections in a northeastern German state this weekend could prove a breakthrough for a far-right party and bring more woe for Chancellor Angela Merkel.

Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, a depressed state of isolated hamlets and tree-lined lakes in former East Germany, elects a new legislature on Sunday, as does the capital Berlin.

Polls indicate the Social Democrat governors of both areas should hold on to power in coalition with the former communist Left Party. But the extreme-right National Democratic Party is expected to make significant gains in Mecklenburg, clearing the 5-percent vote hurdle to enter the state's parliament for the first time.

"We must do everything in our power to prevent this," said Till Backhaus, the leader of the Social Democrats in the state, who fears desperately courted investors would ignore the region. "The damage would be enormous."

The far right is a fringe player at the national level, where its affinities with Adolf Hitler's Nazis turns off the vast majority of voters. But it has found relatively fertile ground in the economically struggling east, where it already sits in the parliament in Saxony state.

Successive governments have failed to tackle the massive unemployment that has afflicted much of the east since German reunification in 1990. The unemployment rate in Mecklenburg was 18.2 percent in August - the highest in the country.

Leaders of the state, which abuts Poland and the Baltic Sea and has Germany's best beaches, insist it is on the right track. Backhaus claims that hundreds of new firms have set up in the region in recent years and the state's farming and tourism sectors are thriving.

But the National Democratic Party, known by its German initials NPD, looks set to make large gains after a campaign designed to tap growing disillusionment with the main parties.

The NPD has campaigned for more help for working parents in order to reverse falling birth rates. It has also made no secret of its harsh anti-foreigner stance and expressed sympathy for Nazi-era economic and education policies.

If the polls prove accurate, the elections would be a setback for Merkel's Christian Democrats, whose popularity is sinking nationally amid a dispute over health service reform.

Merkel's party still has an outside chance of winning the most votes in Sunday's election, which could see them lead a coalition with the Social Democrats - mirroring the left-right government that Merkel leads at the federal level.

In Berlin, Social Democrat mayor Klaus Wowereit is expected to remain in office. Wowereit remains highly popular, despite cutting thousands of jobs in a bid to contain Berlin's $76 billion debt.

Algerian Program Offers Amnesty, But Not Answers About Past (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0065082

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

BLIDA, Algeria -- For nearly a decade, this city nestled at the foot of the Atlas Mountains anchored one corner of Algeria's "triangle of death," a killing field overrun by bomb throwers, throat-slitters and masked gunmen during an apocalyptic civil war that killed an estimated 200,000 people.

Peace has gradually returned to Blida, an oasis of orchards and fields north of the Sahara. Stability has been restored as well to most other parts of Algeria where a military-controlled government fought Islamic radicals, although clashes are reported almost daily in remote areas.

Now, in an effort to bring a final end to violence that began in 1992, the Algerian government is pinning its hopes on an ambitious national reconciliation program, which grants official forgiveness to combatants if they set aside their weapons.

Under terms of the reconciliation, which expired Aug. 31 but might be extended, about 2,500 prisoners convicted or accused of terrorism have gone free. Also covered by the amnesty are members of the Algerian security services, blamed for the disappearance of 8,000 civilians and accused of systematic torture. The only people not eligible: rapists and those responsible for mass murder or planting bombs in public places.

Reconciliation and amnesty programs have been embraced by other nations plagued by enduring conflicts. After the end of apartheid in South Africa, a Truth and Reconciliation Commission pardoned human rights violators who confessed their crimes in public. In Morocco last year, a similar commission collected testimony on more than 22,000 documented cases of political repression that occurred under the reign of King Hassan II. The Moroccan and the Algerian programs both include provisions to compensate victims and their families.

More recently, some government officials in Iraq have raised the prospect of offering an amnesty in a bid to end the sectarian warfare that followed the U.S.-led invasion.

Although Algerian voters overwhelmingly approved the terms of their national reconciliation in a referendum last year, few people are predicting that it will heal the rifts and psychological wounds that run deep here.

In dozens of interviews, Algerians said they hoped the amnesty would stop the lingering violence. But many lamented that it would not provide any accountability or answers regarding the countless atrocities that occurred.

Fatima Yous, president of SOS Disappeared, a group that investigates missing persons believed to have been abducted by the government, called the reconciliation an attempt to bury the past. She said she still aches to know what happened to her 20-year-old grandson, who was detained by police in 1997 and has not been seen since.

"All we want is the truth," she said. "We are ready to forgive, but we want our families back and we want the truth. We are not going to sue the guy who killed him. But I do want to know if they killed him, why they killed him and where his bones are."

No one here will be able to forget what happened anytime soon.

Mass graves are still exhumed in sandy ditches and dry outdoor wells. Houses remain pockmarked by bullet holes. Razor wire and uniformed patrols are omnipresent.

But supporters of the amnesty warn that tougher measures -- anything designed to seek justice or dig up the past -- could easily backfire and drag the country back into civil war.

"What we survived was just horrible, terrible," said Mustapha Farouk Ksentini, a lawyer in Blida who serves as chairman of an official human rights commission that has advised the government on the reconciliation plan. "The country is tired. The national unity is very fragile."

"We know that this national reconciliation will forgive a lot of criminals, but it's the price we have to pay to turn the page," he added. "Algeria doesn't have the means to press ahead with trials. We made a choice and said the national interests of Algeria are more important than this."

The reconciliation is only the latest attempt by the Algerian government to bring stability to a country that has suffered greatly over the past half-century.

The second-largest country on the African continent, Algeria won independence from France in 1962, but only after a war that lasted eight years. Three subsequent decades of a military-led government and socialist policies failed to modernize the economy.

In 1992, after Islamic fundamentalists appeared on the verge of winning power in national elections, the military intervened and dissolved the government. That led to civil war, as Islamic radicals took up arms.

The conflict spiraled as rebel factions embraced terrorism and targeted civilians, annihilating entire villages as part of a strategy to weaken popular support for the government. Government security forces also showed little regard for human rights, relying on torture and other tough tactics to break the rebellion.

By 2000, the violence was starting to ebb. Voters in a referendum that year approved a "civil concord," Algeria's first attempt to end the conflict by offering amnesty to those fighting the government. While thousands of Islamic guerrillas accepted pardons, many continued to fight because the measure effectively disenfranchised Islamic political parties.

More disasters followed, both natural and political. In 2001, ethnic Berbers rioted for weeks to protest their treatment by the government. A few months later, several hundred people were killed by floods in Algiers. Another low point was reached in 2003, when more than 2,000 people died in a massive earthquake.

"We lost 15 years of our history," said Aboudjerra Soltani, chairman of Movement of Society for Peace, a party of Islamic fundamentalists that professes nonviolence and is part of the ruling government coalition. "Our economy crumbled. We lost a lot of confidence. It takes a lot of strength to recover from this."

Since then, however, signs of hope have emerged. A global rise in energy prices has lifted the economy and has helped Algeria, the world's second-leading exporter of natural gas, erase foreign debts and invest billions in public works projects.

In 2004, in an election that international observers judged as legitimate, Algerian voters gave a second term to President Abdelaziz Bouteflika. Soon after, he announced another amnesty program, which took effect in March.

According to government officials, about 300 Islamic fighters have accepted the new deal. They estimate that another 800 to 1,000 guerrillas remain at large, down from about 50,000 in the mid-1990s.

While the amnesty offers reconciliation to terrorists and others with blood on their hands, opponents say some provisions in the law are far from conciliatory.

For instance, the measure clamps down on public debate over what happened during the civil war, making it a crime to criticize government actions of that period "or to tarnish the image of Algeria internationally." It has been assailed for those reasons by rights groups, including Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch.

Mostefa Bouchachi, a human rights lawyer in Algiers, said it was unrealistic to expect Algeria to prosecute large numbers of people. "It would result in another bloodbath. But at least we would like to know who did what, and why, and who is responsible. In the Algerian reconciliation, they just tell you to turn the page. We think it's a culturalization of impunity for both camps: the security forces and the Islamists."

Some military officials, however, have complaints of their own. After struggling for 15 years to win the civil war, they questioned whether it made sense to release 2,500 enemies of the state from prison.

Gen. Fodil Cherif Brahim, the army commander in charge of the region surrounding the capital, Algiers, until he retired in 2004, predicted that many former prisoners would return to the mountains or the desert and resume their fight.

"These people are fanatics to the extreme," he said. "They don't know anything about the real Islam. This is what they did: They committed horrible crimes. They put knives in the bellies of pregnant women."

"These people, you have to kill them," he added. "They will never give up."

Such sentiments are common in Blida, where few families escaped the violence of the war.

Zohra Khelafi, 51, said her husband was killed by Islamic radicals in a 1997 firebombing because he worked for the local government as a municipal guard. That same year, militants murdered two dozen other members of Khelafi's family, including a 3-year-old niece who was stuffed into a giant kettle and boiled alive.

"I want the government to punish them, to kill them, just like they did to us," she said. "Instead, the government has released them and they are back on the streets."

‘Save My Wife’ (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

YOKADOUMA, Cameroon

Prudence Lemokouno was lying motionless on a bed in the bleak hospital here, her stomach swelled with a fetus that had just died, her eyes occasionally flickering with fright but mostly dull and empty.

Dr. Pascal Pipi, the lone doctor in the public hospital, said she had a few more hours to live, and then she would join the half-million women a year who die around the world in pregnancy and childbirth.

Her husband, Alain Awona, was beside himself. “Save my wife,” he pleaded. “My baby is dead. Save my wife.”

In the spring, I held a contest to choose a student to take with me on a reporting trip to Africa, and now I’m on that trip with the winner, Casey Parks of Mississippi. I had wanted to introduce Casey to the catastrophic problem of maternal mortality in the developing world, because it should be an international scandal that the number of women dying in pregnancy worldwide has been stuck at a half-million for a quarter-century.

Indeed, here in Cameroon the maternal mortality rate has risen since 1998, and over all an African woman now has one chance in 20 of dying in pregnancy. In much of the world, the most dangerous thing a woman can do is to become pregnant.

When we arrived on Friday at the hospital here in the remote southeastern corner of Cameroon, we found Prudence dying for the reason that usually accounts for maternal death — a complicated childbirth with no emergency obstetric service available.

Prudence, a 24-year-old who has three children, went into labor on Monday. A village midwife assisted her, and after three days she was hoisted onto the back of a motorcycle and carried to this hospital.

And then nothing happened. The hospital demanded $100 worth of surgical supplies for a Caesarian section, and family members said they could raise only $20. I asked the chief nurse, Emilienne Mouassa, how often a woman dies in the hospital because the family can't pay. She hesitated. "Not often," she replied.

She said that when patients like Prudence are at death's door, the hospital sometimes prefers not to operate. It is easier to explain a pregnant woman who has not been treated at all and died than one who has undergone an emergency Caesarian and then died.

Dr. Pipi, a bit embarrassed that a patient was dying in front of foreign journalists, said that he could find a way to operate without the money. But in addition Prudence had lost so much blood that she needed a transfusion.

"We don't have a blood bank here," he explained, "so we sent someone off to bring in other relatives to see if they are compatible. But the village is far, 120 kilometers away, and it takes a long time to bring them here." A few more hours, he estimated, and she would be dead.

These women die because they are poor and female and rural — the most overlooked and disposable people throughout the developing world.

Politics also complicates Western efforts to help. The United Nations Population Fund has helped lead the effort to reduce maternal deaths — yet the Bush administration has cut off all U.S. funding for the agency because of (false) accusations that it supports abortions in China.

We inquired what Prudence's blood type was. The nurse checked and reported that it was A positive. We looked at each other.

I'm also A positive. Casey's blood did not seem to be compatible. But Naka Nathaniel, the Times multimedia maven who often travels with me, is O positive and thus compatible.

Would Dr. Pipi really operate if he could obtain blood? He said he would.

So Naka and I each gave blood, after a nurse went into town to find a plastic bag to put it in. It was promptly pumped into Prudence, and she began to look a bit better. Dr. Pipi promised to operate on her shortly.

Her husband cried with joy, but begged us not to leave. "If you go," he warned, "Prudence will die."

We waited, and six hours passed. The hospital began shaking down Prudence's family for more money before the surgery could begin. The husband had nothing, so we chipped in.

Then when everything seemed to be ready, Dr. Pipi simply vanished. "Oh, he's gone home," a nurse explained. "He'll operate tomorrow."

We cajoled, pleaded and threatened, but the hospital staff was unmoved. "What if Prudence dies in the night?" I asked.

The nurse shrugged and said: "That would be God's will."

NBC – MEET THE PRESS

MR. TIM RUSSERT: Our issues this Sunday: Only 51 days until the midterm elections. The Democrats must gain six seats to take control of the U.S. Senate. This morning, our Senate Debate series continues with another one of the most closely watched races of the year, Virginia, where incumbent Republican Senator George Allen faces off against Democratic challenger Jim Webb. Allen has served in the U.S. House of Representatives and as governor of the state of Virginia. He was elected to the U.S. Senate in 2000 and is a son of the legendary NFL coach George Allen. Webb attended the U.S. Naval Academy, where he was a varsity boxer, even sparring with fellow classmate Oliver North. As a Marine, his service in Vietnam earned him several medals for valor. He later served as secretary of the Navy. George Allen vs. Jim Webb, only on MEET THE PRESS.

MR. TIM RUSSERT: And they are both with us here now.

Mr. Allen, Mr. Webb, welcome both.

MR. JIM WEBB: Thank you.

SEN. GEORGE ALLEN (R-VA): Good morning.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me go back, Mr. Webb, to November of 2000. Here you are, standing with George Allen, endorsing him for the United States Senate, saying this: You endorse George Allen, "Webb said he believes Allen would be a better representative in the Senate on national security issues." How can you endorse someone and then run against him?

MR. WEBB: I--for two reasons. First of all, I had thought George Allen would be bringing better leadership to the United States Senate, and I have not seen that kind of leadership, particularly in the area of national security, where we have become so vulnerable as a nation. The second is that if you look at what's happened to the Republican Party over this period, they're--I'm like a lot of people in this country who affiliated with the Republican Party based on national security issues toward the end of the Vietnam War, were never particularly comfortable with them, particularly on economic issues. And what you've seen over the last six years is a war that is an incredible strategic blunder of historic proportions. We're now getting the--American people are now beginning to understand how bad that decision was. We need to do something about it, and we're seeing the budget busted, and we're seeing the divisions in our, our work force based along class lines as never before.

So A, I thought George Allen would be a leader, and B, I think that the Republican Party has reached the point where, in its Karl Rove era, it's mostly negativity rather than affirmative leadership.

MR. RUSSERT: Did you go see Senator Allen and talk to him about the war in Iraq before it began?

MR. WEBB: Yes, I did. I wrote a piece for The Washington Post six months before we went into Iraq, laying out in my view this was not about WMDs, it was about our troops being turned into terrorist targets, and that there was not an exit strategy because the people in this administration who were doing this did not intend to leave. I went and saw Senator Hagel, I went and saw Senator Allen. I spent an hour with Senator Allen discussing this with him. And from that point forward I decided that, although I had perhaps a, you know, a political--a personal regard for him on one level, politically that I could not support him anymore.

MR. RUSSERT: According to The Virginian-Pilot, Senator Allen, "[Webb] says he became disillusioned with Allen several years ago when he personally warned the senator of the perils of invading Iraq. `The only thing I got out of him was, basically, "You're asking me to be disloyal to the president."'" Is that what you said to Mr. Webb?

SEN. ALLEN: President...

MR. RUSSERT: You supported the war as a way of showing loyalty to the president?

SEN. ALLEN: First of all, I've, I've shown great leadership for the people of Virginia as governor, as United States senator, making this country more safe and also more prosperous. And while my opponent now is upset with tax cuts and upset with energy ideas and education improvements for this country, make sure we are a land of opportunity for all, I'm going to keep fighting for those ideas because they will make our country more prosperous and more safe.

Insofar as leading up to the military action in Iraq: The issues were before us on a resolution, a resolution that stated that Saddam had 17 times defied and violated U.N. resolutions. It wasn't just the United States, it was Britain and indeed the entire world community. There was good evidence that he had weapons of mass destruction--in particular, chemical and biological weapons. The resolution wanted to get the, the whole world community to enforce that resolution, and ultimately the president, in the event that he felt that it was important for the security of our country, may need to act, and need to act as best as possible in coordination, in concert with other countries.

Now, that action was taken, and I think the world's better off with Saddam Hussein not in power. Saddam Hussein was one who was paying $35,000 to parents so they'd send their sons or daughter on these murder/suicide missions into Israel.

This has been a tough war, it's not been easy. I was just with--at a funeral for a young man, Private Wolf. His mother held my hands--this was just on Monday, on 9/11. She wanted to be--have him buried, laid to rest that day. And she held my hands, and she said, "We can't quit. We can't give up." And so this...

MR. RUSSERT: Well, let's just stop right there. And let me, let me...

SEN. ALLEN: ...this--so it is tough. But...

MR. RUSSERT: But let me ask you a simple question. If the CIA said in 2003, "Saddam does not have weapons of mass destruction. That is now our--the finding," would you still have voted to go to war?

SEN. ALLEN: Tim, we, we made decisions. You can't say, "Gosh," five years later--and this is what my opponent's campaign's about is the second-guessing.

MR. RUSSERT: No, but it's a serious question. People are saying, knowing what they know today, they still would have gone in. It's a serious question. If you knew Saddam did not have weapons of mass destruction, was it still worth going to war?

SEN. ALLEN: I stand by my vote, and the vote was based on the evidence and information before us. And we had a choice. We had a choice whether to listen to the critics and do nothing, and then have this world more dangerous if, if we were right.

MR. WEBB: We were...(unintelligible).

SEN. ALLEN: And if we were wrong, and if we were wrong, and, and deposed Saddam Hussein, the world's still better off. Now, my opponent--now, you need, need to understand...

MR. WEBB: Define that.

SEN. ALLEN: No, hold it. My opponent...

MR. WEBB: I mean, this is the third time you've said "my opponent." You know. When, when...

SEN. ALLEN: All right. Well, Jim, hold it. Hold it, Jim.

MR. WEBB: ...when, when we went in...

SEN. ALLEN: Let me finish this.

MR. WEBB: ...when we went...

SEN. ALLEN: Jim was opposed not only to the military action now to get rid of--and recently, but he--if it were up to him, Saddam Hussein would not only be in his palaces in Iraq now, he would actually be in Kuwait, because he was opposed to military action back in 1991.

MR. WEBB: That's an absurd analogy. That's an absurd analogy.

SEN. ALLEN: Heck, heck, the French were even for military action in 1991.

MR. RUSSERT: All right, just, just one second, Mr. Webb.

MR. WEBB: Yes.

MR. RUSSERT: Before I let Mr. Webb respond, did you say to Jim Webb you were voting for the war so as to not be disloyal to President Bush?

SEN. ALLEN: I was supporting our efforts of our administration. It was bipartisan support for this resolution, because I thought we needed to show unity of resolve so that Saddam Hussein, it was my hope, would see how resolved, how unified the United States was, as well as the United Nations, and would actually comply with the weapons inspections.

MR. RUSSERT: The, the concern being if in fact you cast that vote out of loyalty to President Bush...

SEN. ALLEN: No, it's loyalty to this country, and making sure that our country is unified in, in this, in this effort to disarm Saddam Hussein. That was the point.

MR. RUSSERT: I'll give you a chance to respond.

MR. WEBB: First of all, with respect to Gulf War I, I was testifying in the Nunn hearings. I was warning, 16 years ago, that the, that the worse job we did on Iraq, the more powerful Iran would become. And with respect to the French analogy, which he's used before, my, my Marine son was home, and he said, "Wait a minute, OK, the French did support Gulf War I. Dad, you were--you fought in Vietnam, George Allen didn't fight in Vietnam. Even the French fought in Vietnam." I mean, what have the French got to do with any of this?

With respect to going in, in, in this situation, we did have other options. This was not a war of necessity at the time. We had inspectors on the ground, as opposed to the situation in 1998 when there were no inspectors on the ground. And we had plenty of strong military advice, not just from people like me, people like Tony Zinni, and other strongly--people with strong backgrounds, military backgrounds, who have endorsed my campaign, who were saying the same thing. This was a case, as you--last week Vice President Cheney was on your show, and he even declined to comment about the Senate Intelligence Committee report that showed how this--the intelligence that would be--was being used had been cooked. A lot of people on the outside knew that. There was no urgency to go into this war at the time that we went into it. And if we had the right people in the Senate, there would have been more questions asked and a better policy in place in order to defeat international terrorism. That is the focus of our country. We didn't go into Iraq because of terrorism, we have terrorists in Iraq because we went in there.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me...

SEN. ALLEN: I'm sorry...

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Allen, let me, let me just show you The Washington Times op-ed piece that you wrote in January of '05, and here's the headline: "Stay the course." What does that mean? How do you define victory in Iraq, and can it be won militarily?

SEN. ALLEN: Military and security aspects of it are absolutely essential. The people of Iraq have voted--last year three times, 70 percent turnout, walking like slow-moving targets to vote. And they do want a free and just society there, a country that does have respect for, for...

MR. RUSSERT: But what is staying the course?

SEN. ALLEN: Stay, staying the course is meaning that we don't tuck tail and run, that we don't retreat, that we don't surrender. This is a central battle front in the war on terror, and it's not just the president or the vice president or me saying that, that's what al-Qaeda says, because al-Qaeda's designs and their goals are to have a caliphate, Islamic caliphate from, from Indonesia to Spain, with the capital being in Iraq, an oil-rich area. And we cannot allow Iraq, which--where al-Qaeda was and is now, we cannot allow them...

MR. RUSSERT: Now, let me, let me show you, let me show, let me...

SEN. ALLEN: ...to have that haven for terrorist activity.

MR. RUSSERT: Let, let me show you a map of Iraq, and there on the west is Anbar Province. And this is what the Marine Corps has said about Anbar Province. "The chief of intelligence for the Marine Corps in Iraq recently filed an unusual secret report concluding that the prospects for securing that country's western Anbar province are dim and that there is almost nothing the U.S. military can do to improve the political and social situation there, said several military officers and intelligence officials familiar with its contents." That's the military talking. What do we do? Do we seek a, seek a diplomatic solution, or stay the course militarily for years and years and years?

SEN. ALLEN: Anbar was always difficult to govern. The focus now is on the Baghdad area. When I was over in Iraq back in June, whether they were Kurds, Sunni or Shiites, they were all very grateful to Americans for liberating them from Saddam's tyrannical regime. They all also recognize that the key for the country is to make sure there is better security in the Baghdad, the central area. The northern part, the Kurdish area, is doing very well. Gosh, they're even running advertisements for investment in the Kurdish area. They're building homes, there's a convention center. And the southern part, the Shiite part, is, is, is fairly stable, too. The key right now, the focus, the adjustments, the adaptations that have been made, is to focus on the Baghdad area.

MR. RUSSERT: Two supporters of the war, William Kristol of The Weekly Standard, Rich Lowry of the National Review, said, "We are at a crucial moment in Iraq. Supporters of the war, like us, have in the past differed over tactics. But at this urgent pass, there can be no doubt that we need to stop the downward slide in Iraq."

TEXT:

Reinforce Baghdad

We are at a crucial moment in Iraq. Supporters of the war, like us, have in the past differed over tactics. But at this urgent pass, there can be no doubt that we need to stop the downward slide in Iraq by securing Baghdad.

There is no mystery as to what can make the crucial difference in the battle of Baghdad: American troops. ...

We need substantially more troops in Iraq. Sending them would be a courageous act of presidential leadership appropriate to the crisis we face.

RUSSERT: They end, "We need substantially more troops in Iraq. Sending them would be a courageous act of presidential leadership appropriate to the crisis we face." Would you be in favor of putting more troops in Iraq, more American troops?

SEN. ALLEN: We're going to need to do what it takes to succeed. Because...

RUSSERT: Including more troops?

SEN. ALLEN: Because it's so essential to the security of the United States of America. Moreover, that is actually happening right now. If you look at the troop levels in Iraq, they are higher than they were several months ago. Moreover, they have been concentrated in the Baghdad area, so the troops are going to where they're needed.

I would also point out, Tim, to you and, and fellow Americans, is that every single week you see more and more Iraqis and their military taking control. And many of the--now it's probably about a third of the military options are being--military operations--are being led by Iraqis with the U.S. in a supportive role. And as more and more Iraqis take over those military operations, it'll be ultimately up to them, their backbone, their minds, and their hands to build that free and just society that is safe and an ally in the war on terror rather than, than an enemy.

RUSSERT: Mr. Webb, should we increase American troop levels in Iraq?

MR. WEBB: We don't have the troops. I think that you, you, you heard from--you've heard from other military observers on that. We, you know, we've got people now in the Army and the Marine Corps pulling their, their third and sometimes their fourth tours into Iraq. We're burning out our people. It's one of the things I was warning about early on when I said that this was a, a double strategic mouse trap. First of all, a mouse trap with--that was going to burn out our conventional forces, and second of all, a mouse trap in the sense that we have gotten so engaged in fighting the Sunni insurgency that we have allowed the Shia to get more power inside Iraq.

Now, we need, we need to make a couple of clarifications here. Saddam Hussein was not aligned with al-Qaeda, they were natural enemies. And this came out in, in the Senate Intelligence report--Committee report of last week, where we, we were being told that by our, our intelligence advisers, whether it filtered through this administration to get to the Senate or not.

And I agree on one thing, let's be clear: We made a strategic error in going into Iraq, but we have a responsibility to, to reduce our presence in Iraq in a way that will stabilize the region. What I've been saying for two years is we need a commitment from this administration that we, the United States, do not want to be in Iraq as a permanent presence and a long-term presence. But secondly, that we have to get these other countries involved, the other countries tangential to Iraq, the countries that have cultural and historical interests in Iraq, involved in an overt way to move toward a diplomatic process.

I know what it's like to be on the ground. I know what it's like to fight a war like this. And there's--there are limits to what the military can do. Eventually, this is going to have to move into a diplomatic environment. Now, that's where this administration seems to have blinders. They're not talking to Syria, they're not talking to Iran. And there are ways that we can do this, move this forward.

If you look at what we did after Afghanistan, in the invasion of Afghanistan, we actually brought the countries around Afghanistan to the table--including Iran, by the way. Iran was cooperating at that time, before President Bush made his "axis of evil" speech and they stopped cooperating. The eventual way out of this--and it can be done soon, with the right leadership--is for us to get something similar to what we had with the, the Madrid conference in 1991 after Gulf War I, get these countries to the table, and have them work out a formula. Sooner or later, we're going to leave. And when we leave, the countries that are tangential to Iraq are going to be players. We should overtly push that now.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me ask one...

MR. WEBB: Well, all...

MR. RUSSERT: Let me ask one question on troops. When you were last on this program in 1985, you said that conscription, the draft, was good for the military, the country, and the individual. Would you vote to reinstate the draft?

MR. WEBB: I don't believe that this--right now, this country needs a draft. What I've done--one of the things I've done is I've proposed a 5 percent tax break for all people who serve honorably in the military. And one of the reasons that I have done that...

MR. RUSSERT: How much would that cost?

MR. WEBB: If, if you go to the, the typical income of a veteran, it's about $30-something-thousand, so it's not a high-cost program. And it's targeted to people who've served. And one of the things that that would do, by the way, in my view, is to bring more people from across class lines into the military. One of the, one of the great problems we have right now in, in, in discussing this war is that very few people who have brought us this war have served and very, very few of the children of these people who have brought us this war have served. And if you have to wake up every morning wondering about a loved one, you will look at, at words like this much differently.

MR. RUSSERT: But you did say that "We have a lot of cleaning up to do: Number One is to end the war" and that you think that we can be out of Iraq within two years. How would you do that?

MR. WEBB: Well, I--you know, here's--the problem that we have with, like, this Karl Rove approach is every time you put a date on it, people are saying, "Oh, you're trying to give a deadline." I go back to what President Eisenhower said during the dark days of the Korean War when he said, "First of all, the administration that created this disaster is not the administration that's going to repair it." And then he said, "Anyone who can give you a date certain for the end of a war is--has not, does not know war." But...

MR. RUSSERT: But how do you get troops out?

MR. WEBB: Here's--you, you, you get, you get the other countries in this region overtly involved in the diplomatic process, you can get our conventional forces out. Some of them could come straight home. Some of them could be relocated to bases in the region. And you can still have the capability to fight international terrorism. Iraqis don't like terrorism inside their country, either. You should--we should remember that when we got Zarqawi, we did not get Zarqawi by--from troops based inside Iraq. This was a unit that was based outside of Iraq. And you could do that. You could retrograde some of these troops to places like Kuwait and Qatar until we're sure that the region is stabilized, and then bring them back.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Allen, you said we're making process. This was the picture on Tuesday when the prime minister of Iraq went to, where? Iran. There he is, meeting, hugging, kissing, the president of Iran. The speaker of the parliament in Iran--Iraq. The speaker of the Iraqi parliament, the Dennis Hastert of Iraq, this is what he said, "The speaker of [the Iraqi] parliament accused `Jews' of financing acts of violence in Iraq in order to discredit Islamists who control the parliament and government so they can install their `agents' in power. ...

"`Some people say, "We saw you beheading, kidnapping and killing,"' said the speaker. `These acts are not the work of Iraqis. I am sure that he who does this is a Jew and the son of a Jew. I can tell you about these Jewish, Israelis and Zionists who are using Iraqi money and oil to frustrate the Islamic movement in Iraq. ... No one deserves to rule Iraq other than Islamists.'"

That's the speaker of the parliament. Have we created a fundamentalist Islamic regime in Iraq?

SEN. ALLEN: No, we have not. I deplore those words, the fact that the elected leader of the unity government in Iraq meets with the leader of Iran, a, a country that is a state sponsor of terror who is providing rockets to Hezbollah, their surrogates in southern Lebanon, to rain in on Israel. There's a concern; however, what, what my opponent was saying...

MR. RUSSERT: And the...(unintelligible)...leader of Iraq also refused to say Hezbollah is a terrorist group.

SEN. ALLEN: Yes, and they--and that--and they are a terrorist group.

MR. RUSSERT: So what have we created?

SEN. ALLEN: What we have created and helped create in Iraq is indeed, I think, a much freer and more just society than what they had under the regime of Saddam Hussein, who was, as I said earlier--and please remember--was paying families $35,000 to send their sons and daughters on, on these suicide missions, killing people in Israel. They do have freedom of religion in their constitution where rights are not enhanced nor diminished on account of religious beliefs. They do have the right of women and men to express themselves without fear of retribution. They do have a judicial system that they're trying to put together.

It is a fledgling representative democracy. It is like an infant. We're trying to help them learn and just normal things, like procurement and budgets. And they--because all the decisions previously were centrally decided by Baghdad, by Saddam Hussein, and there wasn't any decision-making or discretion at the provincial level. But, but they are trying and we're trying to stand them up.

And the key, there's two or three key issues of matrixes of, of where you can see advances in Iraq. Number one is the training of Iraqis, their military forces and their police forces. The military forces are getting stronger every single day. And in fact the Iraqis, again, are leading those forces, not the U.S., and leading operational endeavors. The police need to get more, more up to speed.

The other aspect of this that I've, I've asked Maliki, I've said it to Jafari and all the ministers, is the key for that country, for their economy is oil. And I think that their oil ought to be a national asset, and they ought to create something like the Alaska Permanent Fund where everybody in Iraq, regardless of where they live, regardless of their ethnicity, has a share in that oil. They'll care about building up the oil capacity, upgrading it--and they'll certainly care about anybody who's blowing up the pipelines, because that would be money out of their pockets. Alaska they get a dividend. Every citizen ought to get a dividend in Iraq as well.

MR. RUSSERT: Yeah. Let, let, let me ask you one, one final question on Iraq. In your mind, in your judgment, could the $300 billion we spent on Iraq had been better spent in other aspects of the war on terror: homeland security, port security, airline security, securing Afghanistan? Was this the best expenditure of $300 billion?

SEN. ALLEN: We have spent money on all those things. In homeland security, we just passed a port security bill this past week. And...

MR. RUSSERT: Yeah, but, but my question is $300 billion in Iraq. Could it have been better spent?

SEN. ALLEN: The point is, is we made a decision. You got to stand by your decision and you can't be constantly second-guessing, Monday-morning quarterbacking. My opponent is--the whole theme of his campaign is we should not have gone in. The question is: where do we go from now? And as a practical matter, listening to Mr. Webb's...

MR. WEBB: Let's not go into that, too, George.

SEN. ALLEN: ...listening to Mr. Webb's statements...

MR. WEBB: I don't--I'm waiting for you to say where you want to go.

SEN. ALLEN: ...there isn't, there isn't that much of a difference insofar as the future.

MR. RUSSERT: Is that true?

MR. WEBB: That's absolutely not true, you know. I, I have not...

MR. RUSSERT: Could the money have been better spent?

MR. WEBB: Yes. We could have, we could have contained Iraq. If you want to take out Saddam Hussein, there are ways to take out Saddam Hussein. We did not need to go into a country, decapitate the government and inherit the, the responsibility of rebuilding it. And eventually that is going to fall to the other countries in the region. It's just going to.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Allen said your views are not much different in terms of the future.

MR. WEBB: I think, I think we have dramatically different views on how to approach this, because what I'm saying is what we need now a clear statement--if he agrees with this, then, then fine--we need a clear statement from this administration that we have no desire for a long-term presence in Iraq. And we need to convene an international conference with the countries in, in tangential and the countries that have cultural and historic ties to Iraq in order to have them move forward with us and, and assume some responsibility for the future of Iraq. The United States can't do this.

MR. RUSSERT: Would you--wait, wait.

SEN. ALLEN: We have absolutely no interest--I have no interest and I--for us to be permanently in Iraq.

MR. RUSSERT: So, no permanent basis.

SEN. ALLEN: I want our...

MR. WEBB: Then would you vote against...

SEN. ALLEN: I--of--I, I have voted...

MR. WEBB: ...would you vote against the appropriations for these four large bases in the remote areas of Iraq?

SEN. ALLEN: Look, we have voted three...

MR. WEBB: This came up again, this came up again this weekend.

SEN. ALLEN: It sure did. It sure did. I'm glad you noticed that this time.

MR. WEBB: Mm-hmm.

SEN. ALLEN: The, the point of the matter is, is I have no interest and the United States has no interest to be permanently in Iraq. I want our troops home the second possible.

MR. RUSSERT: So, no permanent bases.

SEN. ALLEN: Of course no permanent U.S. bases. But the four bases that my opponent will talk about all the time, that we're building these bases, is a consolidation. It's for force protection and so have...

MR. WEBB: And so how long are we going to be in these, in these bases?

SEN. ALLEN: Well, no longer than necessary. The Iraqis...

MR. WEBB: If your--if, if, if our conventional mission is done in the cities of Iraq, we should be getting our conventional forces out of Iraq.

SEN. ALLEN: Sure, of course. And you...

MR. WEBB: Not into the remote areas of Iraq.

SEN. ALLEN: Well, no, there--look, you cannot...

MR. RUSSERT: Let me...

SEN. ALLEN: Jim, you know this, it's important for force protection. It's important to have the military...

MR. WEBB: There is no--as long as the United States forces...

SEN. ALLEN: ...options, whether it's ground forces or air forces.

MR. WEBB: ...conventional forces are in Iraq there will not be peace in the Middle East.

SEN. ALLEN: No, that's not the...

MR. WEBB: That is the point. That is different from Kuwait, that is different from Qatar.

MR. RUSSERT: All right. Let, let, let me turn...

SEN. ALLEN: No, no, no, no, no. Let's get on these bases. The bases are to protect our forces. They're hardened, they're buffered so they can't be hit by, by terrorist attacks. They are being shared, they are being...

MR. WEBB: I think George has a fundamental misunderstanding of how the military is, is used...

SEN. ALLEN: ...they, they are being shared--no, you don't under...

MR. WEBB: ...if he believes that you can--if that--you're still going to be able to assist in these city areas like Ramadi from remote bases somewhere. That's just not true. That's just not true.

MR. RUSSERT: All right. Let me...

SEN. ALLEN: Hold it, whoa, whoa, whoa. Tim, you're saying...

MR. RUSSERT: No, no, no, we, we have a...

SEN. ALLEN: ...you're saying, you're saying that we ought to move...

MR. RUSSERT: ...we obviously have a disagreement on this...

SEN. ALLEN: ...all these folks out of the area and, and that's the way to handle it by moving them to Kuwait and elsewhere.

MR. RUSSERT: All right.

SEN. ALLEN: The point of the matter is, is the Iraqis will ultimately take over these bases.

MR. WEBB: Then we do not need bases--we do not need American bases in Iraq. That's the point.

MR. RUSSERT: All right. Let me, let me move...

SEN. ALLEN: We need to protect our forces.

MR. WEBB: Iraqis can build their own bases. You're not protecting forces if you're sitting in one area.

MR. RUSSERT: This is obviously an area of disagreement. But we have to move on. We, we have a limited amount of...

MR. WEBB: So let, let the record show that we are not totally aligned on this issue.

MR. RUSSERT: All right. Then let me move on to a different issue.

Senator Allen, this week you have to cast a vote. Senator John Warner, John McCain, Lindsey Graham, but your senior colleague in Virginia, John Warner, has a view about interrogating and prosecuting enemy combatants. It is different than George W. Bush. Will you vote for Senator Warner or for President Bush?

SEN. ALLEN: I'm going to make a determination once I get some more facts. There, there are three key differences in this, but there's one that matters the most to me, and it's not all the evidentiary aspects which I think we can do a better job than various proposals on that, and that has to do with the--some of the evidentiary aspects. The key--the two key points for people to understand as this debate goes forward, and whether we vote this week or next week, I will vote on it, you'll know where I stand, but I want to let you know what I'm going to look at.

Number one, these interrogations have helped protect American lives and not just here at home but also in the battlefield. Secondly, the Geneva Convention is very important, and I don't want to set a precedent that we change the Geneva Convention and then other countries will change theirs, and if one of our troops or one of our CIA agents is, is caught...

MR. RUSSERT: In Iran.

SEN. ALLEN: ...or captured--in Iran or Cuba or Venezuela...

MR. RUSSERT: Well, that's Senator Warner's view.

SEN. ALLEN: Right. Now, the key in all of this is I don't want to stop these interrogations. I'm not for torture, I'm not for waterboarding, but some of these techniques have been very helpful to us, whether, whether they are sleep deprivation, or whether there's loud music. And I need to be absolutely certain that what the interrogations--interrogators are doing now--which is completely fine as far as I'm concerned, protecting Americans--will not be harmed by the proposal.

MR. RUSSERT: You know, your critics say that you voted with George Bush 96 percent of the time your five years in the Senate. This time, would you vote for Senator Warner, or President Bush?

SEN. ALLEN: I'm going to vote for what's in the best interests of protecting this country, and making sure that our people here at home, as well as our troops abroad and, and undercover agents for our country are protected. I believe it can be done. I think there can be changes. I actually look forward to taking action, to be a bridge--a bridge between these two proposals, which all have as the same purpose protecting America, and upholding our values. But they, but, but...

MR. RUSSERT: Colin Powell, Colin Powell, who's a constituent of yours, said, "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism. To redefine Common Article 3" of the Geneva Convention "would add to those doubts. Furthermore, it would put our own troops at risk." Do you agree with Secretary Powell that the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism?

SEN. ALLEN: I, I don't believe that the world is doubting our commitment and our resolve to fight these maniacal terrorists. I think...

MR. RUSSERT: No, the moral basis of our fight, is his quote.

SEN. ALLEN: The moral, the moral basis of our fight against terror, and these maniacal deviants...

MR. RUSSERT: So you disagree with Secretary Powell?

SEN. ALLEN: I'm not saying I disagree, I'd just use a different point of view. And our point of view is we, we need to win against these, these terrorist organizations.

MR. RUSSERT: Where do you come down on this? Are you with the Senator Warner-McCain version, or President Bush's version of dealing with interrogating and prosecuting enemy combatants?

MR. WEBB: I, I'm with Senator Warner on this, and I think in terms of what Colin Powell is saying, that's, that's a very important piece of how we view--how we deal long-term with the Islamic world particularly, that we have to stay on the moral high ground. And what you're seeing here is, is a split between the theorists, who have controlled so much of the policy in this administration, theorists who have never been on a battlefield, who have never put a uniform on, and who are looking at this thing in a totally different way from people who have had to, to worry about their troops and themselves possibly coming under enemy hands. This is a very easy issue for, for me to, to decide on.

MR. RUSSERT: But you would not end interrogation?

MR. WEBB: No. Obviously we have to protect ourselves, and we have to be able to get information out. But if you, if you in any way abrogate...

MR. RUSSERT: And you would protect the CIA officers...

MR. WEBB: If you, if you abrogate the, the standards of the Geneva Accords, you give other nations who have less fair standards than ours the, the justification, the moral justification to do that. We, we saw that in a, in a, in a way--I'm sure Senator McCain has, has long memories about this--during the Vietnam War when the North Vietnamese refused to call our prisoners of war prisoners of war. They simply called them war criminals. They said they, they weren't a part of the, the Geneva Accords, and they didn't respect the Geneva Accords. And I'm sure that's on, on people's minds. That's certainly on my mind when I think about troops over in Iraq right now.

MR. RUSSERT: We're going to take...

SEN. ALLEN: That's--and that's why the precedent here is so important. And we've got to get this right. We cannot shut down this interrogation effort and the techniques that we have been using that have protected Americans. I believe that people of good will can come together and, and craft that language.

MR. RUSSERT: We're going to take...

MR. WEBB: But you have to worry about one thing also here, that tainted evidence often comes from torture, and I think John McCain has made that point very well. If we're coercing...

SEN. ALLEN: Well, we're, we're not for torture.

MR. WEBB: ...coercing information--not all--you don't always have the right information. That's how we ended up in Iraq.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: And we're back with the two candidates for the U.S. Senate; from Virginia: Republican George Allen, Democrat Jim Webb.

Mr. Webb, an issue that has now been raised in this campaign, an article you wrote in 1979. Here's the headline: "Women Can't Fight." And you write: "No benefit can come to anyone from women serving in combat. ... Their presence at institutions dedicated to the preparation of men for combat command is poisoning that preparation. By attempting to sexually sterilize the Naval Academy environment in the name of equality, this country has sterilized the whole process of combat leadership training, and our military forces are doomed to suffer the consequences. ...

"I have never met a woman, including the dozens of female midshipmen I encountered during my recent semester as a professor at the Naval Academy, whom I would trust to provide those men with combat leadership."

Kathleen Murray, who entered the Naval Academy in 1984, had a news conference the other day, and this is what she said. Let's watch.

(Videotape, Wednesday):

CMDR. KATHLEEN MURRAY: There is no question that James Webb's attitudes and philosophy were major factors behind the unnecessary abuse and hazing received by me and my fellow women midshipmen. This article was brandished repeatedly by our male upperclassmen. They quoted it and they used it as an excuse to mistreat us.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Now, you issued a statement said, "To the extent my writing caused hardship," you were sorry. "And Ms. Murray has sent me a letter saying, `That's not enough.' It's not to the extent that my writing caused hardship, the content of the article was just plain wrong and Mr. Webb should say that." Do you agree?

MR. WEBB: I--this article was written from the perspective of a Marine rifle platoon and company commander, and to that extent, I think it was way too narrowly based. I wrote that article...

MR. RUSSERT: But was it wrong? Was it wrong?

MR. WEBB: I don't think it was wrong to participate in the debate at that time. It's, it's been 27 years, it's a magazine article, and it's something, if, if I may say, I am fully comfortable with the roles of women in the military today. I've been all around the world at the, at the request of many, you know, women commanders. This issue was vetted twice in, in Senate confirmation hearings, 1984, 1987, and both times I, I expressed my views on women in, in military billets. And when I was secretary of the Navy, on my own initiative, I put together a task force where we ended up opening up more, more billets, operational billets, to women than any other secretary of the Navy in history.

MR. RUSSERT: When you say "Being in the Naval Academy is a horny woman's dream," you regret that.

MR. WEBB: Well, I do regret that. And I, you know, I've said...

MR. RUSSERT: There's been, there's been...

MR. WEBB: ...you know, I've said--there's many, there's many pieces in this article that if, if I were a, you know, a more mature individual, I wouldn't have written. And I've, and I've tried to say that and I've tried to show by my conduct when I had positions in government that I, I am open to, to assisting women succeed in all the areas where that's possible.

MR. RUSSERT: Twenty-two percent of the incoming class will be women. We've had 2700 graduates, women graduates, of the Naval Academy. But you also followed it up with an article in 1997. This is more recent.

MR. WEBB: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: In The Weekly Standard, "The War on the Military Culture." And you write, "Political and military leaders must have the courage to ask clearly in what areas our current policies toward women in the military are hurting, rather than helping, the task of defending the United States." I'll ask you, where are our current policies towards women hurting the defense of the U.S.?

MR. WEBB: Well, I think one of the things I was pointing out in that article was the--was where the political process interferes with the military being able to make its own decision on those matters. And one of the things that I did when I was secretary of the Navy was I turned this over to the military side, to the uniformed side. As you know, I grew up in the military, my father was a career military officer. I had the military side go out--I, I put a task force together that was 50 percent male, 50 percent female, with a truth-teller on it, a woman officer who could walk into my office anytime she wanted. They went to all the Navy installations around the world. And then instead of reporting to me, the political side, they reported to the, the chiefs of the warfare specialties and then as the, the uniformed service reported to me. And that's how we opened up all of those wells, so...

MR. RUSSERT: Bottom line, do you now believe that women can, in fact, provide men with combat leadership?

MR. WEBB: Absolutely. Other than that they're...

MR. RUSSERT: So that's a change.

MR. WEBB: Well, no, no. What I'm saying is, right now, I believe the situation is where a lot of people wanted it to be back in 1970, 19--9--1980 when people--social experimentation was in place rather than allowing the military to make these decisions. When I was in Afghanistan two years ago as a journalist, I went nine different places in Afghanistan. One place I was driven around in a CH-46 with a, with a woman pilot. You know, she gave me the ride of my life. We landed, she came over and had her picture taken with me.

MR. RUSSERT: But it is 2006. You have not changed your mind at all about women's ability to lead men?

MR. WEBB: No. I did not say that. I--I'm fully comfortable with women's ability to lead men.

MR. RUSSERT: So you have changed your mind?

MR. WEBB: What, what, what I'm saying is, in areas like the infantry and the artillery, where--which now remain all-male, I'm comfortable with that, too. And Senator Allen has his own issues on this, by the way. As recently as 2000, saying women didn't belong in fox holes, and maybe you should ask him about that.

MR. RUSSERT: Well, I will. In fact, I want to ask Senator Allen about this. From American Enterprise magazine, "If [Virginia Military Institute] admitted women, it wouldn't be the VMI that we've known for 154 years. You just don't treat women the way you treat fellow cadets. If you did, it would be ungentlemanly, it would be improper." Men and women shouldn't be treated the same at a military institution?

SEN. ALLEN: The, the regiment at VMI and the way that it was--the curriculum, the training would, would be ungentlemanly to treat women the way that they were doing it. In Virginia, at Virginia Tech, we had women and opportunities for women to get military training in a co-ed approach. VMI and their board for many years, including with Governor Wilder, felt that they should continue the way that they had in the past. Now, here's the difference.

MR. RUSSERT: But has women at VMI worked?

SEN. ALLEN: Yes, it has.

MR. RUSSERT: So you were wrong.

SEN. ALLEN: Yeah, it has worked, and we have been able...

MR. RUSSERT: So you were wrong?

SEN. ALLEN: Well, we were wrong. But here's the point, here's the difference: the Supreme Court said we were wrong, we applied--we complied with that decision. And here's the difference: Mr. Webb goes and gives that--writes that, that piece, gives speeches criticizing women at the Naval Academies, three and four and five, six years after they were admitted. What we said, and what I said, is I'm going to deplore anybody who demeans women. And, in fact, what I was trying to do as governor was to make sure that we protected women from the demeaning, disrespectful viewpoints of people like Jim Webb.

MR. WEBB: I don't--wait, I can't, I can't let that sit. That's just ridiculous. I mean, I, I was not allowed to speak at the Naval Academy for, for several years after this occurred. When I went back there, when I spoke, one, one of the things that I said was a strong voice saying women--men and women, need to get along, they need to respect each other. And when I was secretary of the Navy, I, on my own initiative, strengthened rules against sexual harassment.

SEN. ALLEN: And what would you--what, what would you say to the women with the comments you've made about the witch hunt of the Tailhook matter?

MR. WEBB: The Tailhook issue was a very complicated issue, and what was happening on that was the leadership of the Navy was not standing up for its own culture. They were allowing their culture to be torn apart rather than...

SEN. ALLEN: But you called that a witch hunt.

MR. WEBB: You know, I went on, I went on "Nightline" right after Tailhook, and I was asked what I would've done, and I said if I had been president at Tailhook, I would've relieved the senior officer present in that corridor.

MR. RUSSERT: Mister...

MR. WEBB: What they've done is they took one incident in one corridor and and tried to damn the entire culture of the Navy, and that was wrong.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Webb, there are 23,000 women involved in the war in Iraq or Afghanistan, we've had 62 women killed, more than Vietnam, Korea and the first Gulf War combined. What happens now is that the Pentagon, rather than assigning women to combat, attaches them to combat.

MR. WEBB: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: You know that.

MR. RUSSERT: Shouldn't we just be honest and say women can be in combat?

MR. WEBB: Well, I think what you have is a misunderstanding of the term that was, was being debated back in 1979. Women have always been in combat. We had women win Silver Stars in World War II. The question in place was combat military occupational specialties. That's what, that's what the issue was. Should, should all occupational specialties be open? Now, when I was in Afghanistan two years ago, I was with the Marine unit which had women attached to it for purposes of interrogating Afghani women, you know. And that was a, you know, they were in the same environment as the infantry troops...

MR. RUSSERT: Absolutely.

MR. WEBB: And that was an absolutely valid use of women.

MR. RUSSERT: LeeAnn Webster got the Silver Star for heroism.

MR. WEBB: Sure. And that's, that's an absolutely valid use.

MR. RUSSERT: For being shot at.

MR. WEBB: The question is, let the military decide whether, let's say, in a rifle platoon, you want to bring women in. That's the position that I had. The dead hand should not steer the rudder, and I'm very comfortable with where the military is right now on these issues.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Allen, you, too, have gotten in trouble with words that you've uttered. Let me bring you back to August 11th. You were at a campaign stop, and a young man who was videotaping it for the Webb campaign was there also. Let's watch.

SEN. ALLEN: This fellow here--over here in the yellow shirt, macaca, or whatever his name is, he's with my opponent. And let's give a welcome to macaca here. Welcome to America and the real world of Virginia.

(End videotape)

RUSSERT: And here's the young man, S.R. Sidarth, he's a resident of Virginia, an American citizen, straight-A student at Fairfax High School and now goes to the University of Virginia. Critics say that "macaca" is a racist slur, and that you used it because he was dark-skinned. What did you specifically mean when you said, "Welcome to America and the real Virginia"? Why did you use those words toward a dark-skinned American?

SEN. ALLEN: Tim, I made a mistake. I said things thoughtlessly. I've apologized for it, as well I should. But there was no racial or ethnic intent to slur anyone. If I had any idea that, that that word, and to some people in some parts of the world, world, was an insult, I would never do it, because it's contrary to what I believe and who I am.

MR. RUSSERT: Well, where'd the word come from? It must've been in your consciousness.

SEN. ALLEN: Oh, it's just made up.

MR. RUSSERT: Made up?

SEN. ALLEN: Just made up. Made-up word.

MR. RUSSERT: You'd never heard it before?

SEN. ALLEN: Never heard it before.

MR. RUSSERT: What did you mean...

SEN. ALLEN: And if, and if I did, honestly, Tim, if I thought that that was slurring anybody based on their ethnicity or their race or their religion, I would never do it. It's not who I am. It's not how I was raised.

MR. RUSSERT: But why would you say to someone "Welcome to America, welcome to the real Virginia"?

SEN. ALLEN: Because he was the cameraman for, for Jim Webb. He was following us around all over, all over the state. And we were going to small towns and rural areas and places that, while my opponent that week was out in Hollywood raising money, and I was talking about Virginia values. And so the point was, as you're talking to the cameraman, to talk to Mr. Webb, to say, "Hey, here's--welcome to the real world of Virginia," as opposed to Hollywood, which is a world of make-believe.

MR. RUSSERT: This is not the first time that people have looked at your record, and, and, and raised questions. The New York Times said, "In 1984, as a member of the Virginia House of Delegates, Mr. Allen opposed a state holiday honoring the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. After being elected governor in 1993, he issued a proclamation honoring Confederate History Month." And the Associated Press says, "Allen used to keep a Confederate flag in his living room, a noose in his law office and a picture of Confederate troops in his governor's office." Can you imagine black Americans, black Virginians reading that? What would they be thinking about George Allen, and why did you do that?

SEN. ALLEN: There are a lot of things that I wish I had learned earlier in life. I grew up in a football family, as you well know, and my parents and, and those teams taught me a lot. And one of the things that you learn in football is that you don't care about someone's race or ethnicity or religion, it's a meritocracy, it's a level playing field, and it's what we should aspire to in our society. And that's why I've always been advocating, making sure America and Virginia's a land of opportunity for all.

There's a reason why state Senator Benny Lambert, a Democrat, an African-American, the senior African-American in the legislature, this past week endorsed me, because he knows my record on a variety of issues, particularly in education, and improving the opportunities at historically black colleges and universities. Through the years I've learned and I've grown, and I've learned from people. I've learned in the civil rights pilgrimage that I went down to Selma and Montgomery and Birmingham, and, and listened to heroes of the civil rights struggle...

MR. RUSSERT: So no more, no more Confederate flags?

SEN. ALLEN: On the Confederate flag--look, I wish I had had these experiences earlier in life, because I would have made decisions differently. The Confederate flag--as, as a kid, I was rebellious, anti-establishment, I still am. And I looked at the flag as a symbol for that.

MR. RUSSERT: But you were governor.

SEN. ALLEN: Now as--and I look at the flag, also, and some others do, as heritage and as regional pride. But I've also seen, over the years, talking and listening and learning and growing, that that flag, to African-Americans, represents repression, segregation and violence against them. And I would never want to have anything to insult or offend someone, and so that's why I would not be utilizing that flag, because that's not who I am, and I would never want to have that image or, or harmful impact on fellow human beings who I want to make sure are part of team America, because we do need to compete much better against countries in six and seven times our population. We need more women, we need more African-Americans, more Latinos interested in science and technology and engineering for us to be the world capital of innovation.

MR. RUSSERT: I want you to respond to that, but also address your comments about affirmative action being "state-sponsored racism."

MR. WEBB: May I respond first to what he just said?

MR. RUSSERT: Please.

MR. WEBB: I mean, start off with--I think this, this campaign, the Allen campaign, is like the a lot of the Karl Rove campaigns. They, they focus on personal invective, you can see it in the ads that they've already run against me. I may have been in Hollywood, what--or in L.A. doing fund-raising. I'm--you know, Senator Allen's going to have an awful lot of money. Senator Allen's raised a lot more money in Hollywood than I have.

But let's talk about this incident. He not only bullied an, an individual in my campaign--and I know how hard it is, I've had a camera three foot from my face for eight months now in any public place--he not only bullied an individual, whether he was of Indian descent or not, but before he, he did that, he made comments that were deliberately misrepresentative of my own experiences in southwest Virginia. Ironically, he was standing in a place where 40 miles on one side my great-grandfather had been born, 40 miles on the other side my grandfather had been born. And I've spent a great deal of my adult life in southwest Virginia personally, not politically, in connection with relatives I have down there. In fact, Sidarth, the night before you insulted him, was spending the night at the home of one of my relatives in Gate City, Virginia. And I believe that, that the insinuation out of this, that, that person was separate, insulted a lot of the people down there, because that's not their culture. That's a very inclusive culture down there.

Now, with respect to affirmative action, my view on affirmative action has been that--and, and remains that it's a 13th Amendment program. If you go back to the Johnson administration's executive order on affirmative action, it was based on the 13th Amendment and the Civil Rights Act of 1866, designed to remove the badges of slavery. African-Americans are the only ethnic group in this country that have suffered from deliberate discrimination and, and exclusion by the government over generations. When this program expanded to the present day diversity programs, where essentially every ethnic group other than Caucasians are included, then that becomes state-sponsored racism. And we should either move this program back to its original intent, which I support, or we should open up diversity programs to the point where poor white cultures--and they are cultures, as in southwest Virginia--have some opportunity.

MR. RUSSERT: We are out of time. Before we go, Senator Allen, you have said, "The Senate is too slow for me." Would you pledge to serve a full six-year term if re-elected to the Senate?

SEN. ALLEN: The Senate does move too slowly. Having been governor I like action and I wish the Senate would move faster. But my focus is to keep fighting in the Senate for these ideas.

MR. RUSSERT: For six--will you serve a six-year term?

SEN. ALLEN: I'm the only candidate running on ideas on education...

MR. RUSSERT: OK.

SEN. ALLEN: ...and on energy independence. And I am focused...

MR. RUSSERT: I, I, I've read the--I've read the brochure. I've read the brochure.

SEN. ALLEN: ...and I want--I will...

MR. RUSSERT: But will you serve...

SEN. ALLEN: Sure, and you can put it in as a...(unintelligible)...of my family.

MR. RUSSERT: ...will you pledge to serve a full six-year term?

SEN. ALLEN: I pledge that I'm going to fight as hard as I can for our shared values and vision for Virginia for the next six years in Washington.

MR. RUSSERT: The one thing you both have in common is you both chew tobacco. Is that the right image for young people? It's a serious question.

SEN. ALLEN: I don't--I, I don't advise young people. That's another one of the...

MR. RUSSERT: What about you? What about you?

SEN. ALLEN: By the way--by the way, I picked that up from the Chicago Bears training camp.

MR. WEBB: We all have--we all have our vices, Tim. And I've been chewing tobacco since I was 14 and it's...

MR. RUSSERT: But is it a good example for young people?

SEN. ALLEN: No.

MR. WEBB: Probably, probably not, but it's something that I've done for a long time outdoors. I don't chew indoors, I don't chew at ceremonies, I don't chew when I'm in any official function, but there are times when I chew tobacco.

MR. RUSSERT: You're both going to...(unintelligible).

SEN. ALLEN: Fine, fine, fine. Yes, I do dip. But let me, let me finish with Mark Twain's quote: "Nothing needs more reforming than somebody's else's habit."

MR. RUSSERT: To be continued. Jim Webb the Democrat, George Allen the Republican. A lot more to talk about. I wish we had three hours.

We'll be right back. Our Senate Debate series will continue. Two weeks another closely watched Senate race: Ohio Republican Mike DeWine debates his Democratic opponent Sherrod Brown. Two weeks right here on MEET THE PRESS.

ABC – THIS WEEK

STEPHANOPOULOS: Will the president's plan expose American POWs to torture? Will McCain's plan expose American interrogators to prosecution? What does this say about who we are, and what will it mean for our politics? That debate this morning with our headliners, Senator John McCain and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley from the White House. George Will, Cokie Roberts and Sam Donaldson debate the week's politics on our roundtable.

Plus, Jewel.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JEWEL (singing): Who will save your soul?

We're really simply asking for 48 hours, not to let an insurance company force you out before you're ready.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And as always, the Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CONAN O'BRIEN, HOST, LATE NIGHT WITH CONAN O'BRIEN : Today, of course, the Democratic and Republican primaries were held all across the country. Yeah. So far it's evenly split between those who forgot to vote and those who chose not to vote.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Good morning, everyone. The Republican debate over how to fight the war on terror broke open late this week when Colin Powell broke with President Bush on the rules for interrogating enemy prisoners. The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism, he wrote. To redefine Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions would add to those doubts. On Friday, President Bush punched back.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: I simply can't accept that. It's unacceptable to think that there's any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And we begin this morning with Powell's chief Senate ally in this fight, John McCain. Welcome back to This Week, sir.

MCCAIN: Good morning. Thanks, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You heard the president there. He said your logic is flawed, and he suggests you and Secretary Powell are equating America and al Qaida. Is that accusation fair?

MCCAIN: Well, I just don't think it's right. What General Powell was saying in his statement, and I think very clearly, is that the difference between us and al Qaida is that they are very bad people.

They are people that, when they are in our custody, they deserve nothing except the fundamental rights that all prisoners under the Geneva Conventions -- and for the benefit of our viewers, the Geneva Conventions were signed and agreed to by the United States and literally every other country in the world in 1949. We have been adhering to that through many wars: Vietnam, Korea and the conflicts since then.

And the administration's proposal, as I'm sure Mr. Hadley will articulate, is they want to modify the conventions. General Vessey, General Powell, me, literally -- General Shalikashvili, many military leaders believe that we should not modify it.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, the administration might take issue with the word modify. They say they want to interpret the Geneva Conventions. And Secretary Rice in her letter to you in the Senate said that is accepted practice in international law.

MCCAIN: Well, of course it's not -- when we ratify a treaty, when the Senate ratifies a treaty, which we did 50-some years ago, that was the time to, quote, interpret, or make reservations.

Here's the situation. Suppose the Iranians capture an American, and this Common Article 3 -- and I don't mean to get too esoteric -- applies to all prisoners...

STEPHANOPOULOS: And it bans outrages against personal dignity.

MCCAIN: Yes, but it applies to all prisoners. For example, suppose that one of our Special Forces, not in uniform, or a CIA person or DEA or something. Suppose the Iranians capture an American, and they decided that they would modify the Common Article 3 to suit their purposes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the administration... MCCAIN: Suppose that any nation in the world -- and our Americans -- Americans have more exposure than any other nationality in the world because we have people all over the world.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the administration says all they're doing is taking the McCain ban on torture, the McCain ban...

MCCAIN: Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: ... which passed overwhelmingly last year, and applying it to the CIA program. What is wrong with that?

MCCAIN: We want to do that, and we want to do it by amending the War Powers Act. What we don't want to do is have nations in the world interpret or, quote, modify, depending on what you say, the Geneva Conventions. They have not been touched for 57 years. They are the standard.

The Vietnamese treated us rather badly for quite a period of time. That didn't mean that the United States of America wanted to interpret the Geneva Conventions any other way. In fact, they insisted that the Vietnamese treat us under those, and indeed for reasons that are still not clear to me, it was improved.

The gold standard throughout the world...

STEPHANOPOULOS: You bring that up...

MCCAIN: ... is the Geneva Conventions.

STEPHANOPOULOS: For example, you brought up the Vietnamese. You, of course, as everyone knows, spent several years in a Vietnamese prison camp.

Do you think the fact that America was holding the Geneva Conventions had any impact on how the Vietnamese treated you? 1 MCCAIN: Sure, it does. We have to hold the moral high ground. We're the nation that people look up to. We can't lower our standards because others do.

We hold no grief for Al Qaida. We don't think Al Qaida will ever observe those conventions, but we're going to be in other wars.

And there's two reasons all these retired military guys, who are not soft on terror or Al Qaida, are coming down vehemently against modifying the Geneva Conventions.

There's two reasons. One is the moral high ground. We are not like Al Qaida. We're not like the bad guys. We're the nation that people look up to.

There's a war on the battlefield and a psychological, an ideological struggle going on.

And the second is, they're very worried about American military personnel falling into the hands of enemies who will, quote, modify or reinterpret the Geneva Conventions to their liking.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the president is worried and the administration is worried that interrogators will be subject to prosecution.

And they look at this clause of Article 3, which bans outrages on personal dignity, humiliating treatment, and they say that's going to expose officers to prosecution, for example, if they put two prisoners in a cell without a screened toilet, if they don't allow someone to go out for enough exercise during the day. They say European courts have already made those determinations.

Isn't that a concern?

MCCAIN: Of course not. What we propose is to add and amend to the War Crimes Act. The War Crimes Act is a piece of legislation concerning activities during the commission of war crimes, and we provide for provisions, as long as they do not breach -- have severe breaches of conduct, they then will have protection from both criminal and civil liability. And we spell out what those serious breaches are.

Then the others are open to political dialogue or discussion. The CIA may do something that I disagree with, but we will provide them, as long as there are not grave breaches, with the protections that they need.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The president also makes the point that this program simply has worked, that we've gotten valuable intelligence. Take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that Al Qaida and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland. Making us -- giving us information about terrorist plans we couldn't get anywhere else, this program has saved innocent lives.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Are you worried about the intelligence loss if this program is shut down?

MCCAIN: I am not saying we should shut down the program. In fact, we should have a program.

What I'm saying is that we should not do things which would be condemned by everyone in the world, number one, which would lower our moral standing, as Secretary Powell and others are concerned about.

And second of all, we should be very aware that, if we engage in these activities, which are then condemned by all and violate the standards by which we behaved for the last 57 years, the world will condemn us and we will lose the high ground.

And what happens to Americans who are captives in future wars?

STEPHANOPOULOS: You say you don't want to shut down the program, but the president was pretty clear at his press conference on Friday. He says, unless the CIA, unless the intelligence community says we can go forward -- and we can't, they believe, under the rules you are suggesting -- the program is shut down. It's simply not going to exist.

MCCAIN: Well, we are confident that they can continue the program, that they can continue to adhere to the Geneva Conventions, which have been in effect in many wars, and in fact, some wars which were far more dangerous in some ways than this, and that they can meet the intelligence requirements of this country.

By the way, I get that from the former chief of the British armed forces, who was involved in Northern Ireland.

Look, this is a matter of conscience and American conscience. Are we going to be like the enemy, or are we going to be the United States of America?

There is a war that we are losing in some ways, as General Powell pointed out, and that's our standing in the world because of our treatment at Abu Ghraib, Guantanamo, et cetera. We have to keep the moral high ground.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Does that mean we're losing the overall war on terror, because of that?

MCCAIN: I think that it puts it in danger if we do, if our friends and our enemies believe we are no different from them. But we can win this war.

I believe we will win this war, and I believe that we can have a program that's effective and gather the intelligence we need without changing the Geneva Conventions, which would then be condemned by all, and also then interpreted to the satisfaction of our enemies.

STEPHANOPOULOS: I was talking to Stephen Hadley in the green room before you came out. As you know, he's going to be following you on this program. He still thinks a compromise is possible, that this doesn't have to come down to a showdown on the Senate floor. Do you agree, and are the talks continuing?

MCCAIN: Absolutely, the talks are continuing. I've supported this president in the war on terror. I've supported him on the war in Iraq. I think he's a friend. I hope he considers me a friend. I believe we can sit down, we can work this out, preserve our Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Why didn't it happen before the hearing last week? Why this eruption?

MCCAIN: Well, we had many conversations before it and during. And I still believe that we'll be able to work this out to the satisfaction of everybody concerned. I really do, and I am committed to that, as are Lindsey Graham and John Warner and many others. But again, to ignore people like General Jack Vessey, one of our great heroes, Secretary Powell...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

MCCAIN: Yeah, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, so many others, who are deeply concerned about this issue because they care deeply about the men and women who are serving. They care nothing about Al Qaida.

STEPHANOPOULOS: This has become a political issue as well, as you know, and you're of course looking at a run for president in 2008. Two early primary states, South Carolina and New Hampshire. Look at what the chairman of the South Carolina Republican Party said just yesterday. Obviously, the president is right on this issue. I think John McCain thinks he's right. McCain and Warner and Graham, I think people on the ground think they are wrong.

The Manchester Union Leader in New Hampshire yesterday -- you're going there later today -- wrote an editorial: Senator McCain is fighting the wrong war when he equates stateless Islamic jihadists with nations with whom we have fought in the past. You don't read Miranda rights to barbarians, or worry about 'what the world thinks' when you're fighting an enemy that is out to destroy you. If McCain can't understand that, New Hampshire's citizens must question why they should support him for president.

Is this going to hurt your run for president?

MCCAIN: Mr. McQuaid and I are friendly. He has not supported me in the past. I respect those views. I respect more the views of those who have been in wars and worn the uniform.

I believe that this has nothing to do with politics. I tell you very frankly, no matter what the political impact is, this is a matter of conscience.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And how much of it is driven, in the end, by your personal experience, by the fact that you spent five years in a Vietnamese prison camp?

MCCAIN: I think it gives me a certain amount of expertise, but why would General Vessey and General Powell and General Shalikashvili and all of these other people who have served in many more wars, with far more distinction than I have, share the views that I have? And that's because they are very worried about how we win wars, and they are very worried about the men and woman who may have to serve in future wars. And by the way, this has nothing to do with Al Qaida. It has everything to do with America.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally, sir, I began with that quote from President Bush. The rhetoric truly does seem to be ratcheting up this week. Let me end with a quote from House Majority Leader John Boehner, talking about the Democrats, Republicans and the war on terror.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REP. JOHN BOEHNER (R-OH), MAJORITY LEADER: Sometimes based on the votes that get cast, you wonder whether they're more interested in the rights of the terrorists than in protecting the American people.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Is that appropriate?

MCCAIN: I don't think we should question people's patriotism, but there are differences of opinion about how we conduct the war on terror and in Iraq, and I think those views -- it's legitimate to air those views.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And thank you for sharing your views today.

MCCAIN: Thank you.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator McCain, thanks very much.

The national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, is next. And later, the Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JAY LENO, HOST, THE TONIGHT SHOW : Hillary Clinton's opponent in the U.S. Senate race, the Republican she's going to be running against, has been married three times, had an affair with his chief of staff, had two kids with her while he was still married to his second wife. This is the first time in history that a Clinton is the family values candidate.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And we are back now with the president's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley. Welcome.

HADLEY: Nice to be here.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, you heard Senator McCain. He uses the word modify. You use the word interpret, on the Geneva Conventions. But his basic point is, we've never done it before; we shouldn't start now.

How do you respond?

HADLEY: When the treaties are enacted by the Senate, it is very typical for Congress then to pass implementing legislation that clarifies what treaty requirements mean under U.S. law.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But as he points out, that's the only way to ratify it, isn't it, not...

(CROSSTALK)

HADLEY: It's done both ways. It's done, sometimes, by reservation at the time of ratification, as the convention against torture. But it's also done routinely after a treaty has been ratified by the Senate to implement it.

Because the point is to take international law and define what it means under U.S. law. We do that all the time, routinely, on implementing legislation for treaty provisions.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Have we ever done it with the Geneva Convention?

HADLEY: We haven't done it with the Geneva Convention, and particularly, Common Article 3, because, for 40 years, nobody thought that it applied to the conflict with Al Qaida.

We didn't. And that was a change that was made in the law, in June, by the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan.

And that's why we're in the situation we are in now. Something that everyone thought, for 40 years, did not apply to Al Qaida, did not apply to treatment of Al Qaida terrorists held in detention, now suddenly was applied by the Supreme Court.

And the question is how to define what that means. Because, as you rightly pointed out, the terms are very vague, very ambiguous. And we owe our men and women, who are conducting interrogations and questioning these folks, clear lines.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Are you saying, then, that you have to do this interpretation now because Al Qaida prisoners are different from other kinds of prisoners of war?

HADLEY: Yes, one of the, I think, the confusions out here is that Common Article 3 does not apply to men and women in uniform, ours or others.

Men and women in uniform, if taken on the battlefield, are subject, have POW prisoner of war status and are subject to a different set of rules.

What we're talking, in terms of Common Article 3, is a minimum set of standards that would apply to what's called unlawful combatants, people like Al Qaida terrorists.

And let's be clear who these people are. These are people who don't wear uniforms, who hide among civilian populations and, quite frankly, use war crimes, killing innocent civilians as a tactic. So let's be clear what we're talking about here.

Nonetheless, notwithstanding the fact these are people who don't detain Americans on the battlefield; they kill them, we have said that we are going to provide the kinds of standards of treatment that are in the Detainee Treatment Act, sponsored by Senator McCain, approved by the Congress in December of last year.

And we're adopting that standard, agreed on by the Congress, defining a treatment of all these Al Qaida detainees, wherever held. We're using that to make up and solve the problem you identified, that the language of Common Article 3 is simply too ambiguous to give clear guidance to our CIA...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the opponents say that it's -- what you're trying to do is impose a flexible standard. And there must be a reason you're fighting for this so fiercely. And I'm wondering, what is it?

What are the techniques that will be permitted under the president's bill that would be prohibited by the McCain bill?

What is it you're trying to do?

HADLEY: What we're trying to do is answer a call that comes from the men and women at the CIA, that are responsible for questioning AL Qaida detainees.

And what they've asked for, very simply, is, let us have clear standards.

These are good men and women.

They're professionals. They want to know that they're complying with the law. All the law. Not just U.S. law, but also our treaty obligations. And they say, tell us what the law is. It's ambiguous.

Tell us what the law is, and make it clear that the Congress of the United States supports what we're doing. That is not too much to ask. And it is terribly important because if they will not do what we've asked them to do, there will be no program.

And remember, George, we're talking about a program that everyone concedes is the best source of information we have on Al Qaida, and is something that allowed us to disrupt plots and save American lives.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, let's get into that.

HADLEY: This is the best tool we have.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let's get into that. Because the president cited Abu Zubaydah, the questioning of Abu Zubaydah as one that yielded very valuable intelligence. And The New York Times wrote about his interrogation. It said that Mr. Zubaydah was stripped and placed in a cell without a bunk or blankets. He stood or lay on the bare floor, sometimes with air-conditioning adjusted so he seemed to turn blue. At other times, the interrogators piped in deafening blasts of music by groups -- this is a little strange -- like the Red Hot Chili Peppers.

Is this the kind of interrogation that you're trying to protect?

HADLEY: We obviously can't go into the details what have we are doing. Let me be clear the process that the president set forward. We do not at this point have any Al Qaida detainees in the CIA program. They are all now at Guantanamo Bay.

What the president is trying to do is get clarity as to what is the legal standard that applies to the questioning of these people. Once we have clarity on that, Mike Hayden is going up to Congress, the key committees of Congress and leadership and explaining exactly the kind of program that we think is appropriate.

And the reason we have this program -- it was very clear in the president's statement and speech of a week ago Wednesday -- these kind of hard-core terrorists who are most likely to have information to allow us to protect America are trained in counter interrogation techniques. Everybody knows what the military does. They're trained to resist them. And what we found in those cases the president talked about, it was only when they went into this CIA program were we able to get information that saved American lives.

Now, this is not torture. This is not a program out of control. This is a program that is conducted pursuant to law by professionals who receive a lot of training.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But, sir, as you know, that has been disputed by some in the FBI, others. The deputy chief of army intelligence, General Kimmons, says that no good intelligence has ever come from physically abusive practices. And your basic point on the not revealing the techniques, you're basically saying, trust us. But after Abu Ghraib, after the misleading statements on weapons of mass destruction and Iraq's links to Al Qaida, isn't it asking a lot of Congress and the country and the world simply to take your arguments on faith?

HADLEY: We're not saying trust us. We're not saying trust us. What the president, one, the president made clear, and he gave some examples of the effectiveness of this program and the essential contribution it made to getting information that we needed to protect Americans.

Secondly, we are going and Michael Hayden is going to the Congress of the United States, the key committees and the key leadership, and is laying out exactly what we are doing. But to have a public discussion of specific techniques simply gives information to the enemy that allows them to train against the techniques and neutralize their effect.

So one of the things -- you know, in a war on terror there are some things that have to remain secret if they are to be effective, but it is not out of control and we're not saying trust us. We're going to the Congress trying to get clear legal standards, and then Mike Hayden is going to the Congress and explaining the program that he will run.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Newsweek reported this week, just this morning, that in those briefings of the Congress, CIA officials have assured the senators that water boarding, simulated drowning, is no longer going to be used. Is that true?

HADLEY: As I said, we can't go into the details of that he programs but I would say -- I would emphasize, Mike Hayden is going into detail with members of the Congress. He is going into detail with Senator John McCain. So this is going to be a program that will be clear in law, that will have the support of the Congress.

That's what the men and women who run this program request. That's what they deserve. But, remember, what we're talking about, there's a simple question here: Are we going to continue to have a program that effectively and lawfully questioning Al Qaida detainees, or are we not?

That is the question. If we want that program, then we owe the men and women who are going to run it to give them clear guidance on terms of what law applies, what it requires of them and clear Congressional support.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator McCain says if you insist on your position you're going to be putting American soldiers, American service people at risk.

HADLEY: As I said, what we're talking about, the standards that apply, not to men and women in uniform, but to Al Qaida. Men and women in uniform have prisoner of war protections. That's a separate set of higher standards.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But what about a Delta Force, special force who's not in uniform?

HADLEY: It's interesting. What we are doing, of course, is not amending Common Article 3. We are clarifying it. We are giving guidance to the people who do the questioning, what the standard is.

And are using the standard Senator McCain sponsored, and the Congress sponsored, in December.

But it's interesting that the Department of Defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the director of Central Intelligence, the agencies whose men and women are on the front lines on the war on terror and are at risk every day, support this legislative approach we have proposed.

Why do they do that? Why do they do that? Because all of them want their men and women to have clear lines of what is lawful and what is unlawful.

And secondly, they know that this program has not only provided intelligence that has frustrated attacks on the homeland. It has also provided intelligence that has saved lives of men and women.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But this is also an ideological war, a political war, a cultural war.

Secretary of State Powell, in this morning's Newsweek Magazine: Part of the war on terror is an ideological and political struggle. Our moral posture is one of our best weapons. We're not doing so well on the public diplomacy front. This would be the wrong signal to send to the world.

HADLEY: I think it's the right signal to send to the world, in the same way that everybody heralded the passage of the Detainee Treatment Act, sponsored by Senator McCain last December.

Everybody gave a sigh of relief, said, at last America has a clear standard. It violates cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. Those terms are defined and understood under U.S. law. They give clear guidance to our people.

That was the right solution. And it is the solution, now, for solving the problem of having a Supreme Court decision that says, for the first time, Common Article 3, with its vague terms, applies to this conflict. STEPHANOPOULOS: We're just about out of time. Senator McCain says this can be worked out. Do you agree?

HADLEY: I do. I think what we have to do is work for a solution that does three things: that makes sure that we continue to have this terribly important program for protecting the country, as the president requires, that gives the men and women who carry out this program clear guidance and clear congressional support and also achieves Senator McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change Common Article 3.

We need to find a way through that obstacle course, and I think we can.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Stephen Hadley, thanks very much.

HADLEY: Thank you.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The roundtable is next, with George Will, Cokie Roberts and Sam Donaldson.

And later, Jewel.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JEWEL: ... leave the hospital or be forced to leave before you've healed, or had time to heal.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our Voice this week, Jewel. The singer's been making her mark on pop ever since her debut, Pieces of You.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JEWEL (SINGING): You were meant for me, and I was meant for you.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: This week, she heads to Washington to help pass legislation for women facing breast cancer.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

JEWEL: This is something many of us haven't thought about, should the horror happen of getting breast cancer and the trauma of having to deal with that, and then also being asked to leave immediately after a mastectomy when you may not be ready.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JEWEL: Did you know after getting a mastectomy, too often women are forced out of the hospital before they have a chance to recover, sometimes just hours after the surgery. They're called drive-through mastectomies, and the first time I heard that I wanted to scream.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

JEWEL: You know, insurance companies and HMOs have decided it's an outpatient procedure, and women must be out of the hospital within the same day, and many women go home and actually get infections when they could still use some doctor's care. So, this bill basically is asking, you know, Congress and billmakers to try and pass a law that says we can, you know, let a woman and her doctor decide how long they should remain in the hospital.

This certainly isn't a merely feminist issue. This is about the care of our loved ones. And I'm pretty certain that everybody, no matter what health issue it is, you don't want to have to leave the hospital or be forced to leave it before you've healed or had time to heal.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS: More than 12 million people have joined Jewel to petition for this bill. And you can find out more about it by going to voicesplusabcnews.com.

And now, the Sunday Funnies.

(SUNDAY FUNNIES)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: That's our show for today. Thanks for sharing part of your Sunday with us. We'll see you next week.

FOX – NEWS SUNDAY

WALLACE: I'm Chris Wallace. The pope says he's sorry about the violent reaction to his comments about Islam -- next, on Fox News Sunday.

A Republican family feud erupts over how to handle terror detainees.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR LINDSEY GRAHAM (R-SC): We need to take the moral high ground without compromising our national security.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: So Congress has got a decision to make: Do you want the program to go forward or not?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: We'll talk about where the issue goes now with the director of national intelligence, John Negroponte, in his first Sunday interview.

Congressional Republicans rush to pass bills that will help them and hurt Democrats. But will it work in November? We'll find out from House Majority Leader John Boehner.

Plus, a White House offensive pops the president's poll numbers. But is it a blip or a trend? We'll ask our panel: Brit Hume, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol and Nina Easton.

And our power player of the week -- how the mighty have fallen.

All right now on Fox News Sunday.

And good morning again from Fox News in Washington. Here's a quick check of the latest headlines.

Pope Benedict said today he's deeply sorry for the angry reaction in the Arab world to his recent comments about Islam. But in Somalia, a nun was killed in a shooting reportedly connected to the controversy. Earlier this week, the pope quoted from a medieval text which said some teachings of the Prophet Muhammad were evil and inhuman. The pope said today those words do not reflect his personal beliefs.

In Iraq, a deadly suicide truck bomb attack in the northern Kurdish town of Kirkuk. At least 24 people were killed and many more injured. And in Afghanistan, U.S. forces are fighting on two fronts against the Taliban. There's a new offensive along the border with Pakistan, and in the south NATO troops successfully completed heavy attacks against insurgents there.

Well, joining us now for his first Sunday show interview as director of national intelligence is John Negroponte.

And, Director, good to have you here.

NEGROPONTE: Good morning.

WALLACE: The president said this week that he will be forced to end CIA interrogations of terror detainees unless he gets clarification of the Geneva Conventions, because intelligence officers are unwilling to risk being charged with war crimes.

Let me see if I've got this straight. If you were to capture a high-value Al Qaida terrorist who might have information about a threat on this country, is the administration saying that the CIA would not interrogate that person?

NEGROPONTE: What the president is saying is that since the Supreme Court has ruled that the Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention applies, we need to now clarify, in terms of our domestic law, exactly what that means.

And the proposal he has sent to the Congress sets a way forward to clarify that, in terms of our own domestic legislation. And, in fact, the point of reference is the Detainee Treatment Act that was passed last year with the full support of Senator John McCain.

WALLACE: But if I may press my original question, Director Negroponte, what he said -- he challenged Congress. He said, If you don't clarify, this program will end.

Question: Does that mean that if you capture a high-value Al Qaida target, CIA officers will not interrogate him?

NEGROPONTE: That person may be questioned, but using the kinds of aggressive techniques, the tough techniques that the president was referring to the other day may be problematic because of the uncertainty that has been introduced by the current situation.

So all these patriotic, professional agents are looking for is the kind of clarity to ensure that they will not be violating the law when they carry out these interrogations.

WALLACE: But you're saying the full array of interrogation techniques that they've used in the past they might not use now?

NEGROPONTE: At this particular point in time, that issue is up in the air.

WALLACE: Since the Supreme Court said in June that these interrogations are now covered by the Geneva Conventions, have any CIA officers refused to carry out any interrogations?

NEGROPONTE: Well, I think what you're getting me into here is the conduct of the program, Chris.

WALLACE: No, I'm asking a simple question. Have any CIA officers refused to carry out...

NEGROPONTE: I think the way I would answer you in regard to that question is there's been precious little activity of that kind for a number of months now and certainly since the Supreme Court decision.

WALLACE: That has curtailed the kind of questioning that they have done.

NEGROPONTE: There just simply hasn't been that kind of activity.

WALLACE: Because of their concerns about...

NEGROPONTE: Well, the legal uncertainties surrounding the entire program and which we think must be clarified.

WALLACE: The question I have then: If this program is so vital, as the president says and I think all Americans would agree, and if it's impossible to go forward with the full array of tactics to question these people without clarifying the Geneva Conventions, why did the president wait all the way from June 29th, when the Supreme Court ruled on the Hamdan case, until last week to push this?

NEGROPONTE: Well, the court, as you know, ruled that we ought to come to the Congress, both with respect to military commissions and with respect to Common Article 3. And so, it was decided to wait until Congress came back into session.

Meanwhile, during that two-month period, July and August, a lot of time was spent consulting within the administration amongst experts as to how best to accomplish this.

But let me reiterate: What we're seeking here is not to alter Geneva, not to dilute the impact of Common Article 3. It's simply to find the clearest and most concise way to implement it under United States domestic law. That's all we're seeking.

Our CIA interrogators and our CIA agents want to and are committed to behaving in a constitutional, a legal and lawful manner, and in a way that is consistent with our international obligations.

WALLACE: Let me ask you a question some skeptics are raising. The president says time is running out; it is vital that Congress pass this clarifying legislation.

At the current time, you have no CIA prisoners because the president announced they've all been moved to Guantanamo. As far as the tribunals are concerned, none of these people have been brought to trial for five years, so they could wait a little longer.

Is the timing here really about national security, or is it more about having a good issue for the November elections?

NEGROPONTE: I think the timing here is a consequence of the Supreme Court decision and also the fact that we need to have -- even though the number of detainees has gone down to zero, this is a very, very important capability to have.

This has been one of the most valuable, if not the most valuable intelligence, human intelligence program with respect to Al Qaida. It has given us invaluable information that has saved American lives. So it is very, very important that we have this kind of capability.

WALLACE: OK. Let's talk about the capability and how much it is interfered with now. Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions was ratified by the United States in 1955. Since then, we've interrogated Soviet spies during the height of the Cold War, we've interrogated the Vietcong during the height of Vietnam. Why is this now a problem?

NEGROPONTE: Well, because we're talking about a different kind of war, and in this particular case we're talking about illegal enemy combatants, who, I would remind you, until the Supreme Court decision was handed down in June, we did not believe came under the purview of Common Article 3.

But now that that court decision has been made and in an effort to comply with that decision, we are seeking the clarity to define our obligations under Common Article 3 in terms of United States domestic law.

WALLACE: But, Director, the reason that the Supreme Court had to rule -- or, it didn't have to make that decision, but the reason that it ruled that Geneva covered these terror detainees was because of the fact that the president explicitly put a waiver that said Geneva did not cover them in 2002.

The fact is, for the previous 47 years -- and there were other illegal enemy combatants: Soviet spies, Vietcong -- somehow the U.S. was able to interrogate those kinds of prisoners and not run afoul of Geneva for 47 years. Why is this a problem?

NEGROPONTE: Well, the fact of the matter is I think the president, when he made this determination, was -- the Common Article 3 was passed with reference to civil wars, not with respect to this kind of a conflict.

But, in any event, we are where we are at this particular point in time. And I can't think of anything more logical than trying to define our obligations with respect to Common Article 3 under U.S. domestic law. It's a practice that we've carried out many, many times in the past.

And the standard we're actually proposing be applied is what is known as the McCain amendment in the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005. So that we would hope that the senators would be comfortable with applying that standard.

WALLACE: Before you became director of national intelligence, you were a diplomat, and over the years you worked with Colin Powell. This week, Secretary Powell wrote this -- and let's put it on the screen.

The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism. To redefine Common Article 3 would add to those doubts. Furthermore, it would put our own troops at risk.

Director, John McCain (sic) says, for the U.S. to be the first country ever to redefine the Geneva Conventions, will some day put our troops in danger.

NEGROPONTE: Well, look, let me emphasize first that this is not about redefining. It's about clarifying. It's, in fact, about defining our obligations under Common Article 3.

WALLACE: So it's not about redefining, it's about defining?

NEGROPONTE: It's not about changing anything. It is about clarifying, under U.S. domestic law, what our obligations are.

Let me make another point, because I think it bears mentioning. Throughout the conduct of this program, over the years of its existence, the comportment of the CIA agents who have been conducting these interrogations have been entirely within United States law and the Constitution.

These programs have been under a very, very strict supervision carried out by very, very professional officers who are totally committed to complying with United States law. And I wouldn't want there to be any suggestion that this had not been the case.

WALLACE: No, I don't know that there is any suggestion of that, and obviously they were following orders.

One of the reasons -- you keep bringing up the fact that John McCain, this was what was in his amendment that was agreed to last December. One of the problems, apparently, for Senator McCain is he felt that the limits that were put on interrogation last December were ignored by the CIA, that the administration used them for the military but didn't use them for the CIA. In fact, he got rolled on that. And so, now he's trying to insist that it doesn't happen again.

NEGROPONTE: Well, what I would say to that is, first of all, it's not the case. I would respectfully disagree with that.

And, secondly, even in Senator McCain's legislation, in the Detainee Treatment Act, there is a distinction made between interrogation of detainees held by the Department of Defense and detainees held by entities other than Department of Defense. So that distinction is foreseen right in that legislation.

WALLACE: You know, I don't have to tell you this is kind of an ugly dispute involving a lot of very patriotic men: the White House, the president on the one hand; real patriots like John McCain and Colin Powell and John Warner on the other hand.

What's the possibility of a compromise?

NEGROPONTE: I think we're going to have to wait and see.

I think it's very, very important that this program go forth. It's provided invaluable information that has saved lives of Americans, and significant plots against our homeland have been disrupted as a result.

And, surely, there is a way of finding a way forward that would permit this program to continue and, at the same time, do it in a way that is both respectful of our law and Constitution and our international obligations.

WALLACE: But the legislation, as passed by the Senate Armed Services Committee and drafted by Warner and McCain and Graham, is unacceptable?

NEGROPONTE: Well, the director of the CIA tells me that, if it were passed in that form, he does not believe it would be possible for the program to go forward. And I accept his judgment on that.

WALLACE: You have to understand there's obviously some confusion on the part of the American people. On the one hand, you've got John McCain, spent 5 1/2 years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam. You've got John Warner, who spent -- and we have the pictures up here on the screen -- the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who enlisted in the Navy at age 17 to fight World War II. You have Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who was wounded in Vietnam.

Compared to the leaders in this administration, who, in all honesty, did not see combat, don't those fellows up there on the screen, don't they have more credibility when it comes to the rule of law and putting U.S. soldiers in danger -- rather, the rules of war and putting U.S. soldiers in danger?

NEGROPONTE: Well, I think certainly they have a great deal of credibility. And I have the highest respect for the senators and, of course, for my friend and former boss, Colin Powell.

But this is a complicated legal argument, and we're talking about a number of very important equities here. And I think that we should be able to find a way forward, but it's got to be one that permits this program to continue.

WALLACE: Finally, this was an issue that was raised, in fact, by Steve Buyer, a conservative congressman from Indiana who used to be a military lawyer. He points out that the administration is also at odds with the military's top lawyers about the tribunals for these prisoners, what evidence can be used against them in cases.

The president always says that he listens to his commanders in the field. Why, in this case, is he refusing to listen to his legal commanders? The judge advocate general of every branch of the military opposes the president's plan for these tribunals. NEGROPONTE: Well, their views have certainly been taken into account. And, as the legislation was formulated, the judge advocates general were consulted along the way. And on some points there may be differences, but I believe that they also were in agreement with significant parts of the legislation.

WALLACE: Director Negroponte, we're going to have to leave it there. We want to thank you so much for coming in today.

NEGROPONTE: Thank you.

WALLACE: Up next, House Majority Leader John Boehner on the war on terror, the work ahead for Congress, and prospects for Republicans in November. Our exclusive interview, right after this.

WALLACE: Joining us now, the House majority leader, Republican John Boehner.

Congressman, welcome back to Fox News Sunday.

BOEHNER: Good to be with you, Chris.

WALLACE: You created quite a stir this week when you said the following -- and let's put it on the screen.

I listen to my Democratic friends, and I wonder if they're more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people.

Now, President Bush distanced himself from your remarks, saying that leaders don't question the patriotism of people who disagree with them. And a Democratic congressman was much rougher. Let's watch.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE DAVID OBEY (D-WI): I come from the state of Joe McCarthy. I know a first-rate McCarthy when I see one. And I also know a third-rate McCarthy when I see one, and we saw one yesterday.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Congressman, do you take back your remarks?

BOEHNER: Chris, the point I was trying to make is that there's a very big difference between the two parties in terms of how best to protect the American people from terrorists.

I could have articulated this much better, but the fact is, is that, if you look at the USA Patriot Act, we're trying to give the president tools to protect Americans; they fought against us.

You look at the Hamdan decision that came down from the Supreme Court. Democrats were jubilant that the court was taking away the president's ability to do these military tribunals.

And then when the leak came out on the terrorist surveillance program over at NSA, the Democrats were jubilant that this had been exposed and began to press the administration. So the point I'm making is that I think these programs have helped protect the American people, helped uncover terrorist plots before they happened, and they're necessary programs. And we're willing to give the president the tools that he needs to take on the terrorists. And many times, they stand in the way and try to fight us giving the president these tools. And that's the point I was trying to make.

WALLACE: All right, fair enough. But now you've got Republicans, like John McCain and Lindsay Graham and Colin Powell, raising questions about the president's treatment of terror detainees.

Here's what Senator Lindsay Graham said this week about Mr. Bush's proposal about military tribunals.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GRAHAM: Anybody who says that you can have a trial to convict someone on evidence given to the jury and not shared with the accused I think is wrong.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: In the same way you said it about Democrats, are McCain and Graham and Powell also more interested in protecting terrorists than the American people?

BOEHNER: No, there's a big difference here. I think when you see Lindsey Graham and John McCain, they want to help the president get the tools to take on the terrorists. We have differences over what those tools look like. But they weren't out there celebrating when the Supreme Court handed down the Hamdan decision. They believe that there ought to be military tribunals; many Democrats don't.

And that's the point I'm trying to make. We'll work out the differences with Senator McCain and Mr. Graham to give the president the tools he needs to effectively protect the American people.

WALLACE: In a sense, though, have McCain and Graham and Warner and Arlen Specter, by their opposition to elements of the president's plans, have they given Democrats political cover on the national security issue for this November?

BOEHNER: Chris, this is not about political cover. This is about a serious disagreement over the details of the tools that we want to give to the president.

WALLACE: But national security is an issue in this...

BOEHNER: It certainly is, but protecting the American people is above and beyond politics on either side of the aisle. And so, I would never suggest that this gets in the way of an election.

We need to work out a way to give the president the tools that he needs to protect the American people before a terrorist incident happens here again. WALLACE: Let's turn to the legislative agenda you've got for the next few weeks before Congress goes home to campaign. The House this week passed a measure to build a 700-mile-long fence along the Mexico border. But Senate leaders, including Republicans, continue to hold out for a comprehensive legislative package.

Question: Will some form of immigration reform end up on the president's desk before you go home at the end of this month?

BOEHNER: House Republicans believe that if we're going to have real immigration reform, the first step has to be to secure the borders. Anything after that is only going to invite another wave of illegal immigration.

Chairman Sensenbrenner, Chairman Specter and others have continued to work on a broader illegal immigration reform plan, and we're hopeful that they can come to some agreement. But in the meantime, House Republicans are going to continue to insist that we do everything possible to secure our borders.

We've made a lot of progress over the last five years. If you look at the number of incursions of our border over the last six months, those numbers are down significantly. We've got the National Guard down there. We've got a lot of new activity, more fences being built.

And what we want to do is to speed up the process of making sure that we have secure borders while we're working with the Senate to come up with a more comprehensive plan.

WALLACE: But what you're basically saying is you're going to hold to your guns on enforcement first. Meanwhile, you've got Republican senators like Arlen Specter and John McCain saying they want a comprehensive package.

If Republicans, with majorities in both houses, fail to come up with any legislation the president can sign this year on immigration reform, which I think we all agree is a big issue, isn't that a serious problem?

BOEHNER: I believe that we will have a piece of legislation that the president can sign this year. I'm not going to suggest to you whether it be before or after the election, because I don't know. But the fact is, is that House Republicans are going to stick to our guns to insist that we secure the border before we do anything else.

WALLACE: So you're saying that this bill that the president's going to get on his desk is going to be enforcement first?

BOEHNER: I didn't say that. I'm saying there are a lot of things we can do, we have been doing and will do. We've got the Homeland Security appropriations conference report coming up. We believe there are things that we can do in that bill that will be on the president's desk before the election that will help us better secure our border. WALLACE: All right. The House voted this week for disclosure of earmarks, to make public which congressman is behind a narrow interest tax or spending proposal.

But broader ethics reform, which a lot of House Republicans were talking about at the beginning of the year when the Abramoff scandal was a bigger deal than it is now, things like bans on privately funded travel or limits on contacts with lobbyists, that's gone nowhere.

Why is it that the Republican Congress has failed to pass true ethics reform?

BOEHNER: Well, both the House and Senate have passed bills that would deal with ethics reform and lobbying reform. We've been in conversations to try to resolve the differences between the two bodies.

There are big differences between the House and Senate. We've been unable to come to an agreement. That's why I insisted about six weeks ago that the House would take up earmark reform and do it now.

If members are going to ask the American taxpayers to fund some project in their district, they ought to be willing to have it disclosed and have their name attached to it.

And I believe that if you look at the problems that we've seen on both sides of the aisle with members, it goes to the issue of the illicit use of being able to earmark money in spending bills and authorization bills for special projects.

WALLACE: On this same subject, this week Congressman Bob Ney, one of your Republican colleagues in the House, agreed to plead guilty to influence-peddling. Now, he has stepped down as chairman; he's still a member of Congress.

This is a man who is basically admitting that he sold his vote. Should he spend another day in the House?

BOEHNER: Bob Ney clearly admitted to making some big mistakes. And he's going to pay dearly for the mistakes that he's admitted to.

But he's also checked himself in for alcohol abuse. And right now my prayers are with him and his family. It's a sad day for the Congress and a sad day for Bob Ney.

WALLACE: Should he resign from the House?

BOEHNER: That's a decision that he and his family are going to have to make.

WALLACE: I want to come at you from a different side, if I can, here.

BOEHNER: Well, you've come at me from every side so far, so...

WALLACE: That's right, exactly. I want to show you an article that was published this week from a senior editor at the conservative National Review. Take a look.

He wrote, The congressional wing of the Republican Party lost its reformist zeal years ago and has been trying to win elections based on pork and incumbency. An election victory would reward that strategy, leaving the congressmen even less interested in restraining spending, reforming government programs, and revamping the tax code.

I'm sure you've heard this from some conservatives, Congressman. They say a defeat in November would be good for the House Republicans, because you've lost your way and this would give you time to understand and remember what you stand for.

BOEHNER: Nonsense. I can go through program after program that we've reformed. And you're talking with someone here who was involved in exposing the House bank scandal, the House restaurant scandal, the post office scandal. I've been involved in reforming this institution since the day I got here 16 years ago.

This week, this effort on earmark reform is a substantial step forward in providing sunshine and transparency on a very deep, dark practice that's gone on here for many, many years.

But I don't think losing the majority is the way for our colleagues to learn a lesson. I think that if you've watched what I've done over the last seven months, we've pushed our members hard to come back to the principles that put us in the majority.

And it's those principles of reforming government, controlling spending and trying to keep the economy strong that have kept our party the party in power in Congress, and it will be the principles that bring us back in November.

WALLACE: Well, that's -- we have 20 seconds left. The Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to take over the House, regain control of the House. What's going to happen on Election Day?

BOEHNER: Republicans are going to maintain control of both the House and the Senate by comfortable margins.

WALLACE: Comfortable. Win the House by how many?

BOEHNER: Plenty.

WALLACE: Plenty. Double digits?

BOEHNER: We've got a couple of tough seats, but let me tell you what, I've been in all these tough seats. Our members are ready for the battle, they're engaged in the battle, and their numbers look very good.

WALLACE: Congressman Boehner, thank you. Thanks for coming back.

BOEHNER: Thank you.

WALLACE: Up next, our Sunday panel on that political firefight within the Republican Party over treatment of terror detainees. Stay tuned.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: We can debate this issue all we want, but the practical matter is, if our professionals don't have clear standards in the law, the program is not going to go forward.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was President Bush on Friday, vigorously defending his plan for the interrogation of terror detainees. And it's panel time now for Brit Hume, Washington managing editor of Fox News, and Fox News contributors Mara Liasson of National Public Radio, Bill Kristol of The Weekly Standard, and Nina Easton of Fortune magazine.

So we have this fascinating fight among Republicans this week over the proper way to interrogate and to try terror prisoners. And I've got to say that my big surprise is that the White House on the one hand and Republican senators like McCain and Graham and John Warner, loyal Republicans all, have been unable to work something out.

Brit, why not?

HUME: Well, I think -- well, for one thing, I think that the Republican senators are being pretty mulish about it so far. You know, I greatly admire John McCain, but there are times when it's very hard to understand him. This is such a time.

McCain got introduced and passed, in the Detainee Treatment Act that passed last year, a standard for the treatment by Americans of captured detainees. That standard is the one the administration now proposes to enshrine into law as our implementation of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention, which we didn't previously believe applied to terrorists or terror suspects.

Senator McCain is now saying, No, no, that's not good enough. Other countries will say that we're reinterpreting or trying to pull out of Common Article 3.

Well, you heard Director Negroponte on that subject this morning. It's terribly unclear why the language which McCain thought was ideal for governing the treatment of prisoners last year is not good enough this year. It's his own language.

WALLACE: Well, the other thing is -- I'll ask you about this, Mara, and I don't know if it's true or not, but supposedly the McCain people claim that the language that was passed last year didn't alter CIA behavior. So they feel they got fooled last time and...

LIASSON: That's right. And they don't want to -- that's what they think.

HUME: I know, but this would apply to the CIA behavior.

LIASSON: Yes, but they don't feel that that language had the effect that they wanted.

Look, I think these are big, profound disagreements. When the president says, We have to have a clear standard, McCain and Warner and Lindsey Graham say, Our bill provides a clear standard. There's not even agreement on that.

And I think, actually, the key player here is not just John McCain, who of course has tremendous standing -- he was a prisoner of war, he did get tortured -- but is John Warner, who usually is someone who negotiates with the White House. He's not an iconoclastic Republican.

And he really is holding firm here. And, although I understand that today McCain was saying that maybe there could be some kind of compromise with the administration, so far there hasn't been.

And these are profound disagreements about what is necessary. The McCain camp seems to think that even the attempt to interpret Article 3 in any way sends the wrong signal.

WALLACE: Bill, let me ask you about this, because we were all witnesses last December when the president and vice president tried to stand up to John McCain on this terror amendment and got rolled. Whether he deserves it or not, whether he's right or wrong, can anybody beat John McCain when it comes to an issue like the treatment of prisoners?

KRISTOL: Yes, because John McCain was a prisoner of war, who was tortured terribly and unconscionably. These are terrorists. John McCain is not a terrorist. And he is applying the lessons of his own captivity, and he cites all these generals, General Powell and others, that this might lead to the mistreatment of U.S. soldiers. Does anyone think Al Qaida respects these conventions?

Incidentally, I'm very concerned about U.S. soldiers in the field. I was with the parents of a young man serving in Iraq last night. They're for Bush, not for McCain. Do we think if we polled the soldiers in Iraq, they would be with McCain on this, not with Bush? I rather doubt it.

This is an issue of how tough we can be on the very few high- value terrorists whom we choose to have the CIA interrogate. It has nothing to do with the military treatment of other military prisoners.

And on this issue, I think the country is with Bush. I think the enlisted men in the military are with Bush. And Bush is going to win. EASTON: I have to say, I think this is a play that we've seen before. You talk about the Detainee Treatment Act, McCain's treatment act. The White House threatened to veto that. Vice President Cheney tried to get a CIA exemption and failed. But at the end of the day, it passed. The president signed it.

And, look, these legal realities I think are open to debate in part because there's so much that remains classified, but the political reality is clear. I mean, this president is up against a November election. If things are difficult now, imagine what they could be after November. He's up against some very prominent senators.

And for all of the talk about how he was, kind of, had his stand pat on Friday and how he seemed angry and prickly, if you listen between the lines -- not even between the lines -- he was saying, I want to work with Congress.

And I think, at the end of the day -- and McCain suggested this today -- that there will be a compromise, and it will happen before the election.

HUME: Which will set off no end of speculation and discussion about whether the compromise language was a victory for McCain or a victory for President Bush.

I might add this about McCain, that he is seeking the Republican nomination for president of the United States. It's pretty clear. He's supposedly the frontrunner.

Another week of this, he won't be the frontrunner. In fact, I would say if this ends in some kind of a confrontation in which he, quote, wins, I think his chances of becoming the nominee of the Republican Party are basically out the window.

WALLACE: I was going to ask about that, Mara, because McCain has been one of the staunchest supporters of the president when it comes to the war on terror and especially the war in Iraq, when a lot of other Republicans haven't been so outspoken about it. And yet it would seem to me this would hurt him with a lot of conservatives for the 2008 nomination.

LIASSON: You know what? This might hurt him. Whether it would be the thing that would actually deny him the nomination, I don't know if I'm willing to go as far as Brit. I mean, there's a lot of time between now and the 2008 nominating battles. A lot of other things are going to go on. This is one issue.

He has been a very strong supporter of the president on almost everything involving the war on terror and certainly on Iraq. So I think this might cause him some trouble, but I certainly don't think he's doing this with the nomination in mind.

WALLACE: Bill, you're pretty close to John McCain. One, why do you think he's doing this? Obviously, he believes it. But why do you think he seems to have his feet so set in stone on this? And, two, politically, how big a mistake for him?

KRISTOL: He's doing it because he believes it. He says it's a matter of conscience for him.

It's a huge political mistake, and it's going to hurt -- mistake is not the right word. He's doing what he thinks is right. It's not what most Republican voters are going to think is right.

Bush is going to win, incidentally. I don't buy the argument that he's going to -- the House of Representatives is going to pass Bush's language this week. It's going to put an awful lot of pressure on senators to come to a compromise if -- well, I'm not sure that they can't even win on the Senate floor over McCain, incidentally.

It's a tough vote for Democrats. The Democrats are living in a world where they think having John McCain on their side gives them a huge amount of political cover. I don't buy it.

If you're in a real competitive Senate race and a Republican says, I'm with Bush, and I'm with the CIA director, and I'm with the intelligence officers in the field who have to buy litigation insurance now because of the illegal uncertainty, and I think we need to be tough on people like Abu Zubaydah, what's the Democratic Party going to say? Well, gee, I'm with Senator McCain.

Well, fine, but what's your substantive position? If your substantive position is you can't be tough with the Al Qaida terrorists, that is a winning fight for Bush, and McCain being on the opposite side of it is hurting him badly.

WALLACE: Let me bring in one other player before we take a break here, and that is former Secretary of State Powell, who sent a letter this week, Nina, in which he said that the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis for our war on terror.

I have to say -- it may be just me -- but what I got out of that letter is that Secretary Powell has been waiting for some time to distance himself from this president on some of these issues, and that that really got under the president's skin.

EASTON: I think that's right. I think Colin Powell -- he's been a team player while he was in the administration. He's been pretty quiet since he's been out. As we know, particularly with a lot of accounts that are coming out now about the lead-up to the war in Iraq, that he wasn't always on the same page. And I do think he's taking this opportunity to step out, and I bet we'll see more of it.

WALLACE: Brit, what do you make of the Powell-Bush dynamics on this?

HUME: I'm struck by the idea that he has been a team player. Perhaps in some personal way he was. But let's not forget the fact that he presided over the State Department that was in all but open rebellion against the president and his policies.

Let's not forget the fact that Colin Powell, like Richard Armitage, knew who the source of Valerie Plame's so-called leak was and knew it all along. No one told the president who the source of the leak was, even when he was trying to find out. Colin Powell kept silent and let Karl Rove and others in the White House close to the president twist in the wind.

Team player? Maybe.

WALLACE: All right.

We need to take a quick break here, but we'll continue with this discussion about the war on terror and the politics of it right after this.

WALLACE: On this day in 1787, delegates to the Constitutional Convention gathered in Philadelphia's Independence Hall to sign the Constitution. Since then, it's been amended only 27 times.

Stay tuned for more from our panel and our power player of the week.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE NANCY PELOSI (D-CA): We will not be swift- voted on the issue of security, and that is what the Republicans are trying to do.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was House Democratic Leader Pelosi blasting Republicans who she says are trying to use the war on terror for partisan advantage.

And we're back now with Brit, Mara, Bill and Nina.

Mara, Democrats are thoroughly enjoying this family feud amongst the Republicans, among other reasons, because they think that this is going to provide them with political cover on the national security issue. Will it?

LIASSON: Well, I think it does for a moment. The question is, for how long?

I think that we don't know yet whether this fight with the Republicans, the intramural fight, is a speedbump, or is it really the end of the very carefully orchestrated White House plans to make national security the centerpiece of this election and to set up some clean debates with Democrats about who is for giving special rights to terrorists in trials or who is for wiretapping terrorists? That debate has certainly been muddied for now.

But, as you heard John Boehner earlier say, you know, he still believes that Republicans can make the arguments that, when it came to the Patriot Act and other tools that the president needed, that Democrats were on the other side. I suspect that a lot of the Democrats who are in tight races are not going to be voting with the rest of their party on some of these issues when they come to a vote. They're probably going to be voting with the president.

I mean, there is a whole array of Democratic positions and responses to these issues depending on what kind of race they're in.

WALLACE: I know, Bill -- and you referred to it a little bit in the first segment -- that you don't think the Democrats hardly get any cover from this.

KRISTOL: No. And I don't think they've enjoyed this last week, actually. They do not want to have this general election, this congressional election, this set of congressional elections become a referendum on who will help the president protect us against the terrorists.

The Fox News poll is out on that recently, and Republicans -- will the Republican Congress help make the country safer from terror, or a Democratic Congress? It's 34-22; 37 percent say no difference. The Republicans task -- 34-22 for Republicans. And they don't win most of these matchups that they're behind in the general congressional ballot.

The Republican task is to drive those numbers up, to take some of those 37 percent who say it doesn't make a difference and say, You know what? It does make a difference if there's a Republican Congress or a Democratic Congress.

WALLACE: So you're saying that even if they're fighting amongst themselves, the Republicans, the very fact that they're talking about the war on terror and not the war in Iraq and not other issues is good for Republicans?

KRISTOL: Yes, because the actual Republican candidates in the 50 congressional districts and 10 Senate states that are really at risk, or in play, are not going to be fighting among themselves. They're going to be with Bush. And the Democrats are against Bush.

Now, it makes them feel better here in the Capitol to have McCain and Lindsey Graham with them. But in the real races in Missouri and in Minnesota and in Washington state, where there are real races going on, I think it's a winning fight for the Republicans.

HUME: And not only that, Chris. That's not the only fight that's going on, the one over detainee treatment and trial. There's also a battle going on over whether the president should have the legal authority granted him specifically by Congress to conduct this electronic eavesdropping on telephone calls from suspected Al Qaida people into and out of the United States without a warrant.

The public, I think, widely supports that program. The Democrats in the Senate Judiciary Committee this week, for example, made a tremendous stink in opposition to it, accused the president of all kinds of things. You've got Leahy and Senator Feingold and those people out arguing against the president on this.

And that goes into the memory banks, as well, I think. And so, it's not just this one fight. Democrats are against the president on a number of issues here.

WALLACE: So, Nina, I mean, did the Democrats once again, as in 2002 and 2004, walk into the Republican trap?

EASTON: I don't know about -- I think a couple things about what's coming up is that -- I don't know that they walked into the trap. I think it's too early to see how this particular issue will play out. And it's an issue that's in a basket of issues, including immigration, including gas prices.

And the other thing that came out...

WALLACE: Which are going down.

EASTON: Which are going down, which is helpful to the Republicans.

But the other thing that was less noticed this week is the, sort of, operational get-out-the-vote and how much that will have an effect on these tight races. Because what happened this week, Lincoln Chafee was very much helped by a Republican...

WALLACE: This is a Republican incumbent in Rhode Island.

EASTON: In Rhode Island, Senate incumbent, very much helped by a very strong get-out-the-vote effort on the part of the Republicans.

The other thing that happened this week was that Howard Dean announced that he's going to put all of $2.4 million into House races. Well, this is going to be competing against tens of millions of dollars that the national Republicans are going to put into House races, on top of what those House races are spending.

So you just look at, on the ground, the operational advertising, get-out-the-vote, and it was not a good week for the Democrats.

WALLACE: Mara, let's bring in the polls, too, this week, because there was a very interesting Fox News-Opinion Dynamics poll that came out. Let's put it up on the screen.

It showed that the president's approval rating is now 40 percent, and that he's gone from minus-18 a month ago to minus-9.

And on the generic congressional question of, How will you vote in November? , Democrats have dropped from a 16-point lead in August to just 3 points now.

Mara, how do you explain...

LIASSON: And that's registered voters, too.

WALLACE: How do you explain... (CROSSTALK)

LIASSON: ... this time registered last time.

WALLACE: How do you explain the swing to Republicans? And do you think it's a blip or a trend, or can we...

LIASSON: Well, that's clearly the question, whether it's a blip or a trend. There are a lot of polls out this week. Some of them showed a tightening like that. Others showed the generic still being in double digits. All of them showed the president's approval rating coming up. So I think there's a consensus about that; he's doing better. That makes Republicans a little less panicky about November. That certainly helps.

I think that some of the polls were taken during the 9/11 celebrations, commemorations, and some of them were taken before. So I think we're going to have to wait to see if that holds up.

But, look, there's no doubt that the race is tightening. NPR has done polling only in the 50 top House races, and certainly show that there is a little bit of a tightening.

I think the landscape is still tilted against Republicans, but I agree with Nina. I think the advantages that they have, the sophisticated turnout operation, the superior fundraising abilities, I mean, that helps protect incumbents against a kind of anti-Republican tide.

WALLACE: Bill, are you fed up with this Howard Dean and Democratic bashing that's going on here?

(LAUGHTER)

KRISTOL: It's distressing to me, you know...

(LAUGHTER)

... and I think Howard Dean needs someone to stand up for him.

The president's had a good couple of weeks. The underlying environment is difficult. It's hard to govern. The history of one party controlling the presidency and Congress is very bad for that party in an off-year election. People don't remember the good things that have been done, and they take out their grievances on them.

Bush has had a very good two weeks. The question for me is, will he keep it up? He has absolutely got to keep on the pressure. He can't compromise. He's got to force this to a vote in the Senate.

Even if they lose the Senate vote, in my view, he's got to get 45 Republican senators voting for this and 45 Democratic senators voting against it. And if eight or 10 or 12 Republican senator desert, so be it. It still clarifies the difference between the parties.

And they've got to keep the pressure up on the war on terror at home and the war abroad. He's been talking much more about Iraq in the last two weeks, and guess what? His poll numbers are up. If he frames it as a national security election, I think Republicans have a chance to hold on to both houses.

WALLACE: All right. We're going to have to leave it there.

Thank you, panel. That's it for today. See you next week.

Time now for some mail. During last week's power player segment, I made a reference to the 9/11 attack on the Pentagon as, quote, the accident.

Dennis Dollar from Louisiana was one of several viewers who wrote to us, Deliberately crashing an aircraft into a building cannot be characterized as an accident. Hopefully your use of the term was accidental.

Dennis, indeed it was. What happened at the Pentagon was cold- blooded, premeditated murder.

Be sure to let us know your thoughts by e-mailing us at fnsfoxnews.com.

Up next, our power player of the week.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: Given the ways of Washington, it was only a matter of time before one of the people we profiled at the end of this show got in trouble with the law. Well, this week it happened to Congressman Bob Ney, who, two years ago, was one of the big guns on Capitol Hill when we made him our power player of the week.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE ROBERT NEY (R-OH): The internal workings of House I believe are crucial. If the House doesn't work correctly, then all the members of Congress cannot literally serve their constituents.

WALLACE (voice-over): Bob Ney is a six-term congressman from eastern Ohio, who was chairman of the House Administration Committee. If you've never heard of him, you can be sure everyone in Congress knows exactly who he is.

WALLACE (on-camera): I understand that you have a nickname up here.

NEY: The mayor of Capitol Hill.

WALLACE (on-camera): And why do they call you that?

NEY: This is an entire world for a lot of people during the working hours and afterwards, and so it's like our own little government, in a sense. I guess that's why they call me the mayor.
WALLACE (voice-over): It's not such a little government. More than 10,000 people work on the House side, and Ney ran everything from funding for committees to furniture for offices. Wherever Ney went, he says colleagues were always asking for something.

NEY: Every time during a vote, we'll have 20 or 30 members, either side of the aisle, that will come up and they'll ask about things. Some requests are pretty good, and some are pretty bizarre.

WALLACE (voice-over): Such as the idea to seal the House chamber under Plexiglas to protect it from the public.

Security was part of Ney's job. After 9/11, he put up barriers and organized evacuation plans, but also maintained a balance set by the speaker of the House.

NEY: Speaker Hastert has said hundreds of times directly that this House will be as safe and secure as it can be but open to the public. So we've had a balance.

WALLACE (voice-over): We were the first television crew to see part of that balancing act.

NEY: There's a door which, frankly, a lot of people aren't even aware of that takes you up to the dome.

WALLACE (voice-over): Ney took us up 210 feet to the top of the Capitol dome, reopened to the public on a limited basis for the first time since 9/11.

NEY: A lot of members are happy. They wanted it done. And so, the dome's open again.

WALLACE (voice-over): From up here, you can see the small city Ney ran. He acknowledged his power over his colleagues gave him extra clout that he used to help his district back in Ohio.

NEY: It's not beyond me to obviously take care of how the institution runs. And if we do that, I also would expect my constituents will benefit out of any clout I've got. I haven't used it as a bully tool, but just because I'm not a bully with it doesn't mean that I will allow people to walk on me.

WALLACE (voice-over): Which may explain Ney's other nickname: the velvet hammer.

NEY: We're fair, but if we have to lay the hammer down and a rule is a rule, we'll run it that way.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: On Friday, Ney agreed to plead guilty to charges he performed official acts in return for gifts from lobbyists. Prosecutors say they plan to seek a prison term of 27 months for Bob Ney.

Now, this programming note: Next week we'll have the show's first one-on-one interview ever with former President Bill Clinton.

And that's it for today. Have a great week. And we'll see you next Fox News Sunday.

CBS – FACE THE NATION

BOB SCHIEFFER, host:

And we start this morning with Senator Graham, who's in the studio with us here in Washington.

Senator LINDSEY GRAHAM (Republican, South Carolina; Member, Armed Services Committee): Good morning.

SCHIEFFER: In Philadelphia, the Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter. With us from Detroit, Senator Carl Levin, who of course is the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

Senator Graham, I want to talk to you first for a little bit. The president said last week that if the Congress does not write some sort of authority defining basically what the CIA can do in its interrogation, that the CIA will simply have to stop interrogating people. Number one, do you believe that's going to happen? And number two, could you live with that if that's what it came to?

Sen. GRAHAM: Well, the problem we're facing as a nation is sort of like seeing sausage being made, that there are three branches of government. The president assumed the Geneva Convention did not apply to the war on terror, humane treatment did. I agreed with that. The Supreme Court says the Geneva Convention applies. So what I would like to do is give our president the tools that we need to defend ourselves, an effective CIA program where our agents can't be prosecuted for war crimes ill-defined. They can't be sued and lose their houses because they're doing their job. They can defend themselves in court if they're ever accused of doing something by saying, `I was following orders.' The way we do that is very important. The tools that we give them could become clubs to be used against us if we don't watch it.

SCHIEFFER: Well, we'll talk about that. What is wrong, in your view, with what the president wants to do?

Sen. GRAHAM: Well, there's two things after Hamdan decision. The first thing...

SCHIEFFER: What's Hamdan decision?

Sen. GRAHAM: That was the Supreme Court decision that struck down the military trials of enemy terrorists.

SCHIEFFER: All right.

Sen. GRAHAM: We got to deal with getting the trials back on track, and how can we interrogate people within the Geneva Convention. If it's seen that our country is trying to redefine the Geneva Convention to mit the--to meet the needs of the CIA, why can't every other country redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of their secret police? It would be disaster. We can protect the program, the program is people, but we need not, in my opinion, go down the road of being seen as redefining treaty obligations that have been long-standing.

The Geneva Convention, Bob, is just not some concept; it has saved lives. We adhere to it, and we expect others to do it. I know al-Qaeda and Taliban will butcher our people, but this is not the only war we're going to be in, and I can give you plenty of examples of--for downed pilots, people caught in foreign countries, who were saved from torture and death because we insisted the Geneva Convention be applied. So that's my concern. I want to create a CIA program that fits within our domestic laws, where people won't be charged with ill-defined crimes, they won't be frivolously sued, but we cannot and must not and need not change the Geneva Convention in a way that would be perceived as backing out of it. There's a way to get there from here.

SCHIEFFER: Well, explain to me what you mean when you say if an American is captured...

Sen. GRAHAM: Let me give you a good example.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let's say in Iran. What would...

Sen. GRAHAM: Well, this war can take on many different dimensions. Nation-states could become involved, not just rogue people like al-Qaeda and Taliban. There are CIA agents all over the world trying to protect us. What would happen if a CIA agent were captured in Iran trying to suppress their nuclear program, and the Iranian government put this person on trial as a war criminal, and the Iranian prosecutor had a file marked "secret," gave it to their judge and their jury, and said, `Convict this man,' and they never shared the evidence with the American agent? We would go nuts. We would say that secret trial violates the Geneva Convention standards for trying people. What if the Iranians gave him a lawyer, and allowed the lawyer to look at the evidence the jury had, but would not allow the lawyer to talk to the agent about the case against him? What would we do if the Iranians sentenced an American to death based on evidence the American never saw? We would go crazy.

Unfortunately, there's 90 percent agreement on how to do these trials after the Supreme Court ruling, but there's a provision in the military commission model of the president's proposal that would allow the jury to get evidence not seen by the accused, call it classified, and the person go to jail never knowing what the jury convicted him of. I'm all for protecting classified information from being unfairly disclosed, but you cannot have a trial and call it an American trial, have a Geneva Convention trial where the person goes to jail and never saw what the jury saw.

What does confrontation rights mean? It means you can tell your side of the story. Pedophiles and terrorists, everybody we try, deserves to know what they're accused of so they can defend themselves. And if we do it differently now, different than we done in 200 years, it will come back to haunt us, because other people will start doing this. And imagine an American in a foreign land going to the death chamber never seeing the evidence against them. It would be an outrage against our people, and we can't legitimize that.

SCHIEFFER: Senator, what, in your view, from your point of view, is worse, the impression that you think it would send to other countries and other people around the world or the tactical restraints that it would put on our interrogators?

Sen. GRAHAM: Well, I think that it would be a substantive difference. If you do a trial in America where we legitimize the jury seeing something the accused can't defend himself against, it's going to come back to haunt us. The Iranian situation could be very real in the coming future.

The worst thing we could do, in my opinion, is to create tools that are seen as legal shortcuts that erode our standing in the world. We need to change our laws to make them more clear. They are confusing. The president does need a program. The CIA does need a program to get good information. We can do that together.

My goal is simple: I want to give the tools to the president to defend us that the Congress can feel good about, that the courts will accept as legal. We need all three branches of government onboard.

SCHIEFFER: Let me ask you. I'll just ask you, and I'll bring in the other senators in a minute. This would seem to me to be a huge political risk for you. You come from a very conservative state, a state that is probably one of the strongest states for President Bush.

Sen. GRAHAM: Right. Right.

SCHIEFFER: You're taking on the president on this. I'll bet you that you get a primary opponent as a result of this.

Sen. GRAHAM: Well, I'm getting pounded at home by some people, `Why can't you work with the president? The president wants to defend us. He needs--the CIA needs to get good information. These guys are barbarians. Why're you standing in the way?' I'm not standing in the way. I share the same goals. But I'm a military lawyer, 22 years as a member of the Air Force JAG Corps. When I put that uniform on, I took an obligation as a military officer. Now I have an obligation as a senator. I admire the president and I want to help him, but the biggest risk in the world is not Lindsey Graham loses an election. We can have a good country without Lindsey Graham being in the Senate. We cannot have a great nation when we start redefining who we are under the guise of redefining our law.

My biggest fear is that, as we try to solve these complicated legal procedures and problems, that we're seen as taking shortcuts, and we don't redefine the law, we redefine America in a way so we can't win this war. That's what Colin Powell's saying; that's what General Batiste's saying. It's not about my political career. America can do well without me, but we cannot do well if we're seen to abandon our principals and the rule of law.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, let's bring in the other senators.

Senator Specter, you are, of course, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I'm not clear on where you stand on all of this. Are you with Lindsey Graham on this or are you with the president?

Senator ARLEN SPECTER (Republican, Pennsylvania; Chairman, Judiciary Committee): Bob, I agree with Senator Graham, Warner, and McCain, that you cannot have classified information which is not shown to the defendant. I agree with them that you cannot use coerced confessions because they're unfair and unreliable. I disagree with Senator McCain, Graham and Warner and the president, trying to eliminate habeas corpus--that is, judicial review, because we have so many complicated matters. When you come to the Geneva Convention, we have to follow the Geneva Convention.

But what I'm looking for is a way to accommodate both interests, and I think that is--that is possible. We did some additional research yesterday, and find that in the Geneva Convention of 1990 on torture, they incorporated our constitutional standards on due process and coerced confession and cruel and unusual punishment. My people are meeting with Senator McCain's people this afternoon, tomorrow morning with Lindsey Graham's people and John Warner's people and John McCain's people.

I think we have to have the definition so we know where they stand, both for the interrogators--who ought not to be sued, they ought to have the clear standards--and also for the people who are being questioned. And I think we can comply with the Geneva Convention and satisfy the needs to question people to protect America from terrorists.

SCHIEFFER: All right. So you see a way possibly out of this. Well, let's go to Senator Levin, who, of course, is the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

Where are you on all this, and especially after hearing Senator Graham this morning, Senator Levin?

Senator CARL LEVIN (Democrat, Michigan; Ranking Member, Armed Services Committee): Well, I was with Senator Graham, Senator McCain, Senator Warner, of course, on Thursday when the Armed Services Committee rejected the administration's approach. We adopted one which is something which not only upholds our values but protects our troops from the kind of action which will be taken against us if we don't live up to Geneva.

We cannot claim that we are abiding by international treaties such as the protections in Geneva that protect our troops if we decide unilaterally that we're going to modify Geneva. And the problem with this administration is that it's had this unilateral approach to law and to many other things in this world and it's coming back to haunt us. And if we modi--(clears throat)--excuse me, and if we modify Geneva unilaterally, it's going to come back to haunt us, because other countries are going to say, `You people don't live up to obligations. What we saw at Abu Ghraib is what the CIA is all about, and don't complain when we treat your people the way you treat detainees.'

And so, that's what the stakes are here. All the 11 Democrats on the Armed Services Committee, everyone of us were in agreement with Senator Warner, Senator McCain, Senator Graham. And by the way, if anybody knows about Geneva, up close and personal, it's Senator McCain. He's had to live in conditions when he was treated--when he was tortured, which violated Geneva. He understands the importance of complying with Geneva both in terms of protecting our troops, but also in terms of winning a war on terrorism and not handing, as Senator Graham said, our opponents a club that we're a bunch of hypocrites and we violated international law.

SCHIEFFER: Senator, from a practical standpoint, do you think that Democrats and these dissident Republicans, as it were right now, can find a way to resolve this before the Congress adjourns?

Sen. LEVIN: Well, I don't see a way unless the president gives up on his idea that we're going to unilaterally modify Geneva.

I don't know if the Republicans you describe are dissident Republicans. There may be many, many more Republicans who will stand with Senators McCain and Graham and Warner.

But I do believe that we've got to stay with the position that protects American troops, that protects American values, and avoids handing our enemy, the terrorists, the weapon which they want more than anything else, probably, which is that America are hypocrites, that America mistreats prisoners. That plays into their hands. That's the propaganda tool that they want, and we should not hand it to them. And I hope the Senate will stand with the Armed Services Committee and not with the unilateralist administration which we now have.

SCHIEFFER: Senator Graham, the president really drew the line this--last week. There's no question about that. Do you think your side has picked up any support since the president? Or do you think the president brought some people over to his side?

Sen. GRAHAM: Well, this is like watching sausage being made, the old joke is true. These are complicated issues. The president is standing on principle. I share his goals. I want a CIA program that's classified, that has aggressive techniques that will allow us to be safe. I want to make sure that our agents can't be prosecuted for ill-defined crimes, and we need to change Title 18. Senator Specter's done a pretty good job of doing that. We need to make sure they're not sued.

I guess the big difference here is that when you try to redefine the treaty obligations--not the criminal statutes protecting people, but treaty obligations of the nation--you walk down the road that Senator Levin is talking about. I think we can get there from here. I'm willing to compromise. I hope common sense will prevail and we'll get it right. This won't be the last war we're in. And you've got to not just talk the talk, you've got to walk the walk.

SCHIEFFER: One final question to Senator Specter. Senator Specter, do you see a way out here?

Sen. SPECTER: I definitely do. It is our job in the Congress, in the Senate, to solve these problems. And if we sit down and work on it, the research we found yesterday, which hadn't been discussed before, where you have the Geneva Convention of 1990 on torture incorporating just the provisions that Senator McCain is concerned about. And when you have the judge advocate generals in this, I think we, perhaps, ought to have another hearing. We had a letter which was constructed with the Department of Defense last week which has been subject to challenge as to whether the JAG officers were pressured. The Judiciary Committee has the primary responsibility on war crimes and on the Geneva Convention. And I think that we can really find out where those JAG officers stand if we have a question-and-answer session, so that our people are going to be at work this afternoon with Senator McCain's staff and tomorrow morning with Senator Warner and Senator Graham's staff. And our job is to find an answer, and I think we can give the CIA the tools it needs to protect Americans and to question terrorists and to comply with the Geneva Convention. That's our job and we can do it.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, gentlemen, I want to thank all of you. We could continue this on for most of the morning, but we want to give the White House a chance to give us their side of all this, and we'll be back in a minute with that.

BOB SCHIEFFER, host:

And joining us now, the White House national security adviser, Stephen Hadley.

Mr. Hadley, you heard what the senators said, and I would point out that everybody seems to think there's a way to compromise here. But Senator Levin, the Democrat, said not if the president insists on modifying the Geneva Convention. Now what would your--and I know you're going to say he's doesn't want to modify it--but what would be your reaction to that?

Mr. STEPHEN HADLEY (White House National Security Advisor): The most important thing here and the question before the Congress and the American people is, `Do we want a program run by the Central Intelligence Agency that questions these al-Qaeda terrorists like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and Hamzi Rabita? If you do--and we think this is an important program, the information from it has disrupted plots and saved lives, we think it's critical to have this program going forward--if we do, then there's some things we need to do.

We need to have clear legal guidance for the men and women who carry out this program. We have to make clear that it has congressional support. That's the real issue. Do you want the program? If so, we need to give clear guidance to the men and women who front it. And if you don't want the program, then you explain why you're willing to give up a tool which really has gotten more information about al-Qaeda and made more of a contribution in preventing attacks on this country and our troops abroad than almost any other country. That's the--any other program--that's the issue.

SCHIEFFER: Mr. Hadley, let me just ask you this. As I listen to this discussion, this thought occurred to me: Why couldn't you just say `Use the rules that the FBI uses'? We've been getting along fine for a long, long time and they certainly have rules that they follow. Why couldn't you just do that?

Mr. HADLEY: Well, there are rules, of course, that the Department of Defense uses when they question people picked up on the battlefield. But the truth is, they're not trained for the kind of program we're talking about now. The question is, `How do you deal with the most dangerous terrorists most likely to have information that we need to protect the country?' And our experience has been that the military rules don't work. Why? Because they're public, they're printed in an Army field manual, that allows the terrorists to train against them. These folks are very well-trained. And what the experience has been, and the president set this out...

SCHIEFFER: Well, wait, let me just interrupt you here.

Mr. HADLEY: Yes, sir.

SCHIEFFER: Then why is it you want to codify what it is that the CIA can do and can't do?

Mr. HADLEY: We don't want to codify what they do and they can't do. We want to know clearly what the legal standard is. And the problem here, of course, is because of the decision by the Supreme Court that said for the first time in 40 years that what's called Common Article 3 applies to the conflict with al-Qaeda. It imports some new standards that have very ambiguous language in them: outrages against personal dignity, humiliating treatment. Nobody knows what those mean. And the men and women of the intelligence community are saying...

SCHIEFFER: So you're going to publish what that means? Is that what you want to do?

Mr. HADLEY: You're simply going to--we want to do what the Congress did in December of last year and say that means the McCain Amendment, the Detainee Treatment Act, which procluded cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment and defined what those terms meant by reference US law.

SCHIEFFER: But...

Mr. HADLEY: This is about--it's very simple, Bob--a clear standard recognized under US law that the Congress of the United States adopted in December to great applause, sponsored by Senator McCain, adopting that as our standard so that the men and the women in the Central Intelligence Agency can run a program, which is probably the most important tool we have in the war on terror. That's what this is about.

SCHIEFFER: Well, what about the--leaving the impression that what you're saying is--I'm not saying this is what you're going to do, but I'm saying you're--aren't you leaving the impression that these are such mean people we will have to torture them...

Mr. HADLEY: No.

SCHIEFFER: ...to find out what they--what it is that they're about.

Mr. HADLEY: President said very clear this is not about torture. This is about a program that is going to be professionally run by people who have been highly trained. But the president made very clear in his speech a week ago Wednesday, and gave some examples where people like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, using traditional questioning rules gave us nothing. And only when he was put into the CIA program did he give us information that allowed us to disrupt plots and save lives. This is not about torture, it's about a professional program which we need to defend the country, and defend our men and women on the battlefield.

SCHIEFFER: You and Senator Graham, back in the green room before this broadcast, had quite an interesting discussion about all of this. And I'm not going--I understand that that was off the record. Do you think, just as a result of that, or just because it's today and not last Thursday, are you any closer to coming to some agreement with these Republicans who don't agree with you right now, than you were, say, two days ago?

Mr. HADLEY: I was very pleased to hear Senator Graham say very clearly that he believes we need a program of aggressive questioning run by the CIA. That's very important. I think the way ahead here is to all come together behind the proposition that the president has made, that we need this CIA program. That's the first thing. Secondly, we need to give the CIA clear guidance, and third, we need to do it without modifying or amending Common Article 3. I--we need to work towards that outcome.

SCHIEFFER: But do you think you might be able to do that?

Mr. HADLEY: I think people need to sit down and find a way forward with some language that meets those three objectives, yes, sir.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Thank you, Mr. Hadley. Thanks.

We'll be back in a minute.

BOB SCHIEFFER, host:

Well, you just heard it. For the Bush administration, this was the week that wasn't--the week that just wasn't the way it was supposed to be. In a carefully orchestrated campaign built around the fifth anniversary of 9/11, the president had hoped to convince the nation the war on terror was the most serious issue of our time. I happen to believe he's right about that.

But when he turned his prime-time speech on 9/11 into a defense of his decision to go to war in Iraq, Democrats accused him of playing politics. Worse for the president was the rebellion we just talked about that broke out among his supporters--Republicans all--about whether the president's ideas about handling enemy prisoners might be endangering our own troops. Some of the president's most conservative supporters said yes, those ideas would put our troops in danger.

When you consider these critics' credentials--McCain, once a prisoner of war himself; South Carolina's Senator Graham, a member of the Judge Advocate General's Corps in the Air Force Reserves; John Warner, who is the hawkish chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee; and then Colin Powell, of all people, once the president's Secretary of State--you have to wonder how this president got himself on this side of this issue in opposition to this group.

Whatever the answer to that, it left Democrats in an unaccustomed position. They no longer had to quote themselves in their opposition to the president's plan. For now, they can just refer all questions to Republicans. That is a place no president or his party wants to be, heading into an election.

CNN – LATE EDITION

WOLF BLITZER, CNN ANCHOR: This is "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: This enemy has struck us, and they want to strike us again. And we'll give our folks the tools necessary to protect the country. That's our job.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN, R-ARIZONA: We have the moral high ground because we adhere to the Geneva Conventions, and we're not like these other countries.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: The raging debate over how to conduct the war on terror. Is the Bush administration going too far? We'll ask the president's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley. Plus, two key U.S. senators on the armed services committee weigh in, Republican John Cornyn and Democrat Evan Bayh.

Then, are U.S. allies doing enough to help in the fight against terror? We'll ask Pakistan's foreign minister, Khurshid Kasuri.

A grim assessment on the military situation in western Iraq. Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak Al-Rubaie, speaks out about the violent insurgency and his country's next steps.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

TZIPI LIVNI, ISRAELI FOREIGN MINISTER: We want to give the keys to responsible adults.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Uncertainty on the Israeli-Lebanese border. What will it take to keep the peace with Hezbollah? We have an exclusive Sunday interview with the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni.

Plus, billionaire businessman George Soros gave millions last election season to Democrats. Will he do the same again this year?

"Late Edition's" lineup begins right now.

It's 10 a.m. here in Chicago, 11 a.m. back in Washington, 8 a.m. in Los Angeles, 4 p.m. in London and 7 p.m. in Baghdad. Wherever you're watching from around the world, thanks very much for joining us for "Late Edition." We're standing by to speak with two foreign ministers, both Sunday exclusives, and two national security advisers. First, though, let's go to Fredricka Whitfield at the CNN Center in Atlanta for a quick check of what's in the news right now. Hi, Fred.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Fred. The Bush administration is facing strong opposition from Democrats and several Congressional Republicans over how terror suspects should be treated. It's a huge debate in Washington with enormous ramifications in the war on terror. And it comes at a time when the president is preparing to address the United Nations General Assembly on Tuesday.

Just a short while ago, I spoke with Stephen Hadley, President Bush's national security advisor.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Stephen Hadley, thanks very much for joining us. The president has a major fight on his hands right now as far as the treatment of terror detainees are concerned. And it's not just a fight with Democrats but with some serious Republicans, including Senator John McCain, Senator John Warner, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and Lindsay Graham. Is there a compromise? Is the president ready to make concessions in order to work out a deal with these lawmakers?

STEPHEN HADLEY, NATIONAL SECURITY ADVISER: Wolf, let's be clear what's at stake here. What's at stake is a program run by the CIA for questioning some of the world's most dangerous terrorists, Abu Zubaydah, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. This is a program that has gotten information that has saved American lives, disrupted attacks both here at home and on our men and women in the field.

And the issue, as the president put it before, the country, here on Friday, is this very important program going to go forward. If it is, we need to give clear guidance for the men and women who run it. We need to give clear congressional support, and we need to get on with it. So it's a very important issue. And the key question is, are we going to have this terribly important program for our national security or are we not? The president's clear, we need this program, needs to go forward.

BLITZER: Is the president ready to meet these senators halfway?

HADLEY: The way forward on this, I think, has to start with an agreement that we need this very important program. That's what the president has said is so critically important for the country. The second thing that we all need to agree on is that the men and women at the Central Intelligence Agency who run this program deserve clear legal standards and clear congressional support. But then the third thing I think is also clear, we need to find a way so that we can do this without changing or modifying what's called Common Article 3. That is what Senator McCain thinks is so important. And so the challenge before us in the days ahead is to find a way through language that meets all three of those requirements. I think it can be done.

BLITZER: All right, well let's listen to what Senator McCain said the other day because he had some powerful words. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: We understand that Al Qaida will never observe it, but many of us are afraid there will be additional wars in the history of the United States.

(END OF VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: His fear is that if you reinterpret what's called Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, other countries are going to do the same thing, and that could seriously endanger U.S. troops who could be held as POWs in future wars. Does he have a realistic fear?

HADLEY: Let's be clear what's involved here. The men and women in uniform, whether ours or in other nations, are not covered by this Common Article 3. They, if they're captured on the battlefield, have prisoner of war status, and they are subject to a different set of rules and protections.

What we're talking about here under so-called Common Article 3 is the standard of treatment that applies to terrorists who have been captured on the battlefield, people like Al Qaida. These are people who are so-called unlawful combatants. They don't wear uniforms, they hide among civilians and they have used what many would consider a war crime as their principal vehicle for achieving their ends, namely killing innocent civilians. So let's be candid the kinds of people we're talking about here. These are terrorists.

But that said, let me be clear, what we're saying is that the treatment that these individuals are subject to should be subject to the standards that we have adopted in terms of the McCain amendment or the detainee treatment act that was passed last December, and which sets the standard for treatment of detainees, Al Qaida detainees here at home or abroad. All we're saying is that that standard needs to be adopted to clarify the fact that the so-called Common Article 3 has very vague language, things like outrages on personal dignity, humiliating treatment, words that are not self-defining. And our men and women at the CIA are saying simply tell us what the standard is so we can be confident that we can meet the law.

BLITZER: Let me read what Common Article 3 says, and we're going to go through it point by point, and you tell me what has to be redefined. The following acts are and shall remain prohibited at any time. A) Violence to life and person, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture. B) Taking of hostages. C) Outrages of personal dignity, humiliating or degrading treatment. D) Sentences or executions without previous judgment by a regularly constituted court affording all guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples. Which article specifically do you say need, in your words, clarification?

HADLEY: C) Humiliating treatment and outrages upon personal dignity.

BLITZER: Outrages of personal dignity, humiliating and degrading treatment. In other words, are you saying that terror detainees -- that the U.S., the civilian interrogators at the CIA or other agencies should be able to engage in outrages of personal dignity, humiliating or degrading treatment of these suspects?

HADLEY: I'm saying that nobody knows what humiliating treatment is. What does it mean? And the concern is that these people are being asked to take on very tough assignments. They want to be clear as to what is required, and they want it to be interpreted by U.S. law, not by opinions of European courts or other courts.

They want it to be interpreted under U.S. law and they want things clarified now. So if they take action now in reliance on an understanding of what these terms mean, that understanding will not be changed at some future time by some future court. They want clarity now in order to go forward with this program.

BLITZER: The U.S. argument -- and then I'll read to you what former Secretary of State Colin Powell, himself a retired chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said in a letter to Senator McCain: "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism. To redefine Common Article 3 would add to those doubts. Furthermore, it would put our own troops at risk."

Once again, he's suggesting that if the U.S. redefines Common Article three, the C section of that, then other countries will do the same thing.

HADLEY: We're not redefining it, because nobody knows what it means. What we are doing is telling the men and women who will do this program that it means what the Detainee Treatment Act says, that it prohibits cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment.

That is a standard that has been interpreted under U.S. law. Lots of cases have applied it. And we know what it means. It gives clear guidance to the men and women in uniform, and at the CIA, who will do this questioning of detainees.

And let me make a very important point. The Department of Defense, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the Central Intelligence Agency -- those are the agencies whose people are on the front line against the war on terror every day.

They support the clarification we are trying to achieve. Why? Because they also believe they owe their men and women clear, legal standards. And secondly, they know that it is so important for this program to go forward because the information obtained has not only prevented attacks here at home; it has also saved lives on the battlefield.

So these key departments, on behalf of the men and women in uniform and the Central Intelligence Agency, who are on the front lines every day on the war on terror -- they support the clarification that the president is seeking.

Lastly, let me just make the point that the president did. We are not redefining. We are taking what Congress has agreed as the standard and using it to clarify these vague terms.

And if other nations would adopt that standard, that would be progress. It would strengthen Common Article 3. It wouldn't weaken it.

BLITZER: The other point of contention, major point of contention, is that you'd want to be able to use evidence in convicting these terror detainees, evidence based on classified information, secret information that you're not even going to make available to these terror suspects or their lawyers.

The question is this: How can they defend themselves if they have no idea what the evidence against them is?

HADLEY: Wolf, with all due respect that's not quite our position.

The problem is, we do not, obviously, want to pass classified information to terrorists. And so the challenge is to be able to continue to prosecute and bring to justice terrorists, where a lot of the evidence is classified evidence.

It's a tension. And we've resolved it in the following way, that in order for classified evidence to be used without showing it to the defendant, the head of the military tribunal must make a determination that it would not deprive the defendant of a fair trial.

The information must be provided to his attorney, so the attorney would have access to the classified evidence. And where at all possible the accused will have a declassified summary of that information.

So it's a much more narrow exception to reflect the realities of, while a war is going on, having to bring to justice terrorists. Most people would simply hold these terrorists until the end of the war. We think it's important for them to be brought to justice.

But to do that in the context, when we're fighting the war on terror, requires an accommodation that respects the rights of the defendant for a fair trial but also ensures that we don't give classified information to the enemy. We think we've got a good approach...

BLITZER: I want to be precise on this, Mr. Hadley, that the attorneys representing these terror suspects will be given all of that classified information.

HADLEY: Yes, sir.

BLITZER: All right, unfortunately we've got to leave it right there. A lot more to talk about, but we'll have to do it on another occasion. Stephen Hadley is the president's national security adviser.

Thanks very much for joining us.

HADLEY: Nice to be with you.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And this note: President Bush will address the United Nations on Tuesday. On Wednesday, I'll sit down with the president in New York for a special one-on-one interview. That interview will air Wednesday in "The Situation Room" on CNN.

Just ahead, can U.N. peacekeepers in Lebanon prevent another war between Israel and Hezbollah?

We'll ask Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, in an exclusive Sunday interview. That's coming up.

And why can't the U.S. and its allies find Osama bin Laden? Pakistan's foreign minister, standing by live, to weigh in. Stay with us. "Late Edition will continue right after this.

BLITZER: It's been just over one month since the cease-fire between Israel and Hezbollah went into effect, after 34 days of intense fighting. Hundreds of people on both sides were killed.

Now there's a relative quiet along the border. But how long will that last?

Back in Washington, this week, I spoke with the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, for this exclusive Sunday interview.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Foreign Minister, thanks very much for joining us here on "Late Edition."

LIVNI: Thank you.

BLITZER: 1701, the U.N. Security Council resolution -- you're on your way, now, to the United Nations General Assembly. You'll be speaking there.

Is this resolution being fully implemented right now?

LIVNI: Not yet. This is only the beginning. We are now a few weeks after Resolution 1701 was adopted by the Security Council. We can see the signs that this is the beginning of implementation. The Lebanese army deploys to the south part of Lebanon, but not yet fully.

Plus, the international forces, effective forces, some forces come to replace Israel in terms of enforcing the arms embargo from the sea side.

But there are two problematic issue which are not being implemented. One is the release of the Israeli hostages. This is a very sensitive humanitarian issue -- in a way, an open wound for Israeli society.

BLITZER: The two Israeli soldiers.

LIVNI: Yes, the two -- well, this was the attack, the unprovoked attack to begin with, started with the kidnapping of these Israeli soldiers.

And the other issue which is not being implemented right now is the armed -- the enforcement of the arms embargo on the Lebanese- Syrian border.

BLITZER: All right, I want to get to both of those issues. There are still Israeli forces in South Lebanon.

LIVNI: Yes.

BLITZER: How many are there?

LIVNI: Well, there are some troops waiting for the international forces to come with the Lebanese army in order to replace them.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: What do you estimate?

How much longer will it take before all Israeli forces are out of Lebanon?

LIVNI: It's not a matter of time, but a matter of performance. We are waiting for the Lebanese army to come with international forces. We want to give the keys to responsible adults, you know. We are not going to leave the south part of Lebanon to Hezbollah. This is not the reason for the operation, and these are the terms which are part of Resolution 1701.

BLITZER: Speaking of Hezbollah, the leader of Hezbollah, Hassan Nasrallah, said on Al Jazeera on Wednesday, "We are present on the border with Israel. There is no demilitarized zone south of the Litani River. Hezbollah is present south of the Litani and is present in all of south Lebanon." Is that true?

LIVNI: There are some Hezbollah members, Hezbollah militia members in the south part of Lebanon also, but the idea -- and this is part of Resolution 1701 -- was -- is to keep this as a free zone between the Litani River and the Israeli border, and at the end of the war, to dismantle Hezbollah. Now, I think that Nasrallah regretted already the attack on Israel. He said so, to the Lebanese people. He had to explain to the Lebanese people whether it was worthy (ph) or not, and I think that the answer is clear. So I just suggest to Hezbollah, if I may, right now, to work according to Resolution 1701, not for the benefit of Israel but for the benefit of the Lebanese people.

BLITZER: Your predecessor, Sylvan Shalom, foreign minister -- former foreign minister of Israel, was quoted in The Jerusalem Post on September 7th as saying this -- very strong words -- "The diplomatic results were not favorable to Israel. Israel did not achieve any of its declared war objectives: freeing Israel's kidnapped soldiers, disarming Hezbollah and removing all long-range and short mid-range missiles from Lebanon. Israel's exit strategy illustrated poor judgment, and it weakened the State of Israel."

Was the Israeli response to the kidnapping of those two Israeli soldiers, with hindsight, a mistake?

LIVNI: No. Israel had to respond. The idea that we're living in a neighborhood in which somebody like Nasrallah can attack Israel, an unprovoked attack, kidnap soldiers, kill others without any response, this would have been the wrong message. So the idea and the decisions that we took on July 12th was to attack back.

Now, let's compare the situation that Israel was and Lebanon was before the attack, or before the military operation, and let's see what is the situation right now, and let's make this compare. I mean...

BLITZER: Because, as you know, there is a lot of anger within Israel right now over the tactics, the strategy...

LIVNI: I know.

BLITZER: ... how this war unfolded.

LIVNI: I know that. I mean, I am a member of the Israeli government, and there are some demonstrations in Israel and some frustration. But I think that if we -- the Israeli public will stop, in a way, licking the wounds of the last month and see and look at the process, maybe from the outside we can see -- they will see the advantages of the process and -- can I compare because...

BLITZER: Please.

LIVNI: OK. So at the day before the attack, the Lebanese army was not in the south part of Lebanon, which was Hezbollah land. The Lebanese government couldn't reach an understanding or couldn't reach a resolution to deploy the forces to the south part. To transfer arms to Hezbollah was legitimate. There was no arm embargo. It was totally legitimate.

And the Iranians, plus the Syrians transferred weapon on a daily basis. And right now, what we can see is that the Lebanese army deploys, plus international forces. There is an arm embargo, even though it should be enforced fully and completely, and there is, as I said before, the two hostages, which any military operation couldn't bring them back.

BLITZER: So you're saying Israel won this war.

LIVNI: I say that the situation of Israel is better right now. And in terms of process, the military operation plus Resolution 1705 represents the interests of Israel, and brings us to a better situation.

BLITZER: Resolution 1701, you mean.

LIVNI: Yes.

BLITZER: Let me read to you what the former Israel Defense Forces chief of staff, Lieutenant General Moshe Ya'alon said...

LIVNI: I came to Washington in order to...

BLITZER: He was very, very forceful, and I just wanted to get your sense on the final days of the war...

LIVNI: OK.

BLITZER: ... very bitter words from a respected retired Israeli officer. "That was a spin move." He's referring to the offensive of the last few days that the Israelis launched. "It had no substantive security political goal, only a spin goal. It was meant to supply the missing victory picture. You don't do that. You don't send soldiers to carry out a futile mission after a political outcome has already been set. I consider that corrupt. That is why people have to resign. For that, you don't even need a commission of inquiry. Whoever made that decision has to assume responsibility and resign."

In effect, he's calling on Prime Minister Olmert, Defense Minister Amir Peretz and the chief of staff, Dan Halutz, to resign.

LIVNI: This is not true. And I'm not going to argue now somebody who was the former chief of staff, but I would like to say something because this is important, especially to the Israeli public. And maybe some of us have done mistakes during this operation, and we've had some discussions, and we had different ideas even during the operation. I'm talking about the cabinet, the Israeli cabinet.

But for sure, and even though I could agree with some of the decisions and disputed others, but the main goal was the safety of Israel. And the idea, or that we -- some of us were not thinking about the lives of the Israeli soldiers is more than nonsense. This is something which is not acceptable, and this is something which is against our values. And the fact is that the Israeli government -- and it's now going to be part of the future inquiry, but it was all with good faith. Even though maybe we made some mistakes during the operation.

But up next, a quick check of what's in the news right now, including the closing of the non-aligned nations summit in Cuba. Stay with us. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer, reporting today from Chicago. Here's part two of my exclusive Sunday interview with the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: The biggest criticism, internationally, was the destruction of so much of Lebanon's civilian infrastructure -- the roads, the airports, the ports, the environmental disaster along the Mediterranean coast of Lebanon.

Looking back, was that military attack justified?

LIVNI: You know, the first decision that the Israelis had to make was whether to attack Lebanon as such, as a state, or to attack Hezbollah. And Israel answered, because, from the international community, not to undermine the Siniora government.

And the fact is that we tried to attack Hezbollah, these terrorists, which were hiding and still are among the civilian population, which is a more complicated operation.

I mean, we could have ended this operation in days if we would have attacked Lebanon as a state, because it is more weak and it is less complicated.

So this was the decision that we made at the beginning.

Now, this infrastructure served not only civilians but also the terrorists. I mean, if we attack a road, from the north part of Lebanon to the south part of Lebanon, maybe it serves, also, civilians -- I'm sure that it does -- but it also served as a way, as a road to transfer weapons to the south part of Lebanon.

These were the instructions, the idea that the Israeli forces got from the cabinet. The idea was to hit infrastructure with dual use military and civilian.

BLITZER: We're almost out of time, but I want to get through a few quick issues, if you can.

As far as Syria is concerned, is there a possibility that you would be open to meeting with your Syrian counterpart, who is going to be at the United Nations also, and get this dialogue between Israel and Syria going? LIVNI: If Syria wants to be part of the international community, there are some conditions that they have to meet. And the first one is to stop embracing the terrorism.

I mean, it is not only about Lebanon and Hezbollah. They are hosting, in Damascus, also, the leaders, the most extreme leaders of Hamas, Khaled Mashal.

And the fact that the first abducted soldiers are not released yet is, unfortunately, partly is the role, the negative role of Syria, in supporting the extremists of Hamas. So I think...

BLITZER: So opening a dialogue, negotiations...

LIVNI: No, I think it's too early.

BLITZER: ... with Syria, which occurred in the past, is not going to happen?

LIVNI: I think it's too early to do it. There are some conditions that they have to meet.

BLITZER: How much time do you believe the international community has before Iran crosses into an area of no return, in effect has a nuclear bomb?

LIVNI: The crucial moment is not the day of the bomb. The crucial moment is the day in which Iran will master the enrichment, the knowledge of enrichment.

BLITZER: And how long is that?

LIVNI: A few months from now.

BLITZER: What does that mean, a few months?

LIVNI: A few months, I mean...

BLITZER: Six months?

LIVNI: No, I don't know for sure, because it takes time and this something that they have to try, in doing so...

BLITZER: Because other Israelis have said that would be the point of no return.

LIVNI: I don't want to use the words "point of no return," because the Iranians are using it against the international community. They are trying to send a message that it's too late; you can stop your attempts because it's too late.

It's not too late. They have a few more months. And it is crucial because this is in the interests of the international community. The world cannot afford a nuclear Iran. It's not only a threat to Israel. The recent understanding, also, of moderate Arab states is that Iran is a threat to the region. And I believe that this is time for sanctions.

BLITZER: Is this the biggest threat facing Israel?

LIVNI: Well, unfortunately, even though Israel was established about 60 years ago, it is still fighting for its existence.

And we just saw what the threats from Hezbollah, which is the long arm, the proxy of Iran in the region, and we have the Hamas and the terrorist organizations, and the global terrorism, and the Palestinians, and Iran.

So should I choose between the threats? I don't think so.

BLITZER: The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, says he's ready for unconditional peace negotiations with the prime minister of Israel, Ehud Olmert. And the prime minister has responded positively to that.

Is there the possibility that Israeli-Palestinian negotiations are about to resume?

LIVNI: Israel made it clear, a few weeks ago, that we are willing to meet Abu Mazen, Mahmoud Abbas, but there are other open issues that the Palestinian government is to do. And this is to adapt to meet the requirements of the international community.

So Israel is willing to discuss with Mahmoud Abbas, the Israeli- Palestinian open issues, but yet there is a need for the Palestinian government to meet these requirements. And there is an open, very painful open issue, also, on this track, and this is the first abducted soldier, Gilad Shalit. And we hope that he will be released to his family soon.

BLITZER: The soldier who was kidnapped along the border with Gaza.

LIVNI: Yes.

BLITZER: Do you see any movement on the part of the Hamas government toward the conditions that Israel, the United States, the Europeans have set forward, that it should accept Israel's right to exist?

LIVNI: I don't think so, but I believe that the next few weeks are crucial. Because until now, and since the Hamas won the election, the international community was united in demanding the Hamas to meet these requirements.

And now, I think, we can see the first signs of demonstrations in the Palestinian streets against the Hamas government. And if the international community shows determination in the next few weeks, maybe this is the moment in which Abu Mazen can be strengthened and Hamas will have to do something about it.

Our idea -- and this also refers to your question about meetings with Abu Mazen -- is to strengthen Abu Mazen as the moderate side in the Palestinian Authority.

BLITZER: One final question: The last foreign minister of Israel who was a woman was Golda Meir. She went on to become the prime minister of Israel. You have a political future ahead of you. Do you see yourself someday as a potential prime minister of Israel?

LIVNI: I am trying to do my current job the best way I can, I know.

BLITZER: It sounds like you're open to that possibility.

LIVNI: As I said before, I believe in doing the best or acting the best in every position that I was until now, and it worked for me, and I hope that this can work for the state of Israel what I'm doing as a foreign minister.

BLITZER: Foreign Minister, thanks very much.

LIVNI: Thanks.

BLITZER: And coming up next on "Late Edition," another foreign minister. Has the cease-fire between Pakistan made the fight for U.N. troops in Afghanistan more difficult? We'll talk about it with Pakistan's foreign minister, Khurshid Kasuri, when "Late Edition" continues. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer, reporting from Chicago today. Are U.S. allies doing enough in the search for Osama bin Laden and in the overall war on terror? Joining us now from New York, Pakistan's foreign minister, Khurshid Kasuri. Foreign Minister, welcome back to "Late Edition." Thank you very much for joining us.

Let's get right to this very sensitive issue of this deal, this truce that the Pakistani government has forged with pro-Taliban militias in North Waziristan, one of your provinces along the border with Afghanistan. A lot of Americans, as you know, are confused. They're concerned that you're easing up in trying to find Osama bin Laden, Al Qaida members, and the Taliban.

KHURSHID KASURI, PAKISTAN'S FOREIGN MINISTER: Well, Wolf, thank you for providing me the opportunity to be on your show and to respond to some of your questions. Nothing could be further from the truth. Pakistan's commitment to the war against extremism and terrorism is very much in place. President Musharraf is a strong leader. And I think the time has come where President Musharraf's leadership on this issue should not be questioned.

Now, you asked me -- I can understand why people are confused, but, you know, there's a time when not just brawn but brains are also needed. What are we doing? First of all, there's no question of withdrawing the army from those areas. What we are doing is, yes, redeployment is involved. And, you know, sometimes what happens when you have acts of violence, you end up alienating the local populations.

So the jerga, the sort of jerga that is tried in those areas, even in Afghanistan you have the loya jerga. The jerga involves involving all the tribal leaders. So what we've got is involved tribal leaders, and there's been long negotiations which are being conducted through the governor of the frontier province because these tribal agencies on the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan really never been completely tamed, as it were. Even when the British were there...

BLITZER: Well, let me interrupt, Foreign Minister, with respect, and read to you what one terrorism analyst, Peter Bergen, wrote in The Washington Post the other day. Because it's very biting, and it makes a serious allegation about your government: "The key to the resurgent Taliban can be summarized in one word, Pakistan. The Pakistani government has proved unwilling or incapable (or both) of clamping down on the religious militia, even though the headquarters of the Taliban and its key allies are in Pakistan. According to a U.S. military official, not one senior Taliban leader has been arrested or killed in Pakistan since 2001."

What's your reaction to that?

KASURI: Well, many have been arrested. Even last month, I think some were arrested. And furthermore, let me make it abundantly clear, there's very close cooperation between the Inter Services Intelligence of Pakistan and the CIA in the United States. They operate very closely. There's very close intelligence sharing.

It is inconceivable that if somebody like Mullah Omar or Osama bin Laden or Ayman al-Zawahiri, if their whereabouts were known, they would be only known to the Inter Services Intelligence of Pakistan and not to the CIA. And furthermore, when some of our friends in Afghanistan complain, we say to them, please give us actionable intelligence.

Actionable intelligence is always intelligence regarding the time and place. It's not six months after the event. And the CIA would know more than anybody else does. They are there in big force in Afghanistan. And, of course, as I said, we share intelligence with CIA. Pakistan currently shares intelligence with about 50 countries in the world.

And leading among those is United States CIA. It's inconceivable. I know the level of commitment the United States has. And how could it be that President Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, General Abizaid, the sort of people who know about what they're talking, they are very grateful to Pakistan for the sort of cooperation that we are providing under very testing circumstances.

BLITZER: I think it's fair to say, Foreign Minister, that there is really high regard in Washington for the president of Pakistan, Pervez Musharraf. But there isn't such high regard necessarily for everyone else who works for him in the military and the security services.

I'll read to you from another article that appeared in The Washington Post recently. It said this: "A Muslim country where many consider bin Laden a hero, Pakistan has grown increasingly reluctant to help the U.S. search. The army lost its best source of intelligence in 2004, after it began raids inside the tribal areas. Pakistani and U.S. counterterrorism and military officials admit that Pakistan has now all but stopped looking for bin Laden."

I assume you saw that article, and I wonder if that's true.

KASURI: No, it is not true. And partly what I said in response to your first question holds for this one as well. Now, you see, bin Laden is not the sort of person -- I mean, he's not really somebody who can hide very easily.

Now, where is he? It's very tempting to say, as your, as the editorial or the articles suggests, because you have not been able to find him on the Afghan side. But where is he likely to be? He's likely to be largely where he has gotten accustomed to, where people know him.

Now, previously, fingers were pointed at Chitral. Chitral, they don't even speak Pashto, and they are not ethnic Pashtuns.

KASURI: Yes. Chitral is on the border.

BLITZER: But what you're...

KASURI: On the other side, there is Nuristan, which is a wooded area. And in fact, it is thought that Khitmatiar (ph), who is a former colleague during the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan, colleague of Osama bin Laden, he is more likely to be there. But since nobody knows where he is, it is very unfair to indulge in finger-pointing of that nature.

BLITZER: But you're suggesting, therefore, that he's still in Afghanistan. Is that right?

KASURI: It is more likely because he would be among people where he can get support, and also in that part where they normally think he is, that part of Pakistan and Afghanistan, our part is less wooded. Theirs is more wooded. Our people don't speak Pashto in Chitral area, whereas on the other side, in Afghanistan, they do speak Pashto.

BLITZER: All right. Because the Afghans and a lot of U.S. experts think that he's probably someplace in Pakistan. And they also go further and say that Mullah Mohammed Omar, the former leader of the Taliban, is probably in Pakistan, in Quetta, right now. Is there information that you have that Mullah Mohammed Omar is in Pakistan?

KASURI: Well, it's absolutely essential to go into the history of this. You know, last year, there were accusations.

I do not wish to -- because we worked hard at improving our relations with Afghanistan. They are very good.

But I will have to, now, say that some of the leaders in Afghanistan said that he was seen in a mosque in Quetta. I mean, frankly, this is so outlandish.

And people from the American television and Western agencies went to that mosque. The mosque hardly existed. Now, why in hell (ph) would Mullah Omar expose himself in that manner?

And why should he not be among the people who love him or respect him or who have led him? And that is the Kandahar area. Why should he come to Pakistan, and particularly in Quetta, which is also Baluchi and Pashtun?

So therefore, it is unlikely that he would be there. And then, that is an urban area. Why should he go to urban areas when he can more easily hide himself in wooded areas or in caves?

BLITZER: We only have less than a minute left. But I want a quick question and answer, if possible, Mr. Foreign minister, on your summit yesterday between the leaders of Pakistan and India, both nuclear nations.

As you know, some Indians recently suggested that Pakistani groups were responsible for a series of horrible terror attacks inside India.

Give our viewers a sense of what, if anything, emerged from this summit yesterday between the prime minister of India and the president of Pakistan?

KASURI: Well, the meeting was very successful. And I say this not because I'm foreign minister of Pakistan. The prime minister of India, directly told me, himself, when I entered the room, because the president of Pakistan, the prime minister of India first had a one-to- one.

And the prime minister of India himself told me that it was a very good meeting. And the president of Pakistan also said so. Now, they have agreed on a lot of things.

They've said that the stalled peace process will start again, that they will address the issue of Kashmir in a purposeful manner. And Pakistan has, in turn, also agreed to a mechanism on terrorism because, even in the past -- and this is nothing new -- we have made offers to India to investigate acts of terrorism.

And this time, both the leaders have agreed on a mechanism regarding this scourge which is affecting both Pakistan and India.

BLITZER: Khurshid Kasuri is the foreign minister of Pakistan.

Mr. Minister, always good to have you here on "Late Edition."

KASURI: It's always a pleasure to be with you, Wolf. Thank you very much. BLITZER: Thank you.

And coming up, another deadly day of attacks in Iraq, especially in Kirkuk.

What will it take to secure Iraq? We'll ask two top U.S. senators, members of the Armed Services Committee.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER (voice over): Roh Moo-hyun: What's his story?

The South Korean leader met with President Bush at the White House this week to discuss North Korea's nuclear program. Both countries want to return to the negotiating table, but North Korean leader Kim Jong Il has refused a new round of talks since November.

Despite humble beginnings in a small farming village, Roh had a successful career as a human rights lawyer before becoming a prominent politician.

He was elected president in 2002 with a mandate to clean up corruption in Korean politics. But his own administration has been plagued by scandal for violating election laws.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And there's much more ahead on "Late Edition." How far is too far in the name of fighting terror?

Senators John Cornyn and Evan Bayh, standing by to weigh in, live, on the big debate this week: How should terror suspects be treated? we'll be right back.

BLITZER: Let's take a close look at what's on the covers of this week's major news magazines here in the United States. Time Magazine looks at what war with Iran would look like and how to avoid it.

Newsweek features "The Next Generation: 20 Powerful Women on How to Take Charge."

And U.S. News and World Report focuses in on "Capitol Crime: How a New Washington Scandal Could Bring Congress to its Knees."

And this is "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: It is vital that our folks on the front line have the tools necessary to protect the American people.

(END VIDEO CLIP) (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOSEPH BIDEN, D-DELAWARE: You don't make international laws to accommodate that extraordinary circumstance.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: A growing rift in the U.S. over how terror suspects should be treated. Hanging in the balance, the Geneva Convention. Is it time for a change? Two key U.S. senators on the U.S. Armed Services Committee debate, Republican John Cornyn and Democrat Evan Bayh.

A blood-drenched week in Iraq and a surge in deadly attacks. We'll get a status report on Iraq from that country's national security adviser, Mowaffak Al-Rubaie.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE SOROS, BUSINESSMAN AND PHILANTHROPIST: The war on terror is a false and misleading metaphor. We have to fight terrorism, but war is the wrong way to do it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: And a controversial book from billionaire businessman and philanthropist George Soros. He says the war on terror cannot be won.

Welcome back. We'll get to my interview with senators John Cornyn and Evan Bayh in just a moment. First, though, let's check in with CNN's Fredricka Whitfield for a quick check of what's in the news right now. Hi, Fred.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Fred. A huge issue in Washington this week has been how the United States detains and questions suspects in the war on terror. It's turning into a tug of war between President Bush and key members of the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee, Democrats and Republicans.

Joining us now, two key members of that panel. From Austin, Texas, Senator John Cornyn. He's a Republican from the state of Texas. And in Washington, D.C., Senator Evan Bayh. He's a Democrat from the state of Indiana. Senators, thanks very much to both of you for joining us.

And Senator Bayh, I'll start with you. We heard in the first hour of "Late Edition" the president's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, say that one article of this U.N. -- excuse me, of this Geneva Convention, what's called Common Article 3, needs clarification. And it needs it right now if civilian personnel are going to be able to interrogate effectively suspected terror suspects.

The element of "outrages of personal dignity, humiliating or degrading treatment," that needs clarification and definition. Is he right?

SEN. EVAN BAYH (D), INDIANA: He is right, Wolf, but we can accomplish that without gutting the Geneva Convention. And let me be clear about a couple of things first. Our principal concern is not about the detainees. Our concern is about U.S. military personnel and intelligence operatives who themselves might be subjected to torture and inhumane treatment someday.

We don't want to do anything to make that more likely, and don't want to do anything that undermines the moral standing of our country across the world in this fight against terror, because that is a great asset and strength of ours. We are morally superior to those we're fighting, and we don't want to confuse that issue. So, we can get the intelligence we need, Wolf.

BLITZER: But why are you suggesting, Senator...

BAYH: We can be true to the Geneva Convention, but we can do it by amending the War Crimes Act to give clarity to our agents so they can conduct these intelligence interrogations, get the information we need to protect our country but protect our own people and be true to our own values in the process.

BLITZER: All right. Well, let me let Senator Cornyn, himself a former judge, respond. What about that proposal from Senator Bayh?

SEN. JOHN CORNYN (R), TEXAS: Well, I'm glad to hear Senator Bayh talk about the importance of this program. We've gotten information from high-value detainees which have literally detected, disrupted and deterred terrorist attacks against our troops abroad and Americans here at home. And the issue really is, do we provide clear rules for our civilian interrogators so they know what is permitted and what is not permitted?

We thought we'd actually done that last year, and Senator McCain championed the passage of the Detainee Treatment Act, which by its name you can tell defined what American law said with regard to how detainees shut be treated. And then the United States Supreme Court came in in June and said Common Article 3 with this hopelessly ambiguous standard of outrages against personal dignity applied.

All we want to do is tie that standard to the Detainee Treatment Act, and I think we're done.

BLITZER: What he's suggesting -- Senator Bayh, I don't want to put words in your mouth, but explain what you meant, and then I'll let Senator Cornyn react, when you say what the president wants to do is effectively gut the Geneva Conventions.

BAYH: Well, that's what John McCain, Colin Powell, Lindsey Graham, John Warner, who is the chairman, as you know, Wolf, of the Armed Services Committee, former head of the Navy, they're all concerned that if we basically back away from the explicit requirements of the Geneva Convention, that will create confusion around the world about what standard that we adhered to. Then there's a separate question that John is speaking to, and I do think there needs to be some clarification here to give our operatives -- we don't want them sued. We don't want them prosecuted and brought into court and that kind of thing, so we do need to lay out very explicitly what they can and cannot do.

But we need to do that while still sending a clear message to the rest of the world that we adhere to the Geneva Convention because that is the accepted international norm. And if we back away from that, as I said, we endanger our own people, and we undermine our own moral standing, which is a great sense of strength for us.

BLITZER: All right. Senator Cornyn, I want you to listen to what your Republican colleague John McCain said earlier in the week on this very sensitive point.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: Suppose that we amend the Geneva Conventions to our interpretation of it. Then another country that is not quite as democratic as ours decides they will amend their version. A Special Forces person is captured by them, and their attorney general tells their secret police, OK, here's our interpretation of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, have at him. That's what people are worried about.

BLITZER: All right, Senator Cornyn, what do you say?

CORNYN: Well, first of all, the United States complies with the Geneva Conventions in their entirety, and we expect that chain of command will be honored and that the laws of war will be observed. But actually what Senator McCain is suggesting is something that I think the president is suggesting, and that is not to abrogate, not to amend the Geneva Convention Common Article 3, but rather to give it definition.

This is something that Congress does every time an international convention like the one banning torture that was ratified in 1994, that the Congress does as a matter of definition to make clear that the U.S. as a matter of sovereignty determines what's lawful and unlawful with regard to its activities, while adhering to these international conventions like Common Article 3.

BLITZER: Well, what do you think, Senator Cornyn, of Senator Bayh's proposal? He's got a different idea, a different method for clarifying that article as opposed to what the president would like. What do you think of his proposal to get around this impasse?

CORNYN: Well, I welcome it. I'm glad to hear what he said, and I think we need to get more people into this discussion so we can explore all the range of ideas. But I do think it's going to take more than amending the War Crimes Act because when the Department of Justice passes judgment on whether an interrogation technique is lawful or unlawful, they're going to look at the whole range of laws, not just the War Crimes Act, to determine that. That's why we need the clarity that would be provided by the Detainee Treatment Act.

BLITZER: Senator Bayh, the president had a bottom line, a short bottom line. He said that will force him to conclude whether any compromise with you and the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives is possible. Here's how he put it the other day.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: I asked General Casey today if you got what you need. He said, yeah, I got what I need.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: I apologize. That's not the right clip from the president. I'll read to you what the president basically said. He said, "The point is that the program is not going to go forward if our professionals do not have clarity in the law." That's his bottom line.

BAYH: By the way, Wolf, I suspect General Casey doesn't have what he needs either, but to get to your question, look, we need to keep this program. We do get valuable information from it, but we can do it in a way that uses methods that don't approach torture. And that's important for the reasons John and I and all of us appreciate: protecting our people, maintaining our moral standing.

And we need to do that while providing the clarity our people need. So, look, the president's threat, I think, frankly, is hollow because the program should stay in place. It can stay in place. And we can do it while protecting our country and our values and our people at the same time.

So let's look at the War Crimes Act. Let's look at the Detainee Act that John mentioned. Let's find that common ground. But look, the president shouldn't try and push something through that even members of his own party with deep national security experience like John McCain and Colin Powell think would undermine our standing, our security in the world.

BLITZER: General Powell, Senator Cornyn, wrote to Senator McCain this past week, and there was one very strong line in there. He said, "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." A powerful assertion by a retired four-star general.

CORNYN: Well, General Powell is a great patriot. I actually think, when you read the first paragraph of that letter, he said he didn't want to water down the Detainee Treatment Act which we passed last year.

I actually think there's more basis for common ground and agreement between General Powell, the administration and Senator McCain than first meets the eye.

But clearly, we treat our detainees well. The fact is we would be happy if Al Qaida would treat any prisoners of war they take of ours -- but he don't take prisoners of war; they behead them. And they don't respect any international conventions, including the Geneva Conventions.

BLITZER: We're going to take a quick break, but a quick question, Senator Cornyn and a quick question to Senator Bayh: Can you reach a compromise deal between the president and the U.S. Congress in the next two weeks or so before the Congress goes into recess?

CORNYN: I certainly hope so. It's very important that we begin to try these detainees who have been kept for a long time and interrogated because they need to be held accountable for the war crimes they've committed.

BLITZER: Senator Bayh?

BAYH: I think we can, Wolf, and I hope we can. But, look, it's better that we get it right than we get it quick. There are no detainees in the CIA program anymore. They've all been shifted over to the military side. These people aren't going anywhere. They'll ultimately be tried.

We need to make sure we do it the right way.

BLITZER: Senators, stand by. We're going to continue this conversation. I'll also be asking them about the situation in Iraq and, potentially, the need for more U.S. troops to be dispatched there.

Also ahead: a capital in chaos. Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie in Baghdad on why we saw another deadly week in the battle for the Iraqi capital. That conversation coming up.

And later, my conversation about money, politics and opposition to the war in Iraq with the billionaire George Soros. I'll ask him why he continues to make comparisons between President Bush's policies and Nazis.

Stay with us.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer, reporting today from Chicago.

We're continuing our conversation, now, with Senators John Cornyn and Evan Bayh, both members of the Armed Services Committee.

Senator Bayh, I want to button up the whole issue of terror detainees. In the first hour, we spoke with President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley.

He said, now, what the administration is ready to do, as far as making classified information, classified evidence available to terror detainees, is to make that classified information available to their lawyers and to try to clean it up to make a declassified version available to the actual terror detainees themselves. What do you make of this proposal?

BAYH: Well, I think that's a reasonable proposal to start from, Wolf.

Look, you can't try people and have any kind of process that is consistent with any notion of judgment without at least letting people know, who are accused of a crime, what the evidence is that supports the accusation.

But at the same time, we can't undermine our country's security by revealing national security information to accused terrorists. So an unclassified summary of the evidence, redacted documents that take out anything related to sources and methods -- that may give us some common ground we can work to get a reasonable compromise that, again, is true to our values but also protects this country.

BLITZER: Are you comfortable with this proposed compromise, Senator Cornyn?

CORNYN: Well, I think, if it were up to Senator Bayh and myself, we could work this out.

Unfortunately, other people are going to get to weigh in. But this is a very important issue because we know that, in past prosecutions, that classified evidence has made its way into Al Qaida's hands after the fact.

And we simply have to protect our sources and methods, as Senator Bayh says. And, obviously most of these detainees are not going to be particularly apologetic about their role in trying to take down the West and kill Americans and kill civilians. That's what they do. That's their ideology that is so problematic.

BLITZER: But Senator Cornyn, if a man, or a woman, for that matter, is potentially going to be sentenced to death based on evidence -- maybe that evidence comes from hearsay, comes from torture victims who have been tortured or whatever -- shouldn't that person have a right to see the evidence before being judged?

CORNYN: Well, let me be clear, Wolf. We don't torture our detainees. What we do is we can use aggressive interrogation techniques which might be different from our use criminal law standards...

BLITZER: Let me just point out, though, Senator Cornyn, other countries provide information to the United States that do use torture.

CORNYN: Well, it's certainly our policy not to do that. But the point is that I do believe these detainees can be treated -- excuse me -- tried using evidence that can be provided, if it's classified, to their lawyers and unclassified summaries provided to the detainees. I believe they can get a fair trial. If not, they can appeal that case and then have the judge determine based upon the ruling of the trial judge, the tribunal and whether or not fair standards were applied.
BLITZER: And Senator Bayh, are you comfortable that the individual could be convicted of a crime based on evidence that that person doesn't know what it really is?

BAYH: Well, of course, you have to get to the question -- the word the lawyers use is probative value. You know, how reliable is the information? What does it mean?

And you've got to know some things about it, Wolf. But the question is, what can you learn about it without divulging national security secrets? You can't do that.

And so it's just going to have to be handled on a case-by-case basis. And perhaps -- you know, if you just can't reveal some things, then maybe you don't seek the death penalty; you seek life in prison.

It's just something you've got to handle on a case-by-case basis. But we've got to protect the nation's security. We've got to protect our values and not having people being tried when we don't tell them what the facts are.

BLITZER: Senator Cornyn, it's only about -- you want to add one point, Senator Cornyn?

CORNYN: Well, I agree with Senator Bayh. At this point, we're doing all this, prospectively, on the front end. I think what we're going to have to do is pass some reasonable rules; let trials go forward; and then have them reviewed on a case-by-case basis by the appellate courts, including the Supreme Court. And I think that would be the appropriate way to go.

BLITZER: A recent Gallup poll, Senator Cornyn, shows that the Republicans are in trouble going into the midterm elections: 53 percent of registered voters say they prefer Democrats; 41 percent say they prefer Republicans.

How worried are you, Senator Cornyn, right now, that the Democrats could become the majority party in the House and maybe even in the Senate?

CORNYN: Well, I do believe the Republicans will retain the majority in the United States Senate. I appreciate those polls, but I think most people focus on the candidates, the choices they've been given.

And they'll make their individualized judgment based on how well the incumbent, if there is an incumbent, has performed, or the choice given to them based on these key issues, some of which we've been talking about today. So I think Republicans will do well.

BLITZER: The Republicans were encouraged somewhat, Senator Bayh, by this ABC News poll which asks which party is better able to handle Iraq. Forty-four percent said Republicans; 43 percent said Democrats. And on the question, which party would better handle terrorism, 48 percent said Republicans, 41 percent said Democrats. You see this election, the midterm election, from the Democratic perspective perhaps slipping away?

BAYH: No, I don't, Wolf. I think most people know that we can do better. We can do a better job of securing our nation's physical security. I mean, look, Iraq is not going as well as it should.

And when you have the vice president, who I take it spoke for the administration a week ago today, coming out and saying it they had to do it all over again they'd do the same thing, the same way, that's not only alarming, that's dangerous. We can do better than that.

Afghanistan is not heading in the right direction. That's the place from which we were attacked on 9/11. Iran, which is everything we thought Iraq was but wasn't, is not going well under this administration. Homeland security, we need to do more in ports and rail facilities. So the list goes on and on, Wolf.

We have to offer a program that is both tough and smart to show that we can do a better job of securing this country, and I think we can. I think most Americans will realize that and vote for a change.

BLITZER: We're going to be out of time in a second, Senator Bayh, but when are you going to announce your run for the presidency?

BAYH: Well, it's kind of you to ask, Wolf, but I hope I don't disappoint you by saying not today. Maybe a scoop on another Sunday.

BLITZER: All right, we'll be waiting. Senator Bayh, always good to have you on the program. Senator Cornyn, if you want to run for the presidency, we'd be anxious to hear that, as well. Thanks to both of you for joining us.

And this note to our viewers: President Bush addresses the United Nations on Tuesday. On Wednesday, I'll sit down with him in New York City for a special one-on-one interview. That interview will air Wednesday in "The Situation Room" on CNN.

And coming up next, is Iraq on the brink of civil war, and is Iran undermining or helping Iraq? We'll ask Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak Al-Rubaie. He's in Baghdad.

But up next, we'll get a quick check of what's in the news right now, including peaceful gatherings around the globe to try to bring attention to the crisis in Darfur. Stay with "Late Edition."

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer reporting today from Chicago. Still to come, my interview with George Soros, the billionaire philanthropist. Earlier today, though, I spoke with Iraq's national security adviser, Dr. Mowaffak Al Rubaie.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE) BLITZER: Mowaffak al-Rubaie, thanks very much for joining us once again on "Late Edition."

There has been this very, very disturbing trend developing in and around Baghdad, elsewhere in Iraq: A lot of bodies. People not just killed but horribly mutilated, tortured, killed execution-style. Explain to our viewers what's going on in Iraq.

MOWAFFAK AL-RUBAIE, IRAQI NATIONAL SECURITY ADVISER: Well, Wolf, let me put this in a wider perspective. There are a lot of good news in Iraq, which unfortunately has not been shown in the media. There is going to be a handover of the command of the fourth Iraqi division very, very soon. And also, there is going to be assuming of responsibility of security in Dhi Qar province down south.

The other thing is the Iraqi security forces, combined the army and the police, have reached to a level of 300,000 now. And the maximum number we were planning to go to is the 325,000 by the end of the year.

So we're nearly there. And a lot of them, they are fully trained, they are prepared very well, and there are good arms they're carrying.

The good news, as well, in Baghdad's security plan, which a lot of people have overlooked this, is that, although we have started this Baghdad security plan a few weeks ago, several weeks ago, there was no fierce fighting. And a lot of the neighborhood we went in, very peacefully.

We injected cash in the local economy; we created jobs in there; we've done cleaning of the street; we've done a lot of beautification of these neighborhoods and provided extra serviced like extra hours of electrical power and clean water and so on and so forth. So there are a lot of good news coming from the...

(CROSSTALK)

AL-RUBAIE: There's an international (inaudible).

BLITZER: Let me interrupt for a moment, because I want to get to all those issues, especially the troop levels. But we see on television, we read about these scores of bodies showing up at the morgue in Baghdad, almost on a daily basis, mutilated, tortured, killed execution style.

Explain what's going on. Why are all these people being slaughtered?

AL-RUBAIE: There are three sources of these horrible crimes. Number one is the organized criminals basically trying to frighten people, the local people in Baghdad. And number two is the rogue elements of some of the militias taking on, basically, with a sectarian motivation, taking on the other sects, and the Shia killing Sunnis and Sunnis killing Shia. But these are rogue elements of these militias around Baghdad. And Al Qaida is using this in their tactics as well. Basically, they are trying to create a maximum psychological impact by showing these horrible crimes, decapitation, killing, execution-style killing, mysterious killing and mutilation. This is Al Qaida, using this tactic to drive to demoralize our Iraqi security forces and also to frighten the local people in Baghdad.

BLITZER: Dr. al-Rubaie, are you seriously thinking of building a trench around the entire Iraqi capital, around Baghdad, and limiting access to the Iraqi capital, at what, 28 checkpoints?

AL-RUBAIE: To be quite honest with you, this, what I call the physical barrier around Baghdad, is already there. It's the soil and it's the river; it's some trenches as well. It was already built during the old regime, around Baghdad.

And basically, we are making use of that to try to impede and impair the movement, basically, making the movement of terrorists coming from outside Baghdad to inside Baghdad, make it more difficult. That's what we are doing.

It's a physical barrier of water and soil is there -- and trenches. It's already there. We're basically putting a number of entry points to Baghdad and these checkpoints. And we're making more careful search during -- going in and out of Baghdad. And there are a certain number of entries in Baghdad that people are allowed to go into.

BLITZER: You went to Iran this past week with the prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki. You met with the president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

As you know, the U.S. ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, has accused Iran of interfering and fomenting, if you will, the insurgency, the sectarian violence inside Iraq.

Did you get any assurances from the Iranian leadership that they would stop providing weapons, improvised explosive devices, support for the insurgents?

AL-RUBAIE: We made it absolutely crystal clear to the Iranians that we do not want any intervention in our internal affairs. And we promised them that we will respect their sovereignty and we expect them to respect our sovereignty and do not interfere in the internal affairs of Iraq.

And we also have good promises from the president, from the other officials, ministers, security ministers, that they will help in economy and services and in the security.

And I believe we've got very good reassurances from the Iranians that they will not interfere in the internal affairs of Iraq. And this is going to be a mutual respect to the sovereignty and independency of both countries to each other.

We wanted to make a good relationship with Iran on the basis of mutual and bilateral respect to each other.

BLITZER: Dr. al-Rubaie, I want to get back to what you said at the beginning, because we're almost out of time, that the Iraqi army, almost 300,000. What does that mean in terms of the U.S. presence, military presence in Iraq?

When will U.S. troops be able to start leaving?

Because as you know, in recent weeks, they have increased the level of U.S. military forces in Iraq.

AL-RUBAIE: It's a very simple formula. The more we get in number and preparedness and in the readiness of the Iraqi security forces, the less we need the American forces and American troops in Iraq.

And so we have a very clear idea, timetable if you like, for the Iraqi security forces' development, preparedness and readiness to assume battle state and to assume security responsibility in different provinces.

A delegation, going from tomorrow, from the National Security Council in Baghdad, going to Kurdistan, trying to negotiate a time for foreign troops to leave the Kurdistan, three provinces there -- we have time to leave Kurdistan, and for the Kurdish or Kurdistan regional forces to assume responsibility in the three provinces.

So we are gradually going about assuming more responsibilities in different provinces, up north, down south, and even in the middle, with growing number and readiness of our security forces.

BLITZER: Dr. al-Rubaie, as usual, thanks very much for joining us.

AL-RUBAIE: Thank you, Wolf, for having me.

BLITZER: And coming up next on "Late Edition," from Iraq to the war on terror, why the outspoken billionaire and philanthropist, the author George Soros thinks the terrorism fight has no end and no victory. Stay with "Late Edition."

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Ann Richards, what's her story? The former Texas governor passed away Wednesday at her home in Austin, Texas, following a six-month battle with esophageal cancer. Richards achieved national attention in 1988 as the keynote speaker in the Democratic National Convention, saying that Republican presidential nominee George H.W. Bush was born with a silver foot in his mouth.

In 1991, she became just the second female Texas governor, a post she held until 1995. While in office she pushed for civil rights for women and minorities, calling for a new Texas. Richards is survived by her four children and eight grandchildren. Her funeral will be held tomorrow in Austin.

BLITZER: And coming up next, why investor and author George Soros finds similarities between the Bush administration and the Nazis, what he calls the politics of fear. You're watching "Late Edition."

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer reporting from Chicago. Earlier this week, I spoke to investor and billionaire George Soros about terrorism, politics and the future.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: George Soros, thanks very much for coming in.

SOROS: A pleasure.

BLITZER: Let's talk about your new book, "The Age of Fallibility: Consequences of the War on Terror." I want to read to you a quote that sort of startled me, I'm sure a lot of your readers, once they read it: "The Bush administration and the Nazi and Communist regimes all engaged in the politics of fear. Indeed, the Bush administration has been able to improve on the technique used by the Nazi and Communist propaganda machines by drawing on the innovations of the advertising and marketing industries."

Now, when a lot of people hear comparisons between President Bush and Nazis and Communists, they're going to say, George Soros, you've gone over the top.

SOROS: You actually picked up the most incendiary part of the book. And I am very careful to draw a clear distinction between the Nazi regime and our open society, because we are a democracy, but there are some similarities in the propaganda method, which I pointed out.

BLITZER: But, George Soros, you lived through the Holocaust. You know firsthand what the Nazis were doing. You lived through the Cold War, the worst of the Stalinist era. To make comparisons between the president of the United States and these regimes, a lot of people are going to say, what are you thinking?

SOROS: Well, that is unfortunate because I think there are some serious arguments about our open society being endangered by the policies followed by the Bush administration. The war on terror, which does not have an end, changes -- it leads to an undue extension of executive powers. It has stifled debate. Criticizing the president is considered unpatriotic, and as a result, we have been following policies which endanger our position in the world. BLITZER: A lot of people will agree with you on that but where they will starkly disagree is to then bring in the whole Nazi and Communist comparison.

SOROS: Actually, it's a valid point, and maybe I did go over the line, but I think that on the whole, my assessment is a balanced one. And the fact that, frankly, when President Bush said, you are either with us or you are with the terrorists, that's when I was reminded, but I should have probably kept it to myself.

BLITZER: Because I'll read to you what you wrote in The Washington Post in 2003. You said, "When I hear Bush say, 'You're either with us or against us,' it reminds me of the Germans. My experiences under Nazi and Soviet rule have sensitized me. Bush feels that on September 11th he was anointed by God. He is leading the U.S. and the world toward a vicious circle of escalating violence."

That's what you said then. Now I guess you acknowledge you went over the top.

SOROS: Well, unfortunately, if you look at it five years later, we are, in fact, caught in a vicious circle of escalating violence. If you now look at it, we have been misled, and we are still caught in this metaphor of -- false metaphor of the war on terror. And that is a point that I really want to emphasize.

BLITZER: Because one of the themes of the book, "The Age of Fallibility," you sort of summarized in a recent article in The Wall Street Journal, which I read, you write this, and this raised some eyebrows, at least my eyebrows, as well: "The war on terror," you write, "cannot be won. An endless war waged against an unseen enemy is doing great damage to our power and prestige abroad. The world is in danger of sliding into a vicious circle of escalating violence. We can escape it only if we Americans repudiate the war on terror."

What are we supposed to do, just sort of give up and let the terrorists win?

SOROS: No, but when you fight the terrorists, you have to pick up off the terrorists and not wage war, which creates innocent victims, which fuels rage and resentment, which feeds right into the terrorists' cause. I mean, you know, Al Qaida and bin Laden did attack us, and we have to get rid of them. And we were right to go into Afghanistan because that's where he lived.

And if he had stuck to it, and if he had rebuilt Afghanistan as we could have, we would have gotten him. He would have no place to go, but we turned away. Instead of that, went into Iraq, which had nothing to do with 9/11.

BLITZER: But, so what I hear you saying is, the United States has to fight the war on terror. The United States can win the war on terror, but if it does it the right way.

SOROS: What I'm trying to say is that the war on terror is a false and misleading metaphor. We have to fight terrorism, but war is the wrong way to do it, and that is actually what I tried to explain. It creates innocent victims. It is an abstraction so that we can't distinguish between Al Qaida and Hamas and Hezbollah and the Sunni insurrection. It drives a gap between us and the terrorists so that we are the victims, they are the perpetrators, so that we don't realize that our actions have an effect on how people relate to it.

BLITZER: All right. Let me move on to some politics. Because a lot of our viewers will remember in 2004 you gave a lot of your own wealth -- and you're a very wealthy man -- what, between 25 and $30 million to try to defeat George Bush back in 2004. That, as we all know, failed.

Here's what you write in "The Age of Fallibility," your new book: "We cannot count on the Democrats, because they are afraid of being depicted as weak on defense. They will not be able to climb out of the box into which the Bush administration has put them without confronting the war on terror." Well, now you're talking about the war on terror, which a moment ago you were saying shouldn't be called the war on terror. But you seem to be losing confidence in the Democrats.

SOROS: Look, I'm afraid that Democrats have bought into the war on terror. The whole population, we, all of us, got caught in this false metaphor, which is a very powerful metaphor because we have, of course, to deal with terrorism, and what's more natural than waging war? But then turning a figure of speech into reality, we are now fighting real wars on a global scale.

BLITZER: Well, here's the bottom-line question: Are you going to give another 25, $30 million or more next time around, either in this midterm election contest or looking toward 2008 to try to beat the Republicans?

SOROS: I think it's very important that there should be a better balance, and I think it would be very healthy for our democracy if the House at least was in Democratic hands. But I'm much more interested in policy than I am in politics.

BLITZER: So what are we talking about? How much money are you looking forward to making available?

SOROS: Nothing like I did in '04 because that was an exceptional situation. I felt that if we could possibly remove President Bush from the White House, we would spare ourselves the terrible things that have happened since, the deterioration in our power and influence in the world and the increase in stability in the world.

BLITZER: You'll be a little less generous this time?

SOROS: Much more so.

BLITZER: Is there a Democratic candidate among any of the Democrats right now you like for 2008?

SOROS: I think it's too early. I think -- the election is in 2006. BLITZER: So you're not throwing your hat into anybody's ring right now?

SOROS: No.

BLITZER: George Soros, "The Age of Fallibility: Consequences of the War on Terror," thanks very much for coming in.

SOROS: My pleasure.

BLITZER: And coming up next here on "Late Edition, in case you missed it, our Sunday morning talk-show roundup. Were interrogation techniques used on the war on terror? the main topic of the day.

And for our North American viewers, coming up at the top of the hour, "This Week at War" looks at Iraq, Afghanistan and the terror fight.

BLITZER: And now, in case you missed it, let's check some of the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States, all of them focused on the battle between the president and key Congressional leaders over controversial interrogation techniques used to combat terrorism.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: There's two reasons why all these retired military guys, who are not soft on terror or Al Qaida, are coming down vehemently against modifying the Geneva Conventions. There's two reasons. One is the moral high ground. We are not like Al Qaida. We are not like the bad guys. We're the nation that people look up to. There's a war on the battlefield and a psychological or ideological struggle going on. And the second is, they are very worried about American military personnel falling into the hands of enemies who will, quote, "modify" or reinterpret the Geneva conventions to their liking.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR GEORGE ALLEN, R-VIRGINIA: I do not want to stop these interrogations. I'm not for torture. I'm not for waterboarding. But some of these techniques have been very helpful to us, whether they are sleep deprivation or whether it's loud music, and I need to be absolutely certain that what the interrogations, interrogators are doing now, which is completely fine as far as I'm concerned, protecting Americans will not be harmed by the proposal.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) U.S. SENATOR CARL LEVIN, D-MICHIGAN: We've got to stay with the position that protects American troops, that protects American values and avoids handing our enemy, the terrorists, the weapon which they want more than anything else probably, which is that America are hypocrites, that America mistreats prisoners. That plays into their hands. That's the propaganda tool that they want, and we should not hand it to them.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE JOHN BOEHNER, R-OHIO: I think these programs have helped protect the American people, helped uncover terrorist plots before they happened. And they're necessary programs, and we're willing to give the president the tools he needs to take on the terrorists. And many times, they stand in the way and try to fight giving the president these tools.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here on "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk. And that is your "Late Edition" for this Sunday, September 17th. Please be sure to join us next Sunday and every Sunday at 11 a.m. Eastern for the last word in Sunday talk.

PREPARED REMARKS OF ATTORNEY GENERAL ALBERTO R. GONZALES AT THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON CITIZENSHIP

WASHINGTON, D.C.

Good morning, and thank you for having me here.

I'm an admirer of this group and of your purpose. Because we live in an incredible country, the greatest on the face of the planet, leading the world in freedom and prosperity… and you have rightly identified the fact that if we don't participate in politics, government and community service, if we aren't aware of why the American fabric is special and engage in its development – we risk the decline of our greatness, a diminution of our influence.

Even in a democracy – in our case a representative republic – the people can lose their influence if they choose not to participate. A disengaged populous leaves a small, self-selected group of people in charge. And of course, what we are designed to achieve here in America is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Your purpose, and our collective purpose here today, is to keep an eye on whether our citizens are participating in President Lincoln's hope, Dr. King's dream, our founding fathers' vision.

I want to say a few words here about an issue currently in the news that implicates American history and civic and political participation, and that is the current discussion about our treaty obligations under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention. It seems that criticism of the tactics used by the Government in the war on terror are often framed in the context of the Government not respecting our values, our civil liberties, and our rights under the Constitution. Clearly, we all believe that we should follow the Constitution, but what does that mean?

For example, our due process rights under the 5th and 14th Amendments and our right to be free from unreasonable searches under the 4th Amendment are susceptible to many interpretations. Thus their meaning have been informed throughout American history by court decisions and by related statutes passed by Congress. The interpretations by our branches of government reinforce respect for the Constitution by providing clarity and definition to ambiguous words and phrases. Such actions I would argue, strengthen the Constitution and no one would seriously argue that seeking Supreme Court review of the Constitution is an effort to strips away our rights or an attempt to weaken or redefine the Constitution.

The same logic applies to the current discussion of our obligations under Common Article 3. Because of the Supreme Court's decision in the Hamdan case, we now understand that Common Article 3 applies to our conflict with Al Qaida. But aside from the important requirement of humane treatment (which, by the way, the United States was already providing) it is perfectly reasonable to ask what Common Article 3 requires.

Common Article 3 prohibits outrages upon personal dignity and humiliating and degrading treatment. Such phrases standing alone mean different things to Americans. Think of the differences in interpretation that will exist between differing legal systems and cultures of the nations of the world. Much as we are informed by the courts and Congress as to the meaning of due process and unreasonable searches under the Constitution the President believes it is important for the Congress to provide clarity to the meaning of Common Article 3 consistent with our values, using a U.S. Constitutional based standard. The President is advocating a standard that prohibits cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment—a standard based on years of U.S. Court decisions interpreting the constitutional prohibitions on cruel and unusual punishment that protect U.S. citizens in custody. This standard was overwhelmingly supported by the Congress last year in the Detainee Treatment Act.

Seeking this clarity is important to our efforts to continue gathering information about our enemies. In all that we do in the war on terror we seek to promote the rule of law and protect freedom. Defining our treaty obligations after the fact through domestic legislation has been done many times by our Congress and it ensures an understanding of our treaty obligations that is consistent with our values.

As Attorney General, I attend a good number of naturalization ceremonies, which are focus-studies on the meaning of citizenship and I think provide an interesting backdrop for your work.

The ceremonies are always very personal for me. My parents were both children of immigrants and they instilled in me a deep appreciation for being an American. They never let me forget that being a citizen of this great country means having limitless chances – if you work hard and are prepared for that once in a lifetime opportunity!

It is a natural phenomenon that with every generation that we are removed from our immigrant roots, we lose some of that passion. Someone who chooses to be an American has probably thought more about what makes this country special… what makes it better than the country they are leaving behind.

The new citizen even takes a profound oath – swearing to "support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States of America against all enemies, foreign and domestic" – and most of the new citizens I have seen take the oath have tears in their eyes when they repeat the words. Because they are so very proud to become Americans.

I often leave naturalization ceremonies wondering: when is that moment of pride and allegiance for those of us who were fortunate enough to be born here? And how can we inspire that feeling in those who may not know how fortunate they are?

Tragedy can inspire feelings of pride, gratitude and patriotism, though it seems like a terrible way to get there.

Five years ago last week, Americans took flags out of their closets, pinned them on their lapels and sang the national anthem at sporting events with deepened emotion. Thousands joined America's armed forces to fight for the freedom and the life they saw brutally attacked on that day.

I had a chance, two weeks ago, to visit for the second time the front-lines of the war on terror in Iraq. And the steadfast resolve of our men and women in uniform, as well as our civil servants who are there to help the Iraqi people stand up their new government, was inspirational.

These men and women work in a dangerous environment, with daily temperatures well over 100 degrees. They are away from their families. But everyone I met was energetic and proud…so proud to serve a country that has given us all so much. The Americans on the front lines believe what they are doing is important, so important that they are willing to risk their lives for the mission. Just being in their presence made this grandson of immigrants so incredibly proud to be an American.

To have seen these men and women at work in Iraq is to know that we will prevail in this decisive ideological struggle.

To have seen them is also to have learned something about citizenship.

That post-9/11 spirit of citizenship is so vibrant among our troops, but I know that it is not universal in our country. I think we all thought, and hoped, that the renewed sense of citizenship and patriotism would last… and that it would be one more way in which we show our enemies that they won't win this war on terror.

The study you have released today, unfortunately, indicates that while 9/11 does seem to have increased community and national service and voting, we aren't seeing the full-fledged civic renewal that we'd hoped for.

We can take heart in the progress, but must take stock of what is still missing.

I agree there are three key elements to American citizenship; they form a starting point in terms of teaching and inspiring civic involvement:

- First, learning and appreciating America's history and foundations – in our day-to-day lives that translates to a respect for the rule of law.

DOJ_NMG_0065186

- Second, voting – We cannot expect to have populist government if the public does not broadly exercise their right to hire and fire their representatives.
- And third, volunteerism – While I believe strongly that the best "hand-up" ever given is freedom, we cannot take pride in ourselves or our nation if we are not taking care of our neighbors when they need us.

Respect for our Foundations: History and the Law

In my job, I am sworn to protect and defend the Constitution. I am humbled by that duty, as I believe our Constitution is one of the most important documents in the history of humankind.

I believe that we might find a re-birth of citizenship in a renewed emphasis on the Constitution in American history classes. Wouldn't you like to see a graduating high school class who can at least recite the preamble?

I offer it here, today, as a refresher course… and to emphasize my point:

"We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

I wish I could bring every American to the National Archives to see the documents that our country is built on. At this point that is unrealistic, but in the mean time, I feel strongly that this group and, indeed, every leader in public life, should call on American schools and teachers to spend more time studying the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution with their students.

The founding of our country was a very special time in world history – let's teach it with a certain amount of reverence.

Voting

When they are old enough – again, around the time they graduate from high school – I'd like to see every young American declare their own independence and respect their Constitution by voting.

After all, the right to vote, and to have that vote count, is absolutely central to the existence of freedom. When President Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act of 1965 he said the right to vote is the lifeblood of our democracy. In Afghanistan and Iraq young American soldiers have fought and died so that Afghans and Iraqis could vote. And despite continuing danger, the citizens of those countries have participated in the millions.

This forum is an ideal place to brainstorm about how we might inspire younger generations to do better than their parents and grandparents have done in turns of voter participation.

I think we can start – as leaders, parents and teachers – by emphasizing that all elections are important, not just

DOJ_NMG_0065187

Presidential elections.

And it isn't enough to simply cast a vote. It is equally important that the voter's choices be informed about the qualifications of each candidate and the merits of each referendum or initiative. As a former Secretary of State and Chief Elections Officer for Texas, I know well the challenges of motivating our citizens on elections day.

Voting needs to be a habit, as regular as celebrating holidays. An enthusiasm for the act can be contagious – so let's show our kids that voting, for a grown-up, is a special occasion.

This group is in a unique position to put a challenge to the American people – why not ask that, this November, every voter bring a friend, relative or colleague who doesn't normally vote to the polls with them? Let's set the bar high: Americans love a challenge.

Volunteerism

The last element of citizenship to emphasize is volunteerism.

I found it compelling that your civic health index showed a correlation between voting and volunteering at the state level. I hope you are able to dig deeper on this and see if one inspires the other, and if there are things that federal, state and local governments can do to inspire both.

Whenever I speak to young lawyers I always encourage them to consider public service because in giving to others we rekindle and refine ourselves. It feels good to help others…to know that you have made a difference in someone's life. Such opportunities not only make you a better lawyer, they also make you a better person.

There can be no question that volunteerism is good for society and good for the soul. I'm also interested in what it can do for a nation that is so blessed, so prosperous, that we may have lost a bit of perspective on our own fortune.

I am proud to serve a President who has put an emphasis on volunteering, on giving back. As he has said, "The great hope of the country lies in the hearts and the souls of its people."

The President has also spoken about the Armies of Compassion that make our country so great. Whether it is the war on poverty, the war on drugs or the war on illiteracy we have citizen soldiers who confront daily the evils of our society so that our country remains a place where dreams still come true.

I am but one soldier in the Armies of Compassion. But I commit to you to do my part, working shoulder to shoulder, side by side with you for our beloved America.

Thank you again for having me here today, and thank you for your important work. May God bless you, may He guide your decisions and may He continue to bless the United States of America.

Meehan backs plan to offer 9/11 compensation for toxic exposure

By RICK HELLER, Sun Statehouse Bureau

BOSTON -- Five years after Sept. 11, the families of 64 Massachusetts residents who died in the terrorist attacks are among those who have received settlements from the federal September 11th Victim Compensation Fund.

Across the country, families of 2,973 victims of the attack were eligible to file claims, according to Charles Miller, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice, which oversaw the fund. All but 90 filed claims, resulting in a federal distribution of over $7 billion.

The federal fund was created by Congress to provide compensation to families of those killed and to survivors who were physically injured in the attacks. The fund made its last compensation award in 2004.

Families and individuals who accepted compensation gave up the right to sue aviation and security companies for possible negligence related to the terrorist attacks. Some of the 90 families who have not accepted compensation have filed lawsuits at the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, though Miller could not say how many.

U.S. Rep. Marty Meehan is critical of the way the money was distributed.

"The rules prohibited some people from being fairly compensated -- people from the Merrimack Valley whom I represent," said Meehan, a Lowell Democrat.

Two members of Congress from New York have proposed legislation that would reopen the fund to police and firefighters who were exposed to toxins at the disaster site in New York but became ill after the cutoff date for filing a claim.

Meehan has backed the proposal offered by U.S. Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-New York. "I would support re-opening and support her legislation," Meehan said. He warned that the prospects for passage are uncertain. "It will be a difficult battle," he added.

While the federal fund has ceased operations, families and individuals affected by Sept. 11 still have somewhere to turn. The Massachusetts 9/11 Fund is a nonprofit organization funded by private donations that provides financial assistance and medical reimbursements to victims' families.

It is no longer raising money, but continues to receive income from Massachusetts "United We Stand" license plates, according to John Curtis, interim executive director of the fund.

McCain blasts administration for inaction on Indian case

Sept. 18, 2006 12:00 AM

Sen. John McCain gave an earful Thursday to President Bush's nominee to be the assistant secretary of Indian Affairs at the Department of the Interior, blasting as "incomprehensible" the administration's inaction on a proposed settlement to the 10-year-old Indian trust case.

The Arizona Republican, overseeing a hearing of his Senate Indian Affairs Committee, told the nominee, Carl Artman, that it's been five weeks since he and Sen. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, the top Democrat on the committee, met with Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

McCain said he and Dorgan presented "what we believed to be a reasonable solution."

"Both the secretary and attorney general said they'd circulate that within the administration and get back to us," McCain told Artman.

At issue in the case is billions of dollars in land lease and mineral royalties owed by the government to Native American landowners in Arizona and across the nation because of government mismanagement over their trust accounts.

Lawyers for the lead plaintiff, Elouise Cobell, have alleged that Indian landowners are owed at least $100 billion in royalties tied to farming, grazing, mining, logging and other activities on tribal lands.

They have said they would consider the Arizona senator's compromise bill, which has been explained to them as offering $8 billion in settlement money.

However, McCain said on Thursday that, to date, "we've had no official response" from the administration, "and the window for action this year is closing fast."

McCain is expected to leave the committee's chairmanship at the end of this year, which concludes the two-year congressional session.

"Therefore, we've sent a letter to the secretary and the attorney general again asking for a final assessment and response," McCain said.

He asked Artman to take a message back to the administration, as well.

"It's incomprehensible that the administration not be able to come up with at least a response to what is the product of years of effort on the part of this committee and the interested parties," McCain said.

If left to linger unresolved in the courts, Dorgan warned, this trust case "will weigh over all the other issues and have profound impact on virtually everything else" that the Department of the Interior is trying to do with respect to Indian issues.

Told of McCain's comments, Interior Department spokesman Shane Wolfe said, "We continue to have excellent discussions with congressional staff and look forward to bringing the issue to closure with a mutually acceptable resolution."

In his testimony to the committee, Artman, a former chief counsel and member of the Oneida Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin, said resolution of the case is critical, "whether it comes from Congress, the administration or the courts."

"The sooner this litigation ends, the sooner we improve our relationship with tribes, and the sooner we increase for Indians and Alaska Natives the benefits of that relationship," Artman said.

Agencies crack down on Medicare fraud

By Curt Anderson
The Associated Press

MIAMI · Medicare recipient J.D. got a $3,500 artificial leg and a $2,900 arm prosthesis. For F.R., it was a $2,320 prosthetic arm with locking elbow and a $6,840 artificial leg. Medicare provided M.C. with a $1,200 shoulder apparatus and a $1,700 device for a below-knee amputation.

Each of those people, identified in court documents only by their initials, is a real Medicare beneficiary who lives in the Miami area. But none lost a finger, much less two limbs.

Instead, federal prosecutors say, they were paid by a crooked medical devices company for use of their Medicare status to steal more than $3 million from the nation's health care program for the elderly. The company's owners also paid doctors kickbacks to write false prescriptions for the devices, investigators say.

Such schemes are all too common in the retirement haven of Florida, which is second only to California with more than 3 million Medicare recipients, according to 2005 Medicare data. Three urban counties in South Florida -- Broward, Miami-Dade and Palm Beach -- are home to almost a third of all Florida's recipients and have become a national hotbed for fraud.

Borrowing a tactic used successfully against drug traffickers, federal prosecutors in Miami are attacking the problem by focusing on both the "street-level" scams that typically involve between $1 million and $5 million in fraud, as well as the high-dollar cases involving large health-care providers.

Since October, that effort has resulted in criminal charges against more than 100 people in 63 separate cases and civil lawsuits against 38 additional defendants. All told, the cases over this one-year period involved more than $100 million in Medicare fraud, said Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta.

In past years, Acosta said, criminals may have thought investigators wouldn't waste much time on relatively small-dollar fraud amounts of $1 million or $2 million.

"Word on the street that you could fly under the federal radar is not a good thing," Acosta said in an interview. "We're talking real money here. I think this is a serious problem."

The crackdown involves federal, state and local agencies. Miami and Los Angeles are the only two cities where investigators are using sophisticated data analysis techniques to uncover Medicare fraud patterns, said Medicare spokesman Peter Ashkenaz.

"When we see there is a pattern, we start looking into it," he said.

These patterns include unusual surges in Medicare billings from particular clinics or medical suppliers. Analysts also focus on billings for certain items that are prone to fraud. For example, investigators in Florida focused on AIDS drug fraud when they encountered more claims for certain drugs than there are AIDS patients in the entire state.

Two Miami men were arrested this month for running a clinic that altered blood samples so the "patients" -- paid with cash or gift cards -- appeared to be in need of a serious and costly AIDS drug treatment. That scheme defrauded Medicare of $1.4 million.

"This scam kept others from receiving funds that could have provided essential health care," said Florida Attorney General and gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist, whose office is part of the Medicare fraud task force.

One factor in the fraud is that Medicare, by law, is required to immediately pay claims, forcing investigators to look into suspicious situations after the money is already gone, Ashkenaz said.

Acosta said about 20 prosecutors from his office are assigned to Medicare fraud in an area where more than 800,000 beneficiaries live.

"We're putting all the resources we can spare into this effort," Acosta said. "There's a lot more that could be done."

New Supreme Court Term Promises Early Drama

Marcia Coyle

The U.S. Supreme Court's new term, which already offers controversial challenges involving abortion, affirmative action, punitive damages and global warming, promises to add significantly to the emerging portrait of the newly constituted Roberts court.

The justices will open the 2006-2007 term on the traditional first Monday in October -- Oct. 2 -- but in an untraditional way. There will be no oral arguments because of the Jewish holy day, Yom Kippur.

But on that day, or as has become more routine in recent years, on the Friday before the first Monday, the Court will announce new grants of review -- as well as denials -- of cases gleaned from the thousands that came into the Court throughout the summer.

The justices approach the opening day with a relatively spare argument docket, having agreed to hear arguments in 31 cases, fewer than the number granted review at this time a year ago. But there is none of the uncertainty that surrounded them last fall as they awaited the arrival of a new chief justice and dealt with the impending departure of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

But even if the high court only decided the 31 cases currently on the docket, there is plenty of potential drama and legal significance in that group, say scholars and court watchers.

"There are some stand-out cases and each of them will test whether this is a 'restrained' Court," said constitutional law scholar Douglas Kmiec of Pepperdine University School of Law, referring to the abortion, affirmative action and punitive damages challenges.

Each of those "headline" cases, he added, also reflects the influence of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who has played a major role or has cast the decisive vote in the precedents or doctrines underlying those challenges.

The balance of the current docket, said Kmiec, is not like those cases but is "wonderfully lawyerly," many dealing with such issues as retroactivity or administrative law.

"One trend from last term which I really hope will continue is that the chief justice seems to be oriented toward trying to find, where he can, an opportunity for consensus resolution of cases," said high court scholar Mark Rahdert of Temple University James E. Beasley School of Law. One of the weaknesses of the last chief justice, William H. Rehnquist, said Rahdert, was that he made no serious effort to achieve consensus, and that resulted in many splintered decisions and a huge increase in concurrences.

"It was really kind of messy," said Rahdert. "Roberts seems not to like that and to think the Court should speak with something more nearly approaching a single voice. That's not to say he is afraid of dispute."

FACING DISPUTE

Roberts' consensus-building efforts surely will be tested early in the new term in two of the most divisive issues for the high court -- abortion and affirmative action.

"I think the handwriting is pretty clear in both areas that the law is going to change significantly," said

Rahdert. "If you just line up the votes -- replacing O'Connor with [Justice Samuel A.] Alito [Jr.] on both issues. The committed minority in the past that was opposed to affirmative action and any kind of permission for partial-birth abortion is set to become a majority."

The real question in both, added Rahdert, is how dramatically will the law change. "Will the Court announce some sort of bold, new set of principles or apply the existing framework in a different fashion and weigh the values in a different way?"

In Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380, and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382, the Bush administration seeks to overturn rulings by the 8th and 9th circuits that struck down the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.

Every court to review the law has found it invalid, generally because it is overbroad and because it lacks an exception to protect the health of the woman -- a requirement established by a 5-4 high court decision in 2000 in Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, which held that Nebraska's partial-birth abortion law was unconstitutional. O'Connor was the critical fifth vote to invalidate the law. Kennedy wrote a bitter dissent.

In enacting the federal ban, Congress explicitly found that a health exception was not necessary for this type of medical procedure.

"Rather than enacting a law that conformed to Stenberg, Congress sought to overturn that ruling and made findings in the act that criticized factual findings of numerous federal district courts," wrote Priscilla J. Smith of the Center for Reproductive Rights, who is high court counsel to Dr. LeRoy Carhart and three other physicians in the 8th Circuit case.

"There are two aspects to the case that are intriguing: the extent to which Congress has found the facts, and [that Congress is] owed deference under Section 5 of the 14th Amendment," said Pepperdine's Kmiec.

That has implications that extend beyond abortion, he said. "And the particular issue of the health exception, which has been, for conservatives, one of the more duplicitous aspects of the entire body of abortion jurisprudence."

Kmiec concedes that it is "very difficult at first blush" to see why a conservative, restrained court would take the abortion challenges, since there is no circuit split and there is a recent precedent.

"Maybe the answer is: It's not a fully restrained court, especially in this case where Justice Kennedy has been waiting to prevail, and justices [Clarence] Thomas and [Antonin] Scalia have not fully signed on yet to the Roberts-Alito method of decision-making," said Kmiec.

The replacement of O'Connor with Alito may also be determinative in the Court's two key affirmative action cases: Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District #1, No. 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, No. 05-915.

Parents in both cases are challenging school integration guidelines that prevented their children from attending their school of choice because of their race or ethnicity. The Bush administration has intervened in the cases on the side of the parents, arguing that the guidelines involve "outright racial balancing" which is "patently unconstitutional."

The high court last visited the issue of affirmative action in 2003 when it upheld the affirmative-action admissions policy at the University of Michigan Law School, but struck down a differently constituted admissions policy at the undergraduate school. Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244 (2003); Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003). O'Connor was the key vote and voice in the law school ruling; Kennedy was in dissent. If the school districts here lose, "It would really, in the context it is before the Court, signal the end of the Brown v. Board of Education desegregation era," said Temple's Rahdert. "What's left of school desegregation are these voluntary plans that try, at the margins, to combat the tendency of having patterns of one-race schools."

REGULATING WARMING

The high court takes up one of the most hotly debated environmental issues of the time-global warming-in a challenge to the Environmental Protection Agency's interpretation of the Clean Air Act. Massachusetts v. EPA, No. 05-1120.

The case involves whether greenhouse gas emissions from cars and light trucks should be regulated by the EPA under the Clean Air Act because of their contribution to global warming. The agency in 2003 concluded that it had no authority to regulate air pollutants associated with climate change, regardless of the state of the scientific evidence. It also concluded that the four substances covered by a petition seeking regulatory standards were not "air pollutants" within the meaning of the Clean Air Act.

Thirty parties, including 16 states, unsuccessfully appealed the agency's decision to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

In the high court, Massachusetts Attorney General Thomas Reilly argues, "The ruling in this case is an extreme departure from this Court's precedents on statutory interpretation. To allow this decision to stand would be to sanction an enormous shift of power to administrative agencies, effectively letting them dismantle statutory regimes they simply do not like."

The Bush administration argues that petitioners have no standing and that the agency identified "a variety of sensible and appropriate reasons -- including the complex and highly uncertain nature of the scientific record" for its conclusion that even if it had authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from motor vehicles, "an endangerment finding would be inappropriate at this time."

While global warming is a "first" for the Supreme Court, a key sentencing challenge in the new term is continuation of fallout from the justices' sentencing revolution begun with Apprendi v. New Jersey, 540 U.S. 446 (2000). In Apprendi, the Court held that the Sixth Amendment prohibits judges from enhancing sentences beyond statutory maximums based on facts not found by a jury.

In Cunningham v. California, No. 05-6551, the justices will examine California's three-tiered, determinate sentencing system for compliance with the Sixth Amendment and Apprendi and its progeny. Cunningham is significant for at least two reasons, said sentencing scholar Michael O'Hear of Marquette University Law School. "We're talking here about potentially devastating results for the largest state criminal justice system in the country," he said. "If the state loses, it's going to result in chaos in this enormous system."

A decision, he added, also may result in the Court saying important things about the federal system, in which, because of U.S. v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005), sentencing guidelines are no longer mandatory. "The state in its brief is trying to analogize its system to the federal system," said O'Hear. "If the Court declares the state system unconstitutional, then there is a question about what has been happening in the federal system since Booker was decided and the Court may feel obliged to talk about that."

Other cases to watch include:

Burton v. Waddington, No. 05-9222: Is the sentencing decision, Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004), retroactive?

Canada to release inquiry report into deportation and torture of citizen in Syria

By ROB GILLIES

Associated Press Writer

TORONTO_The final report from an inquiry established to determine the role Canadian officials played in the deportation\l "l" and torture of a Canadian in Syria will be released Monday.

Justice Dennis O'Connor will deliver his report into the ordeals of Maher Arar, who claims he is a victim of extraordinary rendition _ the policy of transferring foreign terror suspects to third countries without court approval.

Arar, a Syrian-born Canadian, was traveling on a Canadian passport when he was grabbed at a New York airport in September 2002 during a stopover on his way home to Canada from vacation in Tunisia. He said U.S. authorities sent him to Syria for interrogation on suspicion of being a member of al-Qaida, an allegation he denied.

After being released in 2003, Arar made detailed allegations about extensive interrogation, beatings and whippings with electrical cable in grim Syrian prison cells.

Canada's federal government established an inquiry in 2004 to determine the role Canadian officials played in the case of Arar, who has been cleared of any terrorist connections.

In their public testimony, Royal Canadian Mounted Police investigators acknowledged they were tipped in advance by the U.S. authorities that Arar would be detained in New York, and that they shared information about him with their U.S. counterparts.

They deny, however, that they played any role in the U.S. decision to send him to Syria.

Canada's spy service, CSIS, has been accused by officials at Canada's Foreign Affairs Department of preferring to keep Arar in Syria rather than let him return to Canada _ a claim the spy service denies.

Arar, 36, will be in Ottawa on Monday when O'Connor's report is released.

Arar wants to know whether Canada is complicit in contracting out torture to a country known to use violent methods to extract information from prisoners.

"Of course, I would like to know why I was sent to Syria and whether Canadian officials were complicit," he said.

He hopes the report will completely clear his name. He also wants to make sure what happened to him does not occur to anyone else.

O'Connor sifted through thousands of pages of documents and sat through testimony from more than 40 witnesses.

O'Connor will deliver two versions of his report to the government: one classified, the other public. But portions of even the public edition of the long-awaited document will be withheld due to security concerns.

Ottawa to censor portions of Arar report; Deletions on national-security grounds will face legal challenge later, panel says

JEFF SALLOT

OTTAWA The official report on the torture case of Maher Arar will be censored because of government fears that publication of some of the evidence could hurt national security, federal sources say.

The long-awaited report, which is to be released Monday by a judicial commission of inquiry, will have parts deleted that officials fear could identify informants or could hurt diplomatic relations with countries that provided Ottawa with intelligence reports in confidence, the sources say.

However, lawyers for the commission plan to take the government to court to force the eventual release of information that Mr. Justice Dennis O'Connor, the head of the inquiry, wants disclosed because it is in the public interest.

The deletions will not prevent the commission from completing one of its chief objectives, determining the extent of Canadian government complicity in Mr. Arar's 2002 arrest in New York and deportation to Syria as a suspected terrorist, according to the federal sources who cannot be identified because they have not been authorized by the Conservative government to speak to reporters.

The commission agreed to the release of a censored version of the report next week -- and to fight the deletions issue later in court -- rather than delay publication of its conclusions and recommendations any longer.

Lawyers for the commission and government have been at loggerheads for 17 months about what must remain secret for reasons of state security. They have narrowed their differences considerably, but a number of issues will have to be thrashed out in the courts, the sources said.

The previous Liberal government set up the public inquiry Feb. 5, 2004, to determine whether any Canadian officials were complicit in the deportation of Mr. Arar, an Ottawa software engineer, from the United States to Syria where he was brutally interrogated by military intelligence officers. Then-prime-minister Paul Martin said, 'I want to get to the bottom of this.'

But national security issues arose almost immediately. Judge O'Connor, the associate chief justice of Ontario, has conducted a number of hearings in camera because of government objections to the disclosure of some of the evidence.

The issue came to a head in April last year when Judge O'Connor tried to publish a summary of in-camera evidence from the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. He had already vetted the material and removed references he had decided might cause a legitimate security problem.

But the Justice Department and the Privy Council Office threatened to go over the commissioner's head to get an order from the Federal Court to block publication.

Anticipating a lengthy legal battle that could stall commission work, Judge O'Connor agreed to withhold that summary of evidence for the time being and litigate disputes after writing his report.

Meanwhile, he appointed an expert in diplomacy and security, Reid Morden, to advise him on what might safely be released publicly and what disclosures might harm Canadian interests. Mr. Morden is a former deputy minister of foreign affairs and former CSIS director.

The censorship issue has prevented Mr. Arar, 35, from testifying at the inquiry. Judge O'Connor ruled that it would be unfair to subject him to cross-examination by government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" who had access to confidential information that had not been seen by Mr. Arar or his own lawyers.

Mr. Arar, who was held in Syrian military intelligence prisons for more than a year without being charged, says he fears that a heavily censored commission report will make it hard to fully clear his name.

Op-Ed: The View From Guantánamo

By ABU BAKKER QASSIM

Tirana, Albania

I HAVE been greatly saddened to hear that the Congress of the United States, a country I deeply admire, is considering new laws that would deny prisoners at Guantánamo Bay the right to challenge their detentions in federal court.

I learned my respect for American institutions the hard way. When I was growing up as a Uighur in China, there were no independent courts to review the imprisonment and oppression of people who, like me, peacefully opposed the Communists. But I learned my hardest lesson from the United States: I spent four long years behind the razor wire of its prison in Cuba.

I was locked up and mistreated for being in the wrong place at the wrong time during America's war in Afghanistan. Like hundreds of Guantánamo detainees, I was never a terrorist or a soldier. I was never even on a battlefield. Pakistani bounty hunters sold me and 17 other Uighurs to the United States military like animals for $5,000 a head. The Americans made a terrible mistake.

It was only the country's centuries-old commitment to allowing habeas corpus challenges that put that mistake right — or began to. In May, on the eve of a court hearing in my case, the military relented, and I was sent to Albania along with four other Uighurs. But 12 of my Uighur brothers remain in Guantánamo today. Will they be stranded there forever?

Without my American lawyers and habeas corpus, my situation and that of the other Uighurs would still be a secret. I would be sitting in a metal cage today. Habeas corpus helped me to tell the world that Uighurs are not a threat to the United States or the West, but an ally. Habeas corpus cleared my name — and most important, it let my family know that I was still alive.

Like my fellow Uighurs, I am a great admirer of the American legal and political systems. I have the utmost respect for the United States Congress. So I respectfully ask American lawmakers to protect habeas corpus and let justice prevail. Continuing to permit habeas rights to the detainees in Guantánamo will not set the guilty free. It will prove to the world that American democracy is safe and well.

I am from East Turkestan on the northwest edge of China. Communist China cynically calls my homeland "Xinjiang," which means "new dominion" or "new frontier." My people want only to be treated with respect and dignity. But China uses the American war on terrorism as a pretext to punish those who peacefully dissent from its oppressive policies. They brand as “terrorism” all political opposition from the Uighurs.

Amnesty International reports that East Turkistan is the only province in China where people may face the death penalty for political offenses. Chinese leaders brag about the number of Uighur political prisoners shot in the head. I was punished for speaking against China’s unjust policies, and I left because of the threat to my life. My search for work and refuge took me from Kyrgyzstan to Afghanistan and Pakistan.

I heard about the Sept. 11 attacks for the first time in Guantánamo. I was not aware of their magnitude until after my release, when a reporter showed me images online at an Internet cafe in Tirana. It was a terrible thing. But I too was its victim. I would never have experienced the ordeal and humiliation of Guantánamo if this horrific event had not taken place.

I feel great sadness for the families who lost their loved ones on that horrible day five years ago. And I would be sadder still to see the freedom-loving American people walk away from their respect for the rule of law. I want America to be a strong and respected nation in the world. Only then can it continue to be the source of hope for the hopeless — like my people.

Abu Bakker Qassim was imprisoned at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, from 2002 to May. This article was translated from the Uighur by Nury Turael.

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Revises Terror Proposal (USAT)

USA Today, September 19, 2006

The White House plans to send lawmakers a revised proposal for trying terrorism suspects as President Bush's plan met more resistance among Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0065207

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said Monday that the administration was sending the new language in hopes of reaching an agreement. Republican senators have written their own proposal giving terror detainees more rights than the administration wants.

Less than a week after a Republican-led Senate committee defied Bush and approved terrorism-detainee legislation that the president vowed to block, three more GOP senators said they oppose the administration's version.

Official tells of nomineefor cybersecurity job

President Bush has chosen an industry information security specialist to be the Department of Homeland Security's assistant secretary for cybersecurity and telecommunications, a department official said.

Greg Garcia, vice president of the Information Technology Association of America, will be nominated for the post, the department official told the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the announcement is pending.

The cybersecurity job, created in July 2005, has been filled by acting director Donald Purdy who was on loan from Carnegie Mellon University under a two-year contract.

Last week, a test of mock Internet attacks found that government and industry officials were unable to fight back quickly and effectively against simulated hackings that sought to halt subways and cause power outages.

Ney to resign from twoHouse leadership posts

Rep. Bob Ney, who has agreed to plead guilty to federal corruption charges, stepped down from two House committee positions but did not say whether he would leave Congress.

Ney, R-Ohio, headed the Housing and Community Opportunity subcommittee, which oversees the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, and the Franking Commission, which governs lawmakers' use of public money to express opinions in mailings.

Ney agreed Friday to plead guilty to making false statements and conspiracy to commit fraud, make other false statements and violate U.S. lobbying restrictions. Soon after that announcement, Ohio Republican Party Chairman Bob Bennett called for Ney to resign.

David Popp, Ney's chief of staff, would not say whether the congressman would return to his duties before his term expires in January. He is not seeking re-election.

Republican NYC mayorto campaign for Lieberman

Republican New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg will host a fundraiser for Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., at the mayor's Manhattan town house, according to Lieberman's campaign. Lieberman is seeking re-election as an independent after losing the Democratic primary to Ned Lamont. Dan Gerstein, a spokesman for Lieberman's campaign, said the fundraiser will be held Nov. 1 and will be co-chaired by former senator Alfonse D'Amato, another New York Republican, and former Democratic New York mayor Ed Koch.

Poll shows Democrat aheadfor open Minn. Senate seat

Democrat Amy Klobuchar, county attorney in Minneapolis, led GOP Rep. Mark Kennedy, 56%-32% in the U.S. Senate race, a Star Tribune poll found. Klobuchar led 50%-31% in the same poll in July. The two seek the seat of Democrat Mark Dayton. The poll of 820 likely voters was conducted Wednesday through Friday and has a margin of error of +/-3.4 percentage points.

White House To Revise Terror Proposal (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, September 19, 2006

The White House said Monday it will send lawmakers a revised proposal for dealing with terrorism suspects as indications grew that President Bush's plan was meeting increased resistance among Republicans in both chambers of Congress.

White House Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino said the administration was sending the new language in hopes of reaching an agreement. A revolt by GOP senators, who have written their own proposal giving terror detainees more rights than the administration wants, has embarrassed the White House at a time when Republicans want to use their security policies as a main platform in November's congressional elections.

"Our commitment to finding a resolution is strong," Perino said.

A week after a Republican-led Senate committee defied Bush and approved terror-detainee legislation that the president vowed to block, three more GOP senators said they now opposed the administration's version, joining the four Republicans who had already come out against it.

If all 44 Democrats plus the chamber's Democratic-leaning independent also vote for the alternative by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., as expected, that would give it a majority in the 100-member Senate.

In a further hint of problems for the administration, House officials said their chamber was postponing a vote planned for Wednesday on a bill mirroring Bush's proposal.

Republican officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said they have encountered resistance and were no longer certain they had enough votes to push the measure to passage through the GOP-run House.

Kevin Madden, spokesman for House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said the vote would be rescheduled to next week and blamed the delay on a request by the House Judiciary Committee to study the bill.

An administration official, who declined to be identified because of the sensitivity surrounding the negotiations, said the new language only addresses a dispute over the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, which set the standard for treatment of prisoners taken during hostilities.

No other details of the new administration plan were initially available.

"This legislation, once finished, will provide not only a way to bring the mastermind of 9/11 to justice, but also provide clarity to our men and women in the intelligence community who are interrogating these high-value detainees who helped provide information that allowed us to disrupt and prevent additional terrorist plots against America," the White House's Perino said.

The president's measure would go further than Warner's bill, allowing classified evidence to be withheld from defendants in terror trials and allowing coerced testimony. Bush also favors a narrower interpretation of the Geneva Conventions that would make it harder to prosecute U.S. interrogators for using harsh techniques.

Neither side is saying how an agreement can be achieved on whether to allow the CIA to use highly controversial methods such as disorientation, forced nakedness and waterboarding, in which a subject is made to think he is drowning. Without confirming any specific techniques used by the CIA, the Bush administration says the agency's program has foiled terror plots. Opponents say the techniques verge on torture.

Last week, Warner, normally a Bush supporter, pushed his measure through his Senate Armed Services Committee by a 15-9 vote. The White House argued that the Senate proposal would end the CIA program to interrogate terrorists.

Whether Bush would have enough votes to win on the Senate floor seemed in question. On Monday, Warner appeared to have the majority of support in the Senate, with at least 52 votes in his favor if Democrats backed him, as expected.

GOP Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Olympia Snowe of Maine said they favor Warner's bill, joining Warner and three others who voted for it during the committee meeting last week.

Neither side has been able to muster definitively the 60 votes necessary to prevent a Senate filibuster of their proposal. This uncertainty — along with hope that the White House and Warner would reach an agreement to stave off a Republican showdown on the Senate floor_ has kept the bill from being voted on.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., who supports the president's bill, has said he wants to pass it before lawmakers recess at the end of the month. Doing so would allow the president to proceed with prosecutions of 14 "high-value" terrorists before the midterm elections.

The president's plan has encountered resistance in the House as well, with Rep. Steve Buyer, R-Ind., urging Bush to heed the military's top uniformed lawyers, who have previously opposed some provisions of the president's plan.

An agreement would keep Republicans from having to choose between backing Bush, as they have done in the past on anti-terror issues, and three Republicans known as leaders on national security issues: Warner, R-Va., a former Navy secretary; John McCain, R-Ariz., a former prisoner of war who last year pushed through legislation banning mistreatment of detainees; and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., a reserve judge for the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals.

White House Offers New Proposal On Interrogations (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

White House officials sent Congress a revised proposal last night on rules governing the interrogation of detainees at secret CIA prisons, bending to the opposition of a growing group of Republicans who have balked at President Bush's proposal on military trials for suspected terrorists.

Senate aides and White House officials did not divulge the changes to the initial proposal, but they made it clear that negotiations were restarting after days of heated charges and countercharges. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), a central figure in the dispute, said there is now a "50-50 chance" of a deal being struck by week's end.

At issue is legislation authorizing the creation of "military commissions" that would try terrorist suspects. But the central dispute is whether language should be included to "clarify" the responsibilities that intelligence operatives have under the Geneva Conventions in the treatment of detainees in secret prisons.

A group of dissident Republicans, led by Senate Armed Services Chairman John W. Warner (Va.), Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and Graham, say that would be tantamount to abrogating the Geneva Conventions and would invite other countries to reinterpret the treaty as they wish.

"We appear to be moving towards a possible resolution," said a senior Bush aide, who, like others, spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss negotiations. Another official said both sides decided to cool down the debate after days of pitched rhetoric when they concluded they were getting nowhere.

Since the dispute burst into the open Wednesday, five other Republican senators -- Susan Collins (Maine), Olympia J. Snowe (Maine), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), John E. Sununu (N.H.) and Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) -- have indicated they will side with the dissidents, and the numbers were threatening to grow.

"Obviously, the debate has raised a couple decibel levels," the second White House official said. "We could block whatever they want, and they could block whatever we want. Nobody wants that kind of impasse." Congressional leaders had hoped that the commissions bill would be the centerpiece of a legislative month dedicated to national security issues.

After yesterday's talks, the official said, "there was a general tone of cautious optimism."

The dissidents' hand has only grown stronger. House Republican leaders decided yesterday to drop a vote planned for this week on Bush's bill on military trials, agreeing instead to refer it to the Judiciary Committee for further consideration. White House and GOP leaders had hoped an overwhelming vote in the House this week would increase the pressure on McCain, Graham and Warner to relent.

More troubling to the White House and GOP leaders, Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), chairman of the House International Relations Committee, indicated he may ask to examine portions of the bill pertaining to international treaties, leadership aides acknowledged.

GOP leaders are concerned that would open a second front on the debate over the Geneva Conventions. Hyde would also like to examine a section of the bill suspending detainees' right of habeas corpus, a provision that civil libertarians strongly criticize but that so far has not been controversial in Congress.

A White House official expressed confidence that House GOP leaders will bring to a vote a bill of the president's liking. Still, the delay in the House marked a fresh setback for Bush, who had demanded that Congress send him a bill this month authorizing the creation of the commissions.

Beyond the dispute over the Geneva Conventions, the White House and the dissidents are clashing on how and whether classified information should be divulged to commission defendants, and whether evidence obtained through coercive interrogations should be admissible at trials.

The White House would like more latitude to withhold classified information, but the dissidents say it is a fundamental rule of jurisprudence that defendants be able to confront the evidence being used against them. The dissidents are also concerned that the use of coerced evidence could open convictions to appeal.

White House and Senate officials indicated that yesterday's counterproposal from the Bush administration deals primarily with the Geneva Conventions issue. Once agreement can be reached on that, they said, the other matters should be resolved quickly.

Mark Salter, McCain's chief of staff, said the Arizona senator is hoping for assurances from the White House that CIA interrogators would abide by the standards of treatment for detainees codified last year after a fight with the White House over interrogation at military prisons. But such assurances would not be enough unless Bush agrees to drop any new definitions of treatment under the Geneva Conventions.

A third White House official said the administration would tone down its public discussion of the matter as long as talks proceeded. "As long as there's a sense that there's a deal to be had and everyone's trying to get there, you won't see much public chatter out there," the official said.

Bush Offers Concession On Terror Suspects' Rights (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

President Bush yesterday offered to compromise on his hard-line stance that Congress curb rights for terrorism suspects, as the White House announced it will send lawmakers a revised proposal intended to overcome increasing resistance from Republicans on Capitol Hill.

White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said the administration would send new language to the Hill in hopes of reaching an agreement and quell a Republican revolt. Last week, four Republicans, led by Chairman John W. Warner of Virginia, joined all Democrats on the Senate Armed Services Committee, voting 15-9 to expand the rights of terror suspects.

"Our commitment to finding a resolution is real and that's why we're going to be sharing some language, because we are eager to find a resolution," Mrs. Perino said.

An administration official said last night that the new language offered by the White House pertains only to U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions, which govern treatment of prisoners of war. The president has questioned the conventions rule that prisoners not be subject to "outrages upon human dignity."

"That's a statement that is wide open to interpretation," Mr. Bush said in a press conference Friday. "And what I am proposing is that there be clarity in the law so that our professionals will have no doubt that that which they are doing is legal."

Mr. Bush said, "The piece of legislation I sent up there provides our professionals that which is needed to go forward."

The president also contends that without such clarity, the program cannot proceed. He said Friday, "If not for this program, our intelligence community believes al Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland."

Mr. Warner and fellow Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina were to get the latest proposal on the president's bill late last night, and Mr. Graham said that the outreach is appreciated.

"Like all negotiations, this is and will continue to be a back-and-forth exchange of thoughts and proposals," Mr. Graham said. "We share the president's goal of enacting legislation preserving an effective CIA program to make us safe, upholding Geneva Convention protections for our troops and passing constitutional muster."

A week after the Senate committee defied Mr. Bush, three more Republican senators said they oppose the administration's version, joining the four committee Republicans who voted against it. Republican Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine said they favor Mr. Warner's bill.

Although the Republican Party holds 55 seats in the 100-member Senate, Mr. Bush's proposal would fail if Democrats vote against the measure in a unified bloc, as expected.

In a further setback for the White House, the House announced yesterday that it would postpone a vote planned for tomorrow on a bill mirroring Mr. Bush's proposal.

White House Revises Plan For Detainees (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, September 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065211

The battle between the White House and Republican senators at odds over interrogation techniques at secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons moved closer to resolution on Monday night when the White House sent a new draft bill to Congress.

"The senators at the weekend suggested they would re-open negtotiations and asked us to send some language. Since we are eager to find a solution we are sending up draft language to the Hill for consideration to help them find a way forward," said a White House spokeswoman.

Progress in the talks was noted on Monday by Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who has led resistance to the White House interpretation of Article 3 of the Geneva Convention, which governs the rights of wartime detainees.

"We are certainly making progress and I'm hopeful we can get it completed soon," he said. Mr McCain, with John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and Lindsey Graham, have taken on the Senate leadership, by opposing the White House effort, citing fears it could compromise the treatment of US military personnel captured overseas.

"If it's seen that our country is trying to redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of the CIA, why can't every other country redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of their secret police?'" Mr Graham asked.

The White House has been conscious of two critical political deadlines. Congress has just two weeks left to act to pass a bill before gearing up for the mid-term elections. If it fails, President George W Bush could face a much more hostile Congress after the elections.

Mr McCain said he had the backing of George Shultz, former secretary of state, joining Colin Powell, another former secretary of state, who joined the debate last week with a letter warning of the moral damage to the reputation of the US.

Mr Shultz told the FT. "My concern is not doing anything to change the Geneva Convention. I believe the ability to use aggressive questioning is important and I understand the objectives of the administration and Mr McCain can be achieved without touching the Geneva Convention, and dealing with the War Crimes Act.

"The US War Crimes Act of 1996 makes it a felony to commit grave violations of the Geneva Conventions. Mr Shultz warned that the US should "not to mess around with the Geneva Convention. There has been a long tradition of the Convention. As a former secretary of state I know how important reciprocity is to military people….It is very important for us to be defining ourselves with the highest ideals, but you also have to protect yourselves."

Jennifer Daskal of Human Rights Watch, said that approach, "certainly seems to be a reasonable compromise," in that it could protect CIA personnel carrying out any tough interrogations in secret prisons from prosecution.

"It could allow it to go forward. It might be violating the law, but they [the interrogators] could not be held criminally accountable under the War Crimes Act."

Frist Could 'Fill The Tree' On Rival Detainee Bill (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, September 19, 2006

As the man who decides how issues are brought to the Senate floor, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) could use a few procedural tricks up his sleeve to stack the deck in favor of President Bush if he decides to force an intraparty showdown this week over the treatment and interrogation of detainees in the war on terrorism.

Though much has been made of the support Senate Armed Services Chairman

John Warner (R-Va.) and Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) have garnered for their proposal on how to prosecute suspected terrorists and Bush's fervent opposition to it, there is no guarantee that Senators will get a chance to vote in a head-to-head matchup between the differing bills proposed by the two sides.

"You don't always know what options you're going to have," warned a senior Senate GOP aide.

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.) began surveying the Republican Conference on Friday to find out Members' positions on the president's detainee bill and whether they would oppose a filibuster of the Bush plan, said a well-placed Senate Republican aide.

However, as of press time Monday, Senate GOP leaders were still waiting for today's Senate Republican policy lunch to gauge the level of dissension or consensus in their ranks.

DOJ_NMG_0065212

"When people get back to town, it's a whole lot easier to see where they are," explained the senior Senate GOP aide. "We can't do anything until Wednesday anyway."

That's true, considering the Senate will finish up work on a U.S.-Oman free-trade agreement today and is expected to move on to the nomination of Alice Fisher to be assistant attorney general this afternoon.

The remainder of the week is anybody's guess, as Frist must decide whether it's worth going forward with debate on detainee legislation. He still has not ruled out combining the president's plan with another lightning-rod issue within the GOP ranks, the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program.

On the detainee question, Frist could decide to give Senators only one option and then dare wavering Democrats and Republicans who are up for re-election or from politically marginal states to vote against the president's plan, which would allow the government to try suspected terrorists by military tribunal.

By most counts, Warner, McCain and Graham have at least eight other GOP supporters — Sens. Susan Collins (Maine), Olympia Snowe (Maine), Dick Lugar (Ind.), Mike DeWine (Ohio), Gordon Smith (Ore.), John Sununu (N.H.), Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.) — for their bill, which would give terrorist suspects more rights during trials and omits language the Bush administration says is necessary to protect U.S. interrogators from being charged with ambiguous war crimes.

With 11 GOP supporters and the expected backing of a majority of Democrats, the Armed Services proposal, which passed the panel with largely Democratic support last week, could draw as many as 56 votes.

But the senior Senate GOP aide noted that that count would apply only if those Senators actually have an opportunity to vote for the Warner-McCain-Graham alternative to the president's bill. Frist could decide to use a procedural maneuver, known as filling the amendment tree, to prevent an up-or-down vote on the trio's proposal. Still, Frist would need 60 votes to choke off any potential filibuster of the president's plan — a tall order.

While it is always possible that Frist could decide to bring up one or both proposals with no restrictions on amendments, giving opponents an opportunity to present their alternatives, the more likely scenario is one in which Frist tries to restrict the debate in an attempt to minimize the damage that already has been done to a national security message that was supposed to be the Republicans' ace in the hole going into the Nov. 7 elections. Additionally, adding structure and limits to the debate could also serve to head-off the potential of Democratic attempts to hijack the proceedings with other issues.

Of course, Frist also could decide to punt the issue into next week or beyond if talks between the warring parties appear to be bearing fruit.

"Ideally, we'd still like to see a compromise," said Frist spokeswoman Amy Call, who said that "as long as things are moving forward," Frist is unlikely to make any decisions about floor proceedings.

GOP sources indicated that little progress was expected given the heightened rhetoric emanating from the Bush administration over the weekend.

In fact, Warner spokesman John Ullyot said Warner and the White House had no scheduled meetings on the detainee issue.

"He remains interested in talking with the administration, but nothing is scheduled right now," Ullyot said. Still, Ullyot noted that the "Senators on the committee feel very strongly about their position."

Senate Democrats, meanwhile, will continue to focus heavily on national security issues as well, with the minority scheduled to do press events today and Wednesday focused on the issue.

Talking points distributed to Democratic offices for this week largely reflect the party's months-long effort to portray the GOP as ineffective on national security and to tar House and Senate Republicans with Bush's low approval ratings.

Democrats argued they have established a strong footing in the minds of the public on national security issues over the past several months and said the issue will remain a central component of their messaging work even as lawmakers turn to more domestic concerns as the election approaches.

Attorney General Gonzales Defends Interrogation Methods, Says Geneva Conventions Too Vague (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0065213

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Monday defended the Bush administration's strategy for interrogating terror suspects, calling it legal and critical to "continue gathering information about our enemies."

In a speech, Gonzales said CIA interrogators lack guidance on how to comply with the international Geneva Conventions, saying the provisions banning "humiliating and degrading treatment" and "outrages upon personal dignity" are too vague.

"Such phrases standing alone mean different things to Americans," he said at a conference on citizenship. "Think of the differences in interpretation that will exist between differing legal systems and cultures of the nations of the world."

"Seeking this clarity is important to our efforts to continue gathering information about our enemies," Gonzales said. "In all that we do in the war on terror, we seek to promote the rule of law and protect freedom."

Trying to end a protest by dissident Senate Republicans, the White House says it's confident it can reach a compromise on proposed rules for interrogating terror suspects.

But neither side is saying how an agreement can be achieved on whether to allow highly controversial methods by the CIA, such as electric shock, forced nakedness and waterboarding, in which a subject is made to think he is drowning. The Bush administration says those techniques have foiled terror plots. Opponents say they verge on torture.

The full Senate was expected to take up the issue as early as this week.

"The reason we have this program is these kind of hard-core terrorists who are most likely to have information to allow us to protect America are trained in counterinterrogation techniques," Stephen Hadley, President Bush's national security adviser, said Sunday.

"It was only when they went into this CIA program we were able to get information," he said. "This is not torture. This is not a program out of control. This is a program that is conducted pursuant to law."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of the Republicans not satisfied with the White House proposal, said he was committed to working out a deal but insisted that the United States must hold the moral high ground.

"They are people that when they are in our custody, they deserve nothing except the fundamental rights that all prisoners have under the Geneva Conventions," said McCain, a former prisoner of war. "We should not do things which would be condemned by everyone in the world."

First lady Laura Bush, in New York for an international literacy conference, said Monday she was confident that her husband and congressional Republicans would "come to some consensus" on the legislation. Bush was not upset, she said, when McCain and two other Senate Republicans broke with the administration last week over the detainee interrogation bill.

"He knows these men very well, obviously," Mrs. Bush said in an interview on NBC's "Today" show. "He knows what their issues are... Obviously he thinks it's very important to be able to interrogate in a way that's not demeaning."

The Supreme Court in June ruled the Geneva Conventions on the rights of wartime detainees should apply to suspected terrorists in CIA custody. The decision froze the interrogations and led the Bush administration to turn over the last 14 prisoners in CIA custody to military officials at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

At issue is Common Article 3 of the conventions, which ban in part inhuman treatment of captives as well as "outrages upon personal dignity."

Legal experts say that under international law, the provision would likely bar the CIA's more aggressive tactics. Bush contends it is too vague. He wants a narrower interpretation that would permit the program to continue and shield CIA interrogators from lawsuits.

McCain, as well as Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner, R-Va., and Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., say that would redefine the broader legal understanding of the conventions in the international community.

Their Senate proposal is silent as to what types of CIA tactics might be permissible under the broader conception of Article 3.

On Sunday, Bush's national intelligence director, John Negroponte, said that after the Supreme Court ruling, the aggressive interrogation program has had "precious little activity of that kind for a number of months now" because of questions about its legality.

DOJ_NMG_0065214

Hadley declined to say what specific techniques, such as waterboarding or prolonged sleep deprivation, would likely be considered illegal if Congress doesn't pass Bush's proposal.

But he said the CIA program would suffer and be shut down if interrogators do not have guidance. He said the White House is working on a compromise that "achieves Senator McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change" the Geneva Conventions.

Hadley appeared on ABC's "This Week," CBS' "Face the Nation" and CNN's "Late Edition." Negroponte was on "Fox News Sunday," McCain on ABC and Graham on CBS.

Support U.S. Intelligence (USAT)

By John D. Negroponte

USA Today, September 19, 2006

One critical way to help prevent terrorist attacks against Americans is interrogating key al-Qaeda leaders and operatives. The Bush administration has proposed a bill that would allow the CIA to conduct such interrogations — interrogations that have helped stop terrorist attacks — in a way that gives our personnel clear legal standards.

The simple question, therefore, is whether we will allow intelligence professionals on the front lines to keep using a tool that has saved American lives.

The current debate centers on legal questions concerning Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. In June, the Supreme Court determined that Common Article 3 applies to al-Qaeda terrorists.

The administration is committed to complying with the law of the land, and we must ensure our laws provide clarity on the vague standards contained in Common Article 3, such as “outrages upon personal dignity.” Thus, the president has asked that Congress clarify our treaty obligations just as it has done on many other occasions. Absent such clarification, our intelligence professionals would be subject to unpredictable legal interpretations, including those of foreign courts. This vital program cannot go forward unless the law is clarified.

The administration's proposal would not redefine Common Article 3. It would provide clarity by mirroring language written by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and passed by Congress less than a year ago as part of the Detainee Treatment Act.

Under this approach, our intelligence professionals would know what they can and can't do because the standard would be one that is well established in U.S. law as determined by U.S. courts.

Clarifying our laws would not jeopardize our troops. Lawful combatants such as U.S. soldiers would continue to be fully protected by all aspects of the Geneva Conventions. Nothing in the administration's proposal in any way would undercut these fundamental protections. The issue we are debating is the standard of treatment for unlawful combatants — those who hide among civilian populations and plot attacks on innocents.

The CIA needs to interrogate al-Qaeda operatives to gather intelligence where traditional questioning tactics do not work. The program has in the past helped us foil several publicly disclosed plots, including attacks on tall buildings in the USA, a U.S. Marine base in East Africa, the American consulate in Pakistan and Britain's Heathrow Airport.

Once intelligence has been obtained, terrorists can be brought to justice. The administration's proposal would provide for the trial of terrorists in a way that ensures that sensitive intelligence sources and methods — which must remain secret to be effective against other terrorists in the future — are not provided to the terrorists themselves.

As President Bush reminded the nation, it is “vital that our folks on the front line have the tools necessary to protect the American people.” We are prepared to work with Congress to ensure this remains the case.

Bush Detainee Plan Adds To World Doubts Of U.S., Powell Says (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Ex-Secretary of State Defends Conventions

Former secretary of state Colin L. Powell said yesterday that he decided to publicly oppose the Bush administration's proposed rules for the treatment of terrorism suspects in part because the plan would add to growing doubts about whether the United States adheres to its own moral code.

"If you just look at how we are perceived in the world and the kind of criticism we have taken over Guantanamo, Abu Ghraib and renditions," Powell said in an interview, "whether we believe it or not, people are now starting to question whether we're following our own high standards."

Powell, elaborating on a position first expressed last week in a letter to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), also argued that the administration's plan to "clarify" U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions would set a precedent for other nations that would endanger U.S. troops.

"Suppose North Korea or somebody else wants to redefine or 'clarify' " Geneva Conventions provisions prohibiting "outrages against personal dignity" and "humiliating and degrading treatment" of prisoners, he said.

Powell's opposition marks a rare public breach with the administration he left 20 months ago. As secretary of state, he repeatedly clashed privately with Vice President Cheney and others who had more hard-line foreign policy views. But since leaving office he has declined nearly all opportunities to publicly criticize even those policies he opposed internally.

Powell has said he regrets that the Iraq invasion was launched on the basis of false intelligence about Saddam Hussein's weapons programs and Hussein's relationship with al-Qaeda, information that he vouched for in an address before a hostile United Nations. He has also said that he believes the administration should have sent more troops to invade Iraq and provided a better postwar plan.

Powell also allowed his name to be identified among those opposed to Bush's nomination of his former State Department subordinate, John R. Bolton, as Washington's U.N. ambassador.

But he has reserved his strongest opposition for administration efforts to preserve controversial methods for interrogating terrorism suspects, techniques that others have defined as torture. While it is not clear exactly what techniques the White House wishes to keep, sources have said those previously used include nakedness, prolonged sensory assault and deprivation, the imposition of "stress" positions, and water submersion to the verge of drowning. Bush has said none of those amounts to torture.

Powell strenuously objected to Bush's February 2002 decision that the United States was not obliged to adhere to Geneva Conventions rules in its treatment of captured al-Qaeda and Taliban prisoners. Subsequent scandals over military treatment of prisoners at the U.S. facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and at Abu Ghraib in Iraq, and over the CIA's establishment of secret prisons abroad, further cemented his views that the decision was unnecessary in terms of prisoner interrogation and is harmful to the armed forces.

Last fall, over administration opposition, Powell publicly supported McCain's successful effort to ensure that restrictions in the Army Field Manual outlawing torture be adopted as the definitive guidance for military treatment of detainees. His position owed as much to his 35 years as an Army officer as to his tenure as the nation's chief diplomat.

The current dispute is over how the provisions of Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions against inhumane and degrading treatment bind the CIA and other non-military interrogators.

The administration has argued that the article is too vague and ties the CIA's hands in extracting crucial information from terrorists. Last week, Powell joined dozens of other retired military officers and former government officials in objecting to proposed administration legislation "clarifying" the article to ensure that certain unspecified interrogation methods can continue.

In his letter to McCain, Powell said the effort to "redefine" the article was "inconsistent" with his previous opposition to the use of torture. "The world," he wrote, "is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." On Friday, the Senate Armed Services Committee voted 15 to 9 to endorse an alternative bill offered by McCain, Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.).

Bush aides said they appreciated that Powell did not make the matter personal or engage in cutting rhetoric. But the White House did not hesitate to push back strongly, even at the risk of further alienating Powell. White House spokesman Tony Snow said last Thursday that Powell was "confused" about the administration's proposal. The president followed up the next day with a stern reaction at a Rose Garden news conference, when he reinterpreted Powell's position to suggest that the former secretary of state was equating U.S. tactics to those of terrorists.

Powell declined yesterday to address Bush's comments. "To say that we want to modify, clarify or redefine Common Article 3, which has not been modified for the 57 years of its history, I think adds to the doubt" about U.S. morality, he said. "Plus I believe that the legitimate concerns that the administration has can be dealt with in other ways."

Yesterday, another prominent Republican weighed in. In a statement released by his office in California, former secretary of state George P. Shultz said he believes that a compromise can be reached that "leaves the Geneva Convention alone and achieves the specificity that the administration wants."

Meanwhile, former president Jimmy Carter, a leading voice on human rights, said yesterday that he is "filled with admiration" for McCain, Powell and others who have joined in opposition.

Experts Say Bush's Goal In Terrorism Bill Is Latitude For Interrogators' Methods (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 18 — In his showdown with rebellious Senate Republicans over bills to bring terrorism suspects to trial, President Bush has repeatedly called for clarity in the rules for what he calls "alternative interrogation techniques" used by the Central Intelligence Agency.

What Mr. Bush really wants, legal experts on both sides of the debate say, is latitude so the interrogators can use methods that the military is barred from using under a recently issued Army field manual.

Despite his call for clarity, the president has been vague in talking about the alternatives, which have in the past included sleep deprivation, playing ear-splittingly loud music and waterboarding, which induces a feeling of drowning.

"They can't come out and say we want more leeway to rough these people up," said John Radsan, who was assistant general counsel for the intelligence agency from 2002 to 2004 and now teaches at the William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul. "That doesn't sell. So he says we need clarity. It doesn't play well to say we need to deprive them of sleep and play loud music."

On Monday, the Bush administration appeared to make the first stab at compromise, telling senators, including John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and who is leading the opposition to the president's plan, to expect a counterproposal.

White House officials would not release details of the administration's new proposal, except to say late Monday night that it involved the part of the Geneva Conventions known as Common Article 3.

At the same time, the House decided to postpone its vote on Mr. Bush's proposal until at least next week. That was a setback for the White House, which had been counting on the House to pass the measure this week, a step that it hoped would prod the Senate into action before lawmakers break at the end of the month for the midterm elections.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that Common Article 3, which legal experts agree would prohibit the intelligence agency's techniques, applies to the treatment of terrorism suspects.

So the White House wants Congress to pass measures redefining Article 3 to say it bars "cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment," language that the administration borrowed from a bill written by Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who was tortured while a prisoner in the Vietnam War.

"The president is advocating a standard that prohibits cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment, a standard based on years of U.S. Court decisions interpreting the constitutional prohibitions on cruel and unusual punishment that protect U.S. citizens in custody," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said Monday in a speech at a conference on citizenship. "Seeking this clarity is important to our efforts to continue gathering information about our enemies."

Some Senate Republicans, including Mr. Warner and Mr. McCain, are pushing back. They say redefining Article 3 would send a message that the United States was not serious about living up to the Geneva Conventions, a view shared by former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, and are pressing an alternative bill.

Part of the dispute revolves around protection for military and intelligence agency interrogators. The White House says Article 3 is too vague and leaves interrogators open to being sued.

The senators do not disagree. But they propose to clarify Article 3 by amending the War Crimes Act to specify exactly what abuses of the article constitute war crimes.

Jeffrey H. Smith, a general counsel for the intelligence agency under President Bill Clinton, said that the language in the Senate bill would not bar the controversial techniques, but that the White House bill appeared to give the agency greater latitude.

"The senators seem to be prepared to allow some techniques, but not nearly as many as the administration wants," Mr. Smith said.

Since his speech nearly two weeks ago announcing that he was transferring 14 prominent terrorism suspects, including the reported mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, to the detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, Mr. Bush has said the previously secret program under which they were interrogated was invaluable in thwarting terrorism plots.

The president has said he will have no choice but to stop the program if Congress does not pass his bill.

The legislation does not explicitly state what the permissible techniques are, and the president and White House officials, including Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the intelligence agency, have steadfastly refused to discuss them.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, has been repeatedly asked about waterboarding, for example, and whether Mr. Bush has ruled it out.

"I'm not going to go into what's ruled in and ruled out," Mr. Snow told reporters last week, saying to do so would tip the interrogators' hand with suspects.

In a setback for the White House, the top uniformed lawyer for the Army has now told Mr. Warner that he prefers the Senate approach. The lawyer, Maj. Gen. Scott C. Black, joined military lawyers last week in a letter saying he did not object to the administration bill.

But on Friday, General Black sent a second letter to Mr. Warner in which he said that the Senate bill was preferable and that "further redefinition of Common Article 3 is unnecessary and could be seen as a weakening of our treaty obligations."

Whether the two sides can reach an agreement is unclear. Mr. Warner and another rebelling Republican senator, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, spoke to reporters late Monday, saying the two sides were exchanging, in Mr. Warner's words, "ideas and words here and there."

Mr. Graham said the real work toward compromise started on Sunday, after appearances on Sunday by senators and administration officials on televised news and interview programs.

Mr. Graham said, "Everybody felt like what we were telling each other is: 'We share the same goals. We have a different way of achieving them. Let's see if we can write the legislation to meet our goals.' "

Torture Is Torture (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Bush's 'Program' Disgraces All Americans

I wish I could turn to cheerier matters, but I just can't get past this torture issue -- the fact that George W. Bush, the president of the United States of America, persists in demanding that Congress give him the right to torture anyone he considers a "high-value" terrorist suspect. The president of the United States. Interrogation by torture. This just can't be happening.

It's past time to stop mincing words. The Decider, or maybe we should now call him the Inquisitor, sticks to anodyne euphemisms. He speaks of "alternative" questioning techniques, and his umbrella term for the whole shop of horrors is "the program." Of course, he won't fully detail the methods that were used in the secret CIA prisons -- and who knows where else? -- but various sources have said they have included not just the infamous "waterboarding," which the administration apparently will reluctantly forswear, but also sleep deprivation, exposure to cold, bombardment with ear-splitting noise and other assaults that cause not just mental duress but physical agony. That is torture, and to call it anything else is a lie.

It is not possible for our elected representatives to hold any sort of honorable "debate" over torture. Bush says he is waging a "struggle for civilization," but civilized nations do not debate slavery or genocide, and they don't debate torture, either. This spectacle insults and dishonors every American.

There is one ray of encouragement: the crystal-clear evidence that the men and women of our armed forces want no part of torturing anybody. The members of the Republican resistance -- Sens. John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina -- have impeccable Pentagon connections and are not operating in a vacuum. Bush admitted in his news conference Friday that he had spoken to "the professionals" and that they would not carry out "the program" unless Congress specifically told them to.

In support of its torture bill, all the White House could manage to squeeze out of five top Pentagon lawyers was a four-sentence letter of non-objection that had all the enthusiasm of a hostage tape.

Colin Powell's strongly worded rejection of torture should have embarrassed and chastened the White House, but this is a president who refuses to listen to critics of his "war on terrorism" -- even critics who helped design and lead it.

There should be no need to spell out the practical reasons against torture, but, for the record, they are legion. As Powell and others have argued, if the United States unilaterally reinterprets Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions to permit torture, potential adversaries in future conflicts will feel justified in doing the same thing. Does the president want some captured pilot to be subjected to the tortures applied in the CIA prisons?

And, as has been pointed out by experts, torture works -- far too well. Torture victims will tell what they know, and when their knowledge is exhausted they will tell their torturers what they want to hear, even if they have to invent conspiracies. The president says that torturing al-Qaeda kingpins foiled serious plots against America, but how do we know those plots were real? How can we be sure that some of the detainees at Guantanamo aren't shopkeepers or taxi drivers who were snatched because Khalid Sheik Mohammed ran out of real terrorists to implicate and began naming acquaintances so he wouldn't get waterboarded again?

But we shouldn't have to talk about the practicalities of torture, because the real question is moral: What kind of nation are we? What kind of people are we?

Bush's view of the world is based on the idea of American exceptionalism: that this country is unique, that its ideas and values are not just worthy or admirable but superior to any others. This attitude annoys the rest of the world to no end -- a lot of other countries think they're pretty special, too -- but accept for the moment that the American system is in fact the best of all systems and that the great experiment begun by the Founding Fathers was a signal event in the history of mankind. Accept, if you will, Bush's view that the United States is steadfastly blessed by a loving God.

What do you imagine God might think about torture, Mr. President?

FBI Agent: Informant Was Convicted In DMV Fraud Case (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, September 19, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) _ The informant who posed as an arms dealer in the FBI sting that led to terrorism charges against two Albany Muslims was arrested in 2001 for helping immigrants fraudulently obtain drivers' licenses, an FBI agent testified Monday.

"He was not truthful at all," special agent Timothy Coll acknowledged of Shahed Hussain in the document fraud. Coll arrested the Pakistani emigre, whom he called "Malik" and who subsequently agreed to cooperate with the FBI.

He is central to the case against Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain, both accused of laundering $50,000 that Malik claimed came from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile to terrorists. Defense lawyers say he lied to the FBI about their clients, who thought he was joking about a terrorist plot.

He is expected to testify later this week, and his credibility is a key question for jurors. Coll testified Monday that Malik's cooperation agreement required him to be truthful from the time he signed it.

Malik first helped the FBI with the document case, which resulted in his identifying two state Department of Motor Vehicles employees he bribed in Albany and the suspension of 80 drivers' licenses, Coll said.

Under his guilty plea in 2003 to one federal charge of attempted unlawful transfer of an identification document, he could face up to 15 years in prison and a $250,000 fine at sentencing Oct. 27, court papers show. As a non-citizen, he could also face deportation.

DOJ_NMG_0065219

A contract translator for the DMV in 2001, Malik had answered the written permit tests for a fee, and in one case arranged for a DMV clerk to issue an interim license under a false name, Coll said. He received $300 to $500 for the usual permit/license package, depending on factors like the number of times a road test applicant hit the curb.

"They hit the curb often," Coll said, and several people in the courtroom laughed.

Coll also acknowledged under cross-examination by defense attorney Kent Sprotbery that Malik has received almost $37,000 for relocation, office rent and cell phone expenses from the FBI in the two cases. Coll has not yet finished his reports to the sentencing judge and immigration officials about the informant's help, he said.

The FBI agent said Malik's "story" to Aref and Hossain was that he was doing a "substantial" import-export business, while in fact he owned a gas station near the Albany office of the DMV and had a small import-export business.

Coll acknowledged that Malik's first mention of a part-time business as an arms dealer came up with Hossain and Aref only later. He also said more than 90 percent of the three men's meetings were taped, though some were not, that many parts had to be translated, and he sometimes had to listen several times to decipher the English.

Aref, 36, and Hossain, 51, maintain their transaction was a simple loan from Malik to Hossain, common under Islamic law and custom, where Aref acted as witness and insisted on writing receipts.

Details About Informant In Aref And Hossain Trial (CAPN9)

Capital News 9, September 19, 2006

A big day for the defense, as it tried to poke holes in the investigation that led to Mohammed Hossain and Yassin Aref facing terrorism-related charges of money laundering.

The FBI agent who oversaw the sting operation, Timothy Coll, testified about how credible the informant, known as "Malik," was as he tried to act as an arms importer.

Defense teams spent hours pointing out that "Malik" had not only been arrested for fraud, but that the F-B-I agent had to rely on some of the information which he provided.

Coll admitted Malik's reports had some inconsistencies, and also said the informant made decent money for cooperating with the government. Malik's cell phone bills were also covered, $1,900 worth of charges that included his own personal usage.

Jurors hear more testimony

Testimony continued Monday in the trial of two Albany mosque leaders accused of supporting terrorism.

The informant was tasked with catching the defendants laundering money for the purchase of a missile. The defense has tried to show that he was not very clear in his dealings with Aref and Hossain. In court today, jurors saw a video clip from January 2, 2004 that featured the following conversation:

Informant: This is the part of the missile that I showed you.

Hossain: Oh yeah?

Informant: So as soon as it comes. I'll give you...this is $5,000. Over the next couple of weeks, I'll get you more money.

Hossain: I don't need that all...just so I can pay the bills.

During that conversation, Malik held up a trigger for the fake missile system. But Aref, who was also sitting there, may never have seen it, because he was counting the money at the time. Did both defendants know the sting operation, if real, would have resulted in the sale of a missile to terrorists? In another video clip dated December 5, 2003, Malik told Hossain:

Informant: Whatever I'm doing, I'm not doing anything wrong nor am I breaking any law. I do not sell any weapons that could cause a man to be killed.

Hossain: This is good. What you're saying now is good.

All of this has left the jury with some very complicated questions, including some over the credibility of the government's cooperating witness.

Plots Traced To Prison (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, September 19, 2006

Concern grows over signs that recent terror plans were hatched among converts to Islam doing hard time

WASHINGTON - The terror plots unfolded on different sides of the Atlantic, with different targets and casts of characters. But they had one thing in common: They traced back to jailhouse conversions to radical Islam.

The four young men indicted in California last summer in connection with an alleged plot to attack National Guard facilities, the Israeli consulate and several synagogues around Los Angeles, had hatched the plan in New Folsom State Prison outside Sacramento.

Muktar Said Ibrahim, who had converted to Islam in a British prison, was also arrested last summer, in connection with a bomb left on a London bus.

Convicted shoe-bomber Richard Reid, who had once been held in the same youth facility as Ibrahim and who was also a jailhouse convert, attempted to blow up an American Airlines flight from Paris to Miami in December 2001.

With concerns about homegrown terrorism mounting, a panel of homeland security experts planned today to warn of the potential threat posed by prison converts to radical Islam, and ask Congress to set up a commission to investigate the matter. Two congressional committees are holding hearings on the issue this week.

"Prisoner radicalization is a potentially significant threat to U.S. national security," said the head of the panel, Frank Cilluffo, director of the Homeland Secu- rity Policy Institute at George Washington University in Washington, D.C. "The U.S., with its large prison population, is at risk of facing the sort of homegrown terrorism currently plaguing other countries."

Most troubling, Cilluffo said, is "we don't know what we don't know. We need to be proactive. We need to get people in there who can be part of the solution. ... We don't want to be doing a report after an attack."

An estimated 6 percent of 150,000 federal prison inmates are Muslim. No nationwide figures on Muslims in state prisons exist, but experts say the largest number are in New York, where they make up about 18 percent of 63,700 state inmates.

The chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee said he welcomed the group's proposal. "It's a very real problem in California and New York," said Rep. Peter King (R-Seaford). "I know of several radical mosques in New York that hire these guys after they get out of prison." He did not name the mosques.

Civil rights advocate Ibrahim Hooper of the Council on American-Islamic Relations said his group would support such a probe "as long as it's examined by neutral parties who aren't basing their judgments on stereotypes."

For decades, Islam has been a regular part of prison culture, with tens of thousands of Muslims practicing their faith behind bars. But since the 2002 arrest of Jose Padilla, a felon and American Muslim convert who authorities say planned a "dirty bom b" after he left jail, officials have warned that prisons are a "fertile ground for extremists" in the words of FBI Director Robert Mueller.

A report prepared by Cilluffo's group and The Critical Incident Analysis Group at the University of Virginia School of Medicine, acknowledges that the problem is not new, or unique to Islam. Right-wing groups connected with "Christian Identity" ideology, including Posse Comitatus and Aryan Nation, have long existed in prisons.

Most prison converts are not potential extremists, the report notes. But it said that some gangs have adopted a "jailhouse Islam," that incorporates "cut-and-paste versions of Islam" with gang loyalty and violence. And it stressed that even "a single radicalized inmate can be a significant threat."

It quotes California officials as saying that every investigation into radical prison groups had uncovered new leads, "but they simply do not have enough investigators to follow every case of radicalization."

The report also cited indications that terrorist groups are increasingly exploiting drug trafficking and other illegal activi ties to finance their operations. The attack on the Madrid rail system, for instance, involved cooperation between terrorists and gan gs. And the alleged California plot was uncovered after police made arrests in a series of gas station robberies orchestrated to help finance the attacks.

Canadians Fault U.S. For Its Role In Torture Case (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065221

OTTAWA, Sept. 18 — A government commission on Monday exonerated a Canadian computer engineer of any ties to terrorism and issued a scathing report that faulted Canada and the United States for his deportation four years ago to Syria, where he was imprisoned and tortured.

The report on the engineer, Maher Arar, said American officials had apparently acted on inaccurate information from Canadian investigators and then misled Canadian authorities about their plans for Mr. Arar before transporting him to Syria.

"I am able to say categorically that there is no evidence to indicate that Mr. Arar has committed any offense or that his activities constituted a threat to the security of Canada," Justice Dennis R. O'Connor, head of the commission, said at a news conference.

The report's findings could reverberate heavily through the leadership of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which handled the initial intelligence on Mr. Arar that led security officials in both Canada and the United States to assume he was a suspected Al Qaeda terrorist.

The report's criticisms and recommendations are aimed primarily at Canada's own government and activities, rather than the United States government, which refused to cooperate in the inquiry. But its conclusions about a case that had emerged as one of the most infamous examples of rendition — the transfer of terrorism suspects to other nations for interrogation — draw new attention to the Bush administration's handling of detainees. And it comes as the White House and Congress are contesting legislation that would set standards for the treatment and interrogation of prisoners.

"The American authorities who handled Mr. Arar's case treated Mr. Arar in a most regrettable fashion," Justice O'Connor wrote in a three-volume report, not all of which was made public. "They removed him to Syria against his wishes and in the face of his statements that he would be tortured if sent there. Moreover, they dealt with Canadian officials involved with Mr. Arar's case in a less than forthcoming manner."

A spokesman for the United States Justice Department, Charles Miller, and a White House spokesman traveling with President Bush in New York said officials had not seen the report and could not comment.

Canada's prime minister, Stephen Harper, said his government planned to act on the report but offered no details. "Probably in the few weeks to come we'll be able to give you more details on that,'' he told reporters. The Syrian-born Mr. Arar was seized on Sept. 26, 2002, after he landed at Kennedy Airport in New York on his way home from a holiday in Tunisia. On Oct. 8, he was flown to Jordan in an American government plane and taken overland to Syria, where he says he was held for 10 months in a tiny cell and beaten repeatedly with a metal cable. He was freed in October 2003, after Syrian officials concluded that he had no connection to terrorism and returned him to Canada.

Mr. Arar's case attracted considerable attention in Canada, where critics viewed it as an example of the excesses of the campaign against terror that followed the Sept. 11 attacks. The practice of rendition has caused an outcry from human rights organizations as "outsourcing torture," because suspects often have been taken to countries where brutal treatment of prisoners is routine.

The commission supports that view, describing a Mounted Police force that was ill-prepared to assume the intelligence duties assigned to it after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Mr. Arar, speaking at a news conference, praised the findings.

"Today Justice O'Connor has cleared my name and restored my reputation," said Mr. Arar, who has been unemployed since his return to Canada in 2003. "I call on the government of Canada to accept the findings of this report and hold these people responsible."

His lawyer, Marlys Edwardh, said the report affirmed that Mr. Arar was deported and tortured because of "a breathtakingly incompetent investigation."

The commission found that Mr. Arar first came to police attention on Oct. 12, 2001, when he met with Abdullah Almalki, a man already under surveillance by a newly established Mounted Police intelligence unit known as Project A-O Canada. Mr. Arar has said in interviews that the meeting at Mango's Cafe in Ottawa, and a subsequent 20-minute conversation outside the restaurant, was mostly about finding inexpensive ink jet printer cartridges.

The meeting set off a chain of actions by the police.

Investigators obtained a copy of Mr. Arar's rental lease. After finding Mr. Almalki listed as an emergency contact, they stepped up their investigation of Mr. Arar.

At the end of that month, the police asked customs officials to include Mr. Arar and his wife on a "terrorist lookout" list, which would subject them to more intensive question when re-entering Canada.

However, the commission found that the designation should have only been applied to people who are members or associates of terrorist networks. Neither the police nor customs had any such evidence of that concerning Mr. Arar or his wife, an economist.

From there, the Mounted Police asked that the couple be included in a database that alerts United States border officers to suspect individuals. The police described Mr. Arar and his wife as, the report said, "Islamic extremists suspected of being linked to the al Qaeda movement."

The commission said that all who testified before it accepted that the description was false.

According to the inquiry's finding, the Mounted Police gave the F.B.I. and other American authorities material from Project A-O Canada, which included suggestions that Mr. Arar had visited Washington around Sept. 11 and had refused to cooperate with the Canadian police. The handover of the data violated the force's own guidelines, but was justified on the basis that such rules no longer applied after 2001.

In July 2002, the Mounted Police learned that Mr. Arar and his family were in Tunisia, and incorrectly concluded that they had left Canada permanently.

On Sept. 26, 2002, the F.B.I. called Project A-O and told the Canadian police that Mr. Arar was scheduled to arrive in about one hour from Zurich. The F.B.I. also said it planned to question Mr. Arar and then send him back to Switzerland. Responding to a fax from the F.B.I., the Mounted Police provided the American investigators with a list of questions for Mr. Arar. Like the other information, it included many false claims about Mr. Arar, the commission found.

The Canadian police "had no idea of what would eventually transpire,'' the commission said. "It did not occur to them that the American authorities were contemplating sending Mr. Arar to Syria."

While the F.B.I. and the Mounted Police kept up their communications about Mr. Arar, Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs was not told about his detention for almost three days. Its officials, acting on calls from worried relatives, had been trying to find him. Similarly, American officials denied Mr. Arar's requests to speak with the Canadian Consulate in New York, a violation of international agreements.

Evidence presented to the commission, said Paul J. J. Cavalluzzo, its lead counsel, showed that the F.B.I. continued to keep its Canadian counterparts in the dark even while an American jet was carrying Mr. Arar to Jordan.

The panel found that American officials "believed — quite correctly — that, if informed, the Canadians would have serious concerns about the plan to remove Mr. Arar to Syria."

Mr. Arar arrived in Syria on Oct. 9, 2002, and was imprisoned there until Oct. 5, 2003. It took Canadian officials, however, until Oct. 21 to locate him in Syria. The commission concludes that Syrian officials at first denied knowing Mr. Arar's whereabouts to hide the fact that he was being tortured. It says that, among other things, he was beaten with a shredded electrical cable until he was disoriented.

American officials have not discussed the case publicly. But in an interview last year, a former official said on condition of anonymity that the decision to send Mr. Arar to Syria had been based chiefly on the desire to get more information about him and the threat he might pose. The official said Canada did not intend to hold him if he returned home.

Mr. Arar said he appealed a recent decision by a federal judge in New York dismissing the suit he brought against the United States. The report recommends that the Canadian government, which is also being sued by Mr. Arar, offer him compensation and possibly a job.

Mr. Arar recently moved to Kamloops, British Columbia, where his wife found a teaching position.

Muslim Held by U.S. Was Sent to Syria For Interrogation

TORONTO, Sept. 18 -- Canadian intelligence officials passed false warnings and bad information to American agents about a Muslim Canadian citizen, after which U.S. authorities secretly whisked him to Syria, where he was tortured, a judicial report found Monday.

The report, released in Ottawa, was the result of a 2 1/2-year inquiry that represented one of the first public investigations into mistakes made as part of the United States' "extraordinary rendition" program, which has secretly spirited suspects to foreign countries for interrogation by often brutal methods.

The inquiry, which focused on the Canadian intelligence services, found that agents who were under pressure to find terrorists after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, falsely labeled an Ottawa computer consultant, Maher Arar, as a dangerous radical. They asked U.S. authorities to put him and his wife, a university economist, on the al-Qaeda "watchlist," without justification, the report said.

Arar was also listed as "an Islamic extremist individual" who was in the Washington area on Sept. 11. The report concluded that he had no involvement in Islamic extremism and was on business in San Diego that day, said the head of the inquiry commission, Ontario Justice Dennis O'Connor.

Arar, now 36, was detained by U.S. authorities as he changed planes in New York on Sept. 26, 2002. He was held for questioning for 12 days, then flown by jet to Jordan and driven to Syria. He was beaten, forced to confess to having trained in Afghanistan -- where he never has been -- and then kept in a coffin-size dungeon for 10 months before he was released, the Canadian inquiry commission found.

O'Connor concluded that "categorically there is no evidence" that Arar did anything wrong or was a security threat.

Although the report centered on Canadian actions, the counsel for the commission, Paul Cavalluzzo, said the results show that the U.S. practice of renditions "ought to be reviewed."

"This is really the first report in the Western world that has had access to all of the government documents we wanted and saw the practice of extraordinary rendition in full color," he said in an interview from Ottawa. "The ramifications were that an innocent Canadian was tortured, his life was put upside down, and it set him back years and years."

Arar, who came to Canada from Syria when he was 17, said in Ottawa that he was thankful that he had been vindicated. He expressed surprise and anger at learning Monday that Canadian authorities also had asked U.S. authorities to put his wife on the al-Qaeda watchlist.

"Today Justice O'Connor has cleared my name and restored my reputation," he said at a news conference. He said the individual Canadian officials should be held accountable: "Justice requires no less."

O'Connor said it was beyond his mandate to recommend discipline for any individual.

"He really is a victim of authorities in three governments, as well as being an innocent man," Irwin Cotler, a member of parliament from the Liberal Party, said after the report was issued.

Stockwell Day, the federal government's public safety minister, said the treatment of Arar was "regrettable. We hope, with any future situations, never to see this happen again."

Since Sept. 11, the CIA, working with other intelligence agencies, has captured an estimated 3,000 people in its effort to dismantle terrorist networks. Many of them have been secretly taken by "extraordinary rendition" to other countries, hidden from U.S. legal requirements and often subject to torture.

Those renditions are often carried out by CIA agents dressed head to toe in black, wearing masks, who blindfold their subjects and dress them in black. The practice is generating increased opposition by other countries; Italy is seeking to prosecute CIA officers who allegedly abducted a Muslim cleric in Milan in February 2003, and German prosecutors are investigating the CIA's activities in their country.

Although details of the renditions and the destinations of those held are secret, President Bush has confirmed the existence of CIA-run prisons throughout the world. Some of the subjects of renditions have been held in those prisons.

O'Connor also recommended that the government review the case of three other Muslim Canadian citizens, who were detained when they traveled through Syria, to determine what role Canadian authorities played in their imprisonment.

But it was the case of Arar, a reserved, soft-spoken father of two, that created outrage in Canada after he returned in 2003 and said he wanted the public to know what had happened to him.

The report said agents of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police "overstated" Arar's importance in the broad investigation they began of potential Canadian suspects after Sept. 11.

Canadian police opened a file on Arar after seeing him talking to two other Muslim Canadians they were watching, authorities have acknowledged. Arar insisted the men were casual acquaintances in the small Muslim community in Montreal, where he lived before moving to British Columbia.

O'Connor said Monday that police agents told the Americans that Arar was "suspected of being linked to the al Qaeda movement." The judge concluded: "The RCMP had no basis for this description."

The Mounties also falsely claimed Arar had refused to be interviewed and had "suddenly" left for Tunisia. It listed him as a business associate of another man they called a "Bin Laden associate." Those descriptions were "either completely inaccurate" or overstated his casual connections, O'Connor said in an 822-page, three-volume report.

That information "very likely" led to his rendition, the report said. U.S. officials refused to cooperate with the Canadian inquiry.

Cavalluzzo said the Canadian agents apparently operated without proper training. "The best one can say is that it was sheer incompetence. They did not appreciate the fact that the branding of someone as a 'target' or 'suspect' or 'Islamic extremist' to Americans in 2002 could lead to disastrous consequences."

After Arar was detained in New York, Canadian authorities apparently were unaware the Americans were preparing to send him to Syria, according to the commission finding.

The RCMP contact, Inspector Michel Cabana, "was under the impression that Mr. Arar would only be detained for a short time," O'Connor's report said. "In his view, Mr. Arar was being held in a country with many of the same values as Canada."

Arar filed a lawsuit in U.S. federal court, but the case was dismissed by a judge citing "national security" issues. Arar is also seeking compensation from the Canadian government.

Some crucial questions about the incident remain unanswered, at least publicly. Over the repeated objections of O'Connor, the federal government censored much of the testimony given during the proceedings as well as some of the final report. O'Connor's report said a federal court should be asked to decide whether to disclose some of the censored items.

Arar was not permitted to testify; the judge ruled it would be unfair to subject him to questioning based on secret information. He has testified before a European Parliament committee in Brussels.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FEMA Revamp Snubs Homeland Security Chief (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff was dealt a major blow by congressional negotiators' deal to overhaul the Federal Emergency Management Agency, in which lawmakers forced a major reorganization of the sprawling department and unraveled changes he had personally backed.

FEMA would be strengthened and become an independent entity within the Department of Homeland Security under the deal worked out late Friday night between Senate staff and representatives of several House committees. But DHS would be barred from changing FEMA's budget, personnel or structure, giving the agency the same protections currently provided to the U.S. Coast Guard and the Secret Service.

The deal, if approved, would authorize an annual 10% increase of FEMA's $2.4 billion budget for the next three years. It now moves to a House-Senate panel that is hammering out a $34.8 billion bill funding the Homeland Security department for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0065225

Until now, Mr. Chertoff had the authority to move money, people and programs out of FEMA and 19 other agencies in the department to use elsewhere to meet an ever-changing terrorist threat. But critics said that funds taken from FEMA's budget undermined the agency's effectiveness and contributed to the bungled federal response to Hurricane Katrina last year.

Moreover, under the congressional deal, the FEMA administrator -- not the Homeland Security secretary -- would be the principal adviser to the president during an emergency. The structure is modeled after the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

DHS officials fiercely opposed it in part because it would do away with new units created by Mr. Chertoff last year as part of his much touted "Second Stage Review" to improve the department. Of particular concern: The pact would fold the Directorate for Preparedness, headed by DHS Undersecretary George Foresman, into FEMA. The directorate handles all first-responder and homeland-security grant programs and works with state, local and private-sector officials to identify threats and determine vulnerabilities of infrastructure to terrorist attack.

According to Senate negotiators, the deal dissolves the directorate, passing all of its programs -- except for the Office of Infrastructure Protection, the National Communications System and the National Cyber Security Division -- into FEMA.

They said Mr. Chertoff was free to recommend Mr. Foresman for FEMA administrator, or he could become a deputy administrator. Currently, R. David Paulison, a former Miami fire chief, is the FEMA director.

Many observers saw the deal as a setback for Mr. Chertoff, who has come under scrutiny for his handling of the department.

DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said, "We will continue to work with Congress toward a satisfactory outcome."

His ability to change the bill at this point may be severely limited. Congressional staffers from both parties say that with important midterm elections just weeks away no one wants to be accused of moving to undermine the nation's ability to handle a disaster and even White House officials have indicated that they won't oppose the bill.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D., Conn.), who along with Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine) drafted the legislation to overhaul FEMA, praised the deal, saying it will "reverse the department's misguided decision to separate those who are supposed to prepare for disasters from those who are supposed to respond to them."

House, Senate Near Agreement On Homeland-Security Budget (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House-Senate negotiators are nearing agreement on a homeland-security budget that includes $1.82 billion in emergency funds, blessed by the White House to burnish Republican credentials on border security before the fall elections.

Even with the infusion of funds, the $34.8 billion package falls short of what the Senate promised last week for port-security grants. But between $1 billion and $1.2 billion would be provided as a down payment toward fencing the U.S.-Mexico border and about $350 million of the emergency funds are expected to be split among Coast Guard procurement, new customs inspectors and X-ray equipment at ports of entry.

Republican leaders are determined to complete the homeland measure and a larger Pentagon appropriations bill before lawmakers go home at the end of next week to campaign. The defense and homeland bills fit into the Republican national-security theme this fall, and negotiators want to finish the talks this week.

Domestic agencies will have to wait until after the elections before their 2007 funding is resolved, but they will be affected by the defense talks now.

After failing to get a budget for fiscal 2007, which begins Oct. 1, because of disagreements over spending, the majority party and White House are using emergency funds -- counted outside appropriations caps -- to resolve their differences.

The proposed $375.4 billion Pentagon bill, for example, carries with it a "bridge fund" -- ostensibly to fund military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan but also allowing Republicans to borrow about $5.9 billion from President Bush's defense budget to offset cuts in domestic programs.

The House had set aside $50 billion for the bridge fund; the Senate added another $13.1 billion. Negotiators are expected to raise this to at least $70 billion. Access to emergency funds during wartime has made it easier for Republicans to disguise their divisions over domestic spending. But the bridge fund also reflects the stress felt by military services after more than three years in Iraq.

This is especially the case with the Army. To meet this month's payroll, for example, service commanders this summer proposed taking money from maintenance and procurement accounts, including hundreds of millions of dollars Congress had added in the spring to buy radios and trucks to reconstitute units.

The House Appropriations Committee resisted, forcing some changes. Democrats on the panel last week released a staff report detailing the need for more money for the service. In the partisan atmosphere now in Congress, Democrats have tried to make an issue of defense readiness, but the report itself is respected on both sides of the aisle given the history of the defense-appropriations panel.

Among major points, the report found that many Army combat and support units scheduled to deploy to Iraq will have less than the required one-year period for rest and retraining. The report also found that funding shortfalls have created backlogs at all the Army's depot maintenance locations, and 20% to 30% of Army equipment isn't in service, because it is either in transit or undergoing maintenance.

In testimony before Congress, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, argued for more money. The Democratic staff report cites specific cases of delays in maintenance at major facilities.

At Anniston Army Depot in Alabama, for example, the report estimated about 600 M1 tanks sit in disuse. At Red River Army Depot in Texas, 700 Bradley fighting vehicles and more than 450 trucks haven't been serviced.

The problem is often less one of capacity than lack of money to run shifts with the full work hours required. In this fiscal year, for example, the Anniston depot had plans for 7.2 million man-hours of work, the report says. But funding cuts by Congress, the Army and Defense Department limited workload levels to 6.3 million man-hours.

Congress Bustles With Busywork (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

With 10 days left before the scheduled Sept. 29 recess, Congress's much-trumpeted national security agenda is becalmed and awaiting a stiff wind to get it to port. This week, there doesn't even seem to be a gentle breeze on the horizon.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) had hoped to begin work on legislation authorizing military commissions to try terrorism suspects or a bill on President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program. But for the moment, the only bill on military trials that can pass the Senate is the one Bush opposes -- the bill drafted by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) and Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.).

The surveillance bill negotiated by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Vice President Cheney is ready for consideration, but with at least half a dozen Republicans expressing reservations, it may not have the votes for passage.

So while Frist tries to decide between the frying pan and the fire, the Senate will keep busy with consideration of the Oman Free Trade Agreement and the nomination of Alice S. Fisher to serve as assistant attorney general. If those items are dispensed with quickly, the Senate may have to be content with reauthorizing the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and Amtrak.

The situation in the House is only a tad brighter. House leaders had scheduled consideration of Bush's military trials bill for midweek. But the notoriously cantankerous chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), asked for time for his committee to consider it, and GOP leaders relented, pushing back a floor vote at least another week.

Instead, the centerpiece of the House's floor schedule will be a package of immigration and border security bills designed to demonstrate GOP toughness ahead of the election. Never mind that much of the legislation -- three bills in all -- already passed the House in December as part of a broad crackdown on illegal immigration.

The first bill would bolster the secretary of homeland security's authority to detain dangerous illegal immigrants and to clarify the authority of state and local enforcement officers to assist in the enforcement of federal immigration laws. Some police officials in border regions have expressed concern that by deputizing them in the hunt for undocumented workers, the law will jeopardize the relations they have established with immigrant communities on other law enforcement matters. But support in the House for putting the local cop on the immigration beat is overwhelming.

Another bill would streamline immigration litigation procedures. Republicans say it is needed to unclog courts bogged down with deportation appeals, but immigration and civil liberties groups say the measure would deny due process to some immigrants who are seeking political asylum.

Finally, the House will consider a bill requiring voters to prove citizenship before registering or re-registering to vote in a federal election. A coalition of groups -- including the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, the NAACP, and AARP -- is holding a conference call today to denounce what it says is legislation to create a national, government-issued identification card.

But GOP leaders are showing no qualms about such opposition. The spate of immigration-related legislation -- including last week's authorization of a 700-mile-long, double-layered fence on the U.S.-Mexican border -- is designed to appeal to the dispirited Republican base.

What's Left

So, with less than two weeks to go before recess, prospects look bleak for the big pending bills. Aside from the national security battles that are dominating debate in both chambers, GOP leaders are punting all leftover business until after the November elections -- at the earliest.

The list includes most appropriations bills. House and Senate GOP leaders still hope to complete spending measures for the Defense and Homeland Security departments before adjourning, fearing that voters could punish them at the polls if they do not. But a veterans spending bill has stalled. And the packages that fund health, science, transportation and education programs are not even close.

A bill that would fund water projects has been left hanging, despite the election-year appeal of its many pork-rich contents. Also headed nowhere: the permanent estate tax repeal that Republicans have tried all year to push across the finish line. A port security bill faces better odds, congressional aides said, but its "must pass" status has made it a magnet for unrelated earmarks.

House and Senate GOP negotiators are way behind schedule on a defense authorization bill, but as they make a final push before next Friday, new obstacles keep surfacing.

Of all pressing federal government priorities, fixing the Federal Emergency Management Agency would presumably rank at the top of the list. Last week, the House and Senate reached agreement on how to reform the troubled agency, incorporating recommendations from post-Katrina investigations. But the proposal would increase FEMA's budget, and it is unclear whether House and Senate appropriators -- who are negotiating a final fiscal 2007 spending bill -- will include the extra money.

FBI Raids Muslim Charity (DETNEWS)

By Paul Egan And Francis X. Donnelly

Detroit News, September 19, 2006

SOUTHFIELD -- FBI agents from the Joint Terrorism Task Force raided the Southfield offices of a highly regarded American Muslim relief organization Monday, but would not disclose the nature of their criminal investigation.

The FBI executed a search warrant at the offices of Life for Relief & Development on 10 Mile Road about 9 a.m. and remained there copying documents and computer files until late afternoon.

The FBI also searched the Ypsilanti home of the group's chief executive officer, Khalil Jassemm; a home on Indiana Street in Dearborn owned by Jassemm; and the Dearborn office of a nonprofit group opposed to the Iraq war called Focus on American & Arab Interests and Relations, headed by Muthanna Al-Hanooti, who until recently worked for Life for Relief & Development.

Al-Hanooti, an Iraqi expatriate and community activist, was out of the country visiting the United Arab Emirates, but was informed of the search, said Imad Hamad, regional director of the American Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee.

The reasons given to U.S. District Judge Nancy G. Edmunds to obtain the search warrants were sealed, and no arrests have been made. The search is "pertaining to a criminal matter," FBI Special Agent Dawn Clenney said. A federal official in Detroit said the investigation was being run out of the Justice Department in Washington, D.C.

Lawyer Ihsan Alkhatib, Life for Relief's legal director, said Internal Revenue Service agents accompanied the FBI. Agents told him the investigation was tax-related and not terrorism-related, Alkhatib said.

"They've been professional, courteous and polite," Alkhatib said of the agents.

The main concern, Alkhatib said, is the timing of the raid, less than a week before the start of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. That's the peak time for donations to Life for Relief, which had been hard-hit like all Muslim charities after the Sept. 11 attacks and was just beginning to see a recovery in levels of giving, he said.

Group is cooperating

Jassemm, Life for Relief's chief executive officer, said his group is cooperating with the investigation. "We understand that the government has to do its job," he said.

Life for Relief describes itself on its Web site as the largest American Muslim humanitarian relief organization. The nonprofit organization was founded in 1992 by concerned Iraqi-American professionals in response to the crisis in Iraq following the 1991 Gulf War, the Web site says.

The charity says it has provided more than $50 million in aid to more than 13 million people around the world.

The group's most recent IRS filing, for 2004, said it had revenues of $10.6 million and spent $8.8 million that year on humanitarian and relief programs.

Life for Relief once had North American offices in California and Canada, but no longer does, Alkhatib said. But the group has offices associated with its relief efforts in Iraq, Jordan, Pakistan, Dubai, Syria, Sierra Leone and Israel, he said.

In addition to providing emergency relief in the form of food and medicine, Life for Relief runs programs for orphans and built a computer center in Iraq, Alkhatib said. Its Web site says it has improved schools in countries such as Iraq and Afghanistan and worked to improve Iraq's drinking water infrastructure.

Hamad said he believes Life for Relief is the only Muslim charity licensed to work in Israel and the occupied territories. To hear its offices were raided would not be unlike a Westerner hearing the offices of the Red Cross had been raided, he said.

A former Life for Relief chief executive officer, Ghanim al-Jumaily, was named Iraqi ambassador to Japan in 2004.

FBI seizes files, computers

On Monday afternoon in a light rain, more than a half dozen FBI agents streamed in and out of the rear entrance of the Life for Relief & Development building on 10 Mile, carrying with them dozens of file boxes and at least two computers.

The materials were loaded into a packed box truck parked in the rear. A Michigan State Police trooper secured the area for the FBI.

Al-Hanooti, the man associated with the other office targeted by the FBI, recently launched a lobbying and consulting firm, Focus on Advocacy & Advancement of International Relations LLC, which is aimed at improving Iraqi-American relations, Hamad said. It has offices in Dearborn and Washington, D.C.

Susan Lindauer, a Takona Park, Md., woman who has worked with Al-Hanooti on Muslim causes in Washington, said he met monthly with the local FBI task force in Detroit on anti-terrorism and was a liaison between Arab-Americans and the community. He's spent considerable time in Iraq since the start of the recent war acting as a bridge between the U.S. troops and Iraqi citizens, she said.

"I'm amazed, given all the excellent work he's done, that they would come after him," Lindauer said.

Life for Relief was one of two groups that funded a 2002 trip to Baghdad by three Democratic congressmen who opposed the Iraq war.

The congressmen were Rep. David Bonior of Mount Clemens, who has since left office and teaches labor studies at Wayne State University; Rep. Mike Thompson of California and Rep. Jim McDermott of Washington. The other group paying for the trip was the Church Council of Greater Seattle, a church group opposed to the war.

DOJ_NMG_0065229

"They're a four-star charity, and they do work through the United Nations, and they have a good reputation for doing humanitarian work," said Dawud Walid, head of the Michigan branch of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said. "I was totally surprised."

The Joint Terrorism Task Force is made up of the FBI and more than 20 other law enforcement agencies, including the Michigan State Police.

Bill Pierre, regional director for the Middle East for the American Friends Service Committee, said his group has worked closely with Life for Relief in providing aid to Iraq.

"I'm very much surprised," Pierre said. "They have been steadfast in being open and above-board."

Raid On Metro Charity Troubles Area Muslims (FREEP)

By Niraj Warikoo

Detroit Free Press, September 19, 2006

Counterterrorism agents of the FBI and IRS raided what is believed to be one of the biggest Muslim charities in the United States on Monday, hauling away a truckload of documents and computers from its Southfield office.

The raid was based on sealed search warrants, but the charity's head of legal services, Ihsan Alkhatib, said the agents are investigating whether the charity conducted business in Iraq before the 2003 war in violation of legal sanctions against the country.

Alkhatib said Life for Relief and Development "did everything by the book.

"They knew the government was looking at them through a magnifying glass," he said.

Tax records show that Life raised about $10.6 million in 2004. The charity has distributed money in Pakistan, Iraq, Lebanon, the Palestinian territories, and in the United States after Hurricane Katrina, among other places. A senior federal official with knowledge of investigations related to the raid said that agents are probing whether Life officials violated the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, a federal law that allows the government to prohibit economic activity with countries that are deemed security threats.

According to the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, agents are investigating whether Life may have illegally distributed money and medical supplies inside Iraq.

Agents of the FBI and IRS seized cabinet files and hard drives from the office of Life, a nonprofit group that Muslim leaders say is the biggest Islamic charity headquartered in Michigan.

Southfield police and Michigan State Police officers were also at the scene Monday.

Federal agents also raided the Ypsilanti home of the charity's chief executive officer, Khalil Jassemm, and the Dearborn office of Muthanna Alhanooti, a former official of the charity who has ties to an Islamic party in Iraq.

No one was arrested.

The agents were from the Joint Terrorism Task Force, and they spent hours interviewing Jassemm, as well as Life's office manager, Kudama Kaluan, accountant Nael Zenhom, and marketing manager Mohammed Abaza, Alkhatib said.

The raids are part of a major effort by the FBI and other federal agencies to investigate the flow of money from the United States to terrorist groups in the Muslim world, current and former FBI agents said Monday.

"It's logical to assume that many Islamic terrorist organizations have representation here in the U.S., and sources of funding," said Christopher Hamilton, a former FBI agent who investigated terrorism cases and is now a senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, based in Washington, D.C.

Many of the efforts of counterterrorism officials in southeastern Michigan focus on how money from the region ends up in Middle Eastern and other Muslim countries such as Iran and Pakistan.

Earlier this year, the Treasury Department shut a charity based in Toledo, with Michigan ties, for alleged links to Hamas.

And the FBI said in May that the owner of the La Shish chain of restaurants, Talal Chahine, raised money for Hizballah through a charity in Lebanon that has an office in Dearborn.

Last month, Alhanooti left Life for Relief and Development to consider being the U.S. representative of the Iraqi Islamic Party.

DOJ_NMG_0065230

Another Life official, Mohammed Alomari, was involved with Sunni political parties in Iraq, say charity officials.

Founded in 1992, the charity was started by Iraqi-American Sunnis who said they were concerned about the plight of Iraqis and the effect of United Nations sanctions imposed after the 1991 Persian Gulf War, according to charity officials.

Life officials have traveled to Iraq often over the years and had an office that distributed aid after the fall of Saddam Hussein's government in 2003, say charity officials.

Coming days before the start of Ramadan, the raids concerned some Muslims in metro Detroit, but some said they were not surprised.

"The community was expecting to give Ramadan gifts, but we're wondering, who's next" to be raided, Jassemm said. "And apparently, Life is next."

The raids were based on several search warrants that dealt with possible violations of criminal laws, said FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney. Affidavits filed in support of the warrants have been sealed.

Life for Relief and Development is actively involved in metro Detroit's Arab-American and Muslim communities. It is part of the Congress of Arab American Organizations.

And the Life group has worked with and donated supplies to the Michigan branch of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee.

The head of the committee, Imad Hamad, urged the public not to rush to judgment.

But federal agents say they worry whether the group may have violated federal laws.

The group can still operate, but Alkhatib said that will be hard to do because they have no computers and hard drives.

Federal Agents Raid Islamic Charity In Suburban Detroit (AP)

AP, September 18, 2006

SOUTHFIELD, Michigan Federal counterterrorism officials on Monday raided the suburban Detroit offices of an international Muslim humanitarian organization.

FBI and Joint Terrorism Task Force agents executed search warrants at the headquarters of Life for Relief and Development in the Detroit suburb of Southfield.

The warrants were based on a criminal assertion, but the affidavits in support of the warrants are sealed, William Kowalski, an assistant special agent in the FBI's Detroit office, told the Detroit Free Press.

"The warrants have been signed off by a judge, and it pertains to an ongoing criminal matter," FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney told The Associated Press. She did not give additional details.

Agents hauled away documents, letters and ledgers starting at about 9 a.m. (1300 GMT), said Dawud Walid, head of the Michigan branch of the Council on American Islamic Relations. Walid said agents told officials at the charity that the raid was related to criminal activity.

"They're seizing documents," Walid said. "They haven't closed down the charity, they haven't filed any charges against the organization nor have they arrested anyone. It was totally unexpected and they're baffled."

Mohammed Alomari, spokesman for Life for Relief and Development, described the federal agents as courteous and said staff members who remained in the office were cooperating. He said much of the staff was sent home for the day after agents arrived.

"They didn't really give a reason, but . . . I guess they're looking for some financial information," Alomari said.

"What we asked them is, can we still continue operating the charity, and they said yes," he said.

Alomari said the organization raises money for humanitarian relief efforts and for development projects such as building schools, water treatment plants, computer centers and sewing centers for women. He said the organization has offices in Iraq, Pakistan, Jordan, Israel, Syria and Sierra Leone and employs 25 people at its Southfield headquarters.

A statement on the organization's Web site said it "has provided over $50 million (€39.48 million) in humanitarian assistance to more than 13 million beneficiaries worldwide."

The group was founded by Iraqi Americans in 1992.

FBI Searches Islamic Leader's Home (COLMISS)

DOJ_NMG_0065231

By Derek Kravitz And Anna Scianna

Columbia Missourian, September 19, 2006

FBI agents searched the home of a prominent Islamic community leader Monday, three days after FBI officials met with community members at the Columbia mosque to improve the bureau's often frosty relations with Muslims.

A dozen agents searched the home of Shakir Abdul-Kaf Hamoodi and his wife, Lamya Mukhlef Najem, on Monday, said FBI spokesman Jeff Lanza. Agents showed up at Hamoodi's southwest Columbia home about 8 a.m. Monday, seizing boxes and computer equipment throughout the day, neighbors said, before leaving the quiet residential neighborhood about 4 p.m.

Lanza said agents only searched Hamoodi's home, located at 2701 Woodberry Court, in The Pines subdivision, in connection with the search warrant. The reason for the raid has not been disclosed because details of the warrant are sealed.

On Monday, federal agents also raided the offices of a Southfield, Mich., Muslim charity organization, Life for Relief and Development. Lanza would neither confirm nor deny whether the two searches were connected.

Last February, Stephens College held a tsunami relief concert and gave all the proceeds to the Life for Relief and Development.

Muslim leaders said that the timing of the two searches raised suspicions.

"After learning about the Columbia raid, I have to say the timings are odd," said Ibrahim Hooper, the national communications director for the Washington, D.C.-based Council on American-Islamic Relations.

Reached at his home by phone Monday afternoon, Hamoodi said he cooperated fully with federal investigators.

"They came in, asked questions, I told them the answers and they left," he said. He declined to discuss the nature of the questions he was asked.

Hamoodi, 54, grew up in Anah, a town in central Iraq, and studied in Iraq, Scotland and France. After he immigrated to Columbia in 1985 with his wife, Lamya, 40. Hamoodi studied at MU and worked as an assistant research professor for the school's College of Engineering, before leaving that position. According to an article published in the Missourian in March 2003, Hamoodi has hundreds of relatives still in Iraq, including his parents and several brothers and sisters. Hamoodi and Najem have five American-born children.

Hamoodi has owned and operated a grocery store, World Harvest International and Gourmet Foods, on Nifong Boulevard, since 2004. Najem is a teacher at the Islamic School of Columbia Missouri.

Hamoodi was the former outreach coordinator for the Islamic Center of Central Missouri, organizing interfaith meetings with community leaders and peace demonstrations. Corey Brand, the center's president, described Hamoodi as a prominent and well-respected member of Columbia's Muslim community.

"I've known him for a number of years, and to think he'd be capable of anything criminal. ... I just can't possibly believe that," Brand said.

Brand said Hamoodi actively spoke out against the war in Iraq and was involved with several charitable organizations.

"I've been opposed to sanctions, and I'm opposed to the United States' current foreign policy in the region," Hamoodi said in the 2003 Missourian article following the U.S. invasion of Iraq. "I sincerely do not find any justification for this."

Monday's raid came three days after FBI agents met with Muslim community members at the Islamic Center of Central Missouri.

At the meeting, community members raised concerns about being racially profiled following the October 2004 federal raid of the Islamic American Relief Agency's U.S. headquarters in Columbia. Hamoodi attended the meeting, organizers said.

The U.S. Treasury Department has linked the IARA charity to the Sudan-based Islamic African Relief Agency, which they say has ties to Osama Bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas. No one has been charged in connection with that case. Brand said he did not know if Hamoodi donated any of his time or money to the IARA, which housed its U.S. headquarters in offices at 201 E. Cherry St.

Several Columbia Muslim leaders said they felt personally targeted after the raid, which they said caused lasting damage within the Muslim community.

Brand said he hopes the ongoing federal investigation doesn't undo the progress made at the last week's forum.

"I think it has the danger of erasing the whole purpose of Friday — to reassure the Muslim community," Brand said.

FBI Searches Home Of Muslim Family (COLTRIB)

By Jacob Lueke

Columbia Tribune, September 18, 2006

FBI agents today searched the home of a Columbia businessman and former Iraqi who has been an outspoken critic of the war in Iraq.

About a dozen FBI vehicles parked this morning in front of the home of Shakir Hamoodi, 54, at 2701 Woodberry Court, in the upscale The Pines neighborhood in southwest Columbia, neighbors said.

At exactly 9 a.m., the FBI agents left their cars and rushed the house. Two teenagers inside the house were brought outside and escorted to the family car and drove off, said a neighbor who did not want to be identified. The neighbor said the agents entered the house and removed boxes and other items. Some agents stood on the lawn and examined papers pulled from the house.

Hamoodi owns World Harvest International and Gourmet Foods on Nifong Boulevard. County records show he owns the Woodberry Court home with Lamya Najem, 40, who a neighbor said teaches at the Islamic School of Columbia Missouri.

Hamoodi

Jeff Lanza, a spokesman for the FBI in Kansas City, would not say what prompted the raid, but he said the home was not a threat to the community.

Neither Hamoodi nor Najem could be reached for comment this morning. A neighbor who requested anonymity said police told him Hamoodi was out of the state this morning.

Several neighbors who watched the ongoing raid and requested anonymity said they didn't know much about the family. "They have been nothing but very, very nice," one neighbor said.

Around 9:30 a.m. a Columbia police officer was rummaging through the home's open garage while neighbors loitered outside and gawked. Shortly after a reporter arrived, the officer closed the garage door.

Officer Bill Lee turned away an attempt to question the FBI agents and asked a Tribune reporter and photographer to leave the property. He declined to answer questions.

Hamoodi is an Iraq native who lived in Scotland and France before moving to Columbia in 1985. He studied at the University of Missouri-Columbia and later became an engineering research assistant professor at the school. He left the school and opened World Harvest in 2004, according to a 2005 Tribune story about his business.

Hamoodi has been identified as an outreach coordinator for the Islamic Center.

"He's been involved with charity. He's a good human being and does a lot of charitable work," said Ahmed Habib, who knows Hamoodi and his family through the mosque. "He's well respected in the community."

Neighbors said the home was generally quiet, although once every few months several cars would park there for about an hour. They speculated Hamoodi hosted religious gatherings.

Hamoodi has made several public appearances in opposition to the U.S. war in Iraq. At one event, a July 2005 speech at a Rotary Club event in Jefferson City, he was identified as a nuclear engineer living in Columbia.

In 2003 he participated in an MU forum on the war and said: "The U.S. Army is as unwanted as Saddam Hussein. The U.S. Army is probably more unwanted than Saddam Hussein."

After Saddam's capture, Hamoodi told the Tribune the event was insignificant. "They found him in a hole, he can't lead the resistance from a hole," Hamoodi was quoted as saying. "The war was a lie. Innocent people were killed. Is this worth finding weapons of mass destruction?"

Their home on Woodberry Court was recently defaced with spray-painted anarchist graffiti, neighbors said.

Islamic Center 'surprised' By Timing Of Raid. (COLTRIB)

By Janease Heavin

Columbia Tribune, September 18, 2006

An FBI visit this morning to the Columbia home of a Muslim family could undo any bridge-building efforts between law enforcement and members of the Islamic community, the president of the local mosque said this morning.

The FBI search of the home of Shakir Hamoodi, 54, and Lamya Najem, 40, this morning came as a surprise to Corey Brand, president of the Islamic Center of Central Missouri.

"I could not believe that he would be involved in anything evil," Brand said. "I've known Shakir Hamoodi for years, and he's quite highly respected. This is absolutely going to damage relationships."

Hamoodi, Brand and others in the Muslim community met with FBI Supervisory Special Agent Richard Thornton on Friday at the Islamic center in an effort to improve communications. Islamic center member Ahmed Habib said Thornton asked for the meeting; however, Thornton told the Tribune on Friday that Habib invited him to speak.

During the more than two-hourlong meeting on Friday, Thornton explained FBI procedure and assured the group that if any of them "ever come under scrutiny," the FBI would "do it fairly and constitutionally."

Habib said Hamoodi and Thornton talked during the social hour, but Hamoodi did not publicly ask questions.

During Friday's meeting, many Muslims shared concerns about the FBI shutdown of the Islamic American Relief Agency in Columbia two years ago. U.S. Treasury officials contend the Columbia-based charity was the U.S. affiliate of a Sudanese charity, the Islamic African Relief Agency, which is accused of supporting terrorist organizations, including al-Qaida.

Thornton on Friday told Muslims that those who contributed large amounts of money to that charity could face FBI questioning. Brand said this morning he did not know whether Hamoodi contributed to the IARA.

Although Habib seemed surprised this morning to hear of the raid on Hamoodi's home, he was careful not to speculate whether it would undo any positive relations built Friday night.

"We wanted to show them that the mosque is open to them," Habib said. "I'm surprised this type of thing would happen so soon afterward."

White House Selects Cybersecurity Chief (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, September 18, 2006

The Homeland Security Department picked an industry information security specialist Monday as its cybersecurity chief, filling a job that has had no permanent director for a year.

Greg Garcia was appointed assistant secretary for cybersecurity and telecommunications, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said. The cybersecurity job was created in July 2005, but department officials have struggled to find candidates willing to take significant pay cuts from industry jobs to fill it.

Part of Garcia's job will be to oversee the department's National Cyber Security Division. For the last two years, that office has been run by Donald "Andy" Purdy Jr., who is a two-year contract employee on loan from Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh. Carnegie Mellon has received $19 million in contracts from Homeland Security's cybersecurity office under Purdy's management.

Garcia "brings the right mix of experience in government and the private sector to continue to strengthen our robust partnerships that are essential to this field," Chertoff said in a statement.

A test of mock Internet attacks concluded last week that many government and industry officials were unable to fight back quickly and effectively against a series of simulated hackings that aimed to halt subways and trigger power outages.

Dozens Die In Blasts In Northern, Western Iraq (WP)

BAGHDAD, Sept. 18 -- Suicide bombers killed at least 34 people in attacks in western and northern Iraq on Monday, underscoring the continuing violence throughout the country as U.S. and Iraqi forces focus on tamping down attacks in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0065234

In Tal Afar, north of Baghdad, a man wearing an explosive vest blew himself up at 6:15 p.m. in a line of residents waiting to buy cylinders of cooking gas, killing 21 people and wounding 18 others, said Brig. Gen. Saeed Jubury, a police spokesman in Mosul.

Earlier in the afternoon, a suicide car bomber slammed into a recruiting center for Iraqi security forces in Ramadi, capital of Anbar province, killing 13 recruits and wounding 10 others, said Talib Mushtaq al-Obaydi, a doctor at Ramadi General Hospital. A statement from the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq asserted responsibility for the attack.

Mohammed al-Askari, a spokesman for the Defense Ministry, said in a statement that the recent violence in outlying provinces is a result of the new security plan in the capital, which "has not left room for terrorism in Baghdad."

Still, horrific bloodshed remains routine in Baghdad, where nearly 100 people were found dead in one 24-hour period last week. Many residents remain fearful of security forces meant to protect them, particularly police from the Interior Ministry, which is thought to be infiltrated by militias and death squads.

Starting next month, Iraq's entire national police force will undergo a month-long training course that includes inspections of individual units that could identify corrupt officers or militia members, according to a Western adviser to the Interior Ministry.

The adviser, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press, said the inspections, which have already begun, include reviews of payroll and inventory records. "If you have a police chief that is selling weapons or body armor on the black market," he said, "that is going to be discovered. If someone is getting rid of Sunnis on the force, there's an administrative trail to get rid of them."

Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, confirmed the training program but said there would not be any effort to root out rogue elements or death squads thought to be rampant among the police ranks.

"We will not lose trust with our forces by doing tests on them," he said. "Cleaning the bad elements out of the Interior Ministry is the duty of the inspector general, it's not our duty."

In the southern city of Basra, about 600 protesters gathered in the streets and burned an effigy of Pope Benedict XVI to decry a speech last week quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as saying that the prophet Muhammad brought "only evil and inhuman" things to the world. The pope said in a statement Sunday that he was "deeply sorry" about the reaction in some countries to his remarks.

The U.S. military on Monday also announced the deaths of two soldiers in Baghdad on Sunday, one killed by small arms fire and the other when his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb. No other details were released.

Special correspondents K.I. Ibrahim and Naseer Nouri contributed to this report.

Attacks In Iraq Leave 23 Dead As Talks Lag On Autonomy (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Abdul Razzaq Al-saiedi

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Tuesday, Sept. 19 — Suicide bombers attacked a market in Tal Afar and the Iraqi police in Ramadi on Monday, killing at least 23 people, as political leaders in the capital struggled to reach a deal that would end the fight over splitting Iraq into autonomous states.

The worst attack was in Tal Afar, where a bomber wearing an vest filled with explosives killed 21 people and wounded 17 others when he blew himself up near a line of people waiting to receive their allotment of cooking fuel, according to Iraqi state television.

Tal Afar, a dusty, agrarian city of a quarter million in northwestern Iraq, has been the scene of fierce battles over the past two years as American troops have fought to wrest control of the area from groups affiliated with Al Qaeda and from other insurgents.

Two suicide bombs struck the police in Ramadi, the restive capital of Anbar Province west of Baghdad. News agencies quoted Iraqi officials as saying that 13 people had been killed. But an American military spokeswoman said United States forces in the area had counted two dead, both Iraqi policemen.

Early Tuesday morning, the American military released statements disclosing two new combat deaths. One soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in northeastern Baghdad on Sunday afternoon, and another was killed by small-arms fire in north-central Baghdad, also on Sunday afternoon.

Negotiators from major political blocs met late Monday in an effort to resolve the bitter fight over how soon Shiite provinces in the south can break off into autonomous regions with substantial control over their security and the billions of barrels of oil beneath southern Iraq.

A faction of Shiites and Kurds led by the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri, a powerful Shiite party with close ties to Iran, proposed a compromise on Monday, said an adviser to Khalid al-Atiya, a deputy speaker of Parliament and one of the faction's negotiators.

Sciri wants to pass a bill in Parliament giving provinces a quick route to forming autonomous regions, which are allowed by the Constitution's federalism provisions.

But furious Sunni Arab leaders say the Constitution might not have even been approved in the referendum last October had it not been for their last-minute support. They gave that support only after a provision was added that called for portions of the Constitution to be renegotiated as soon as Parliament was called into session. But that has not happened.

Under the new proposal, according to the aide to Mr. Atiya, Parliament would form a committee to propose constitutional amendments, as sought by the Sunnis. At the same time, Parliament would proceed with the federalism proposal backed by Sciri and the Kurds, but the law would not become effective for one year, or until after the constitutional committee finished deciding whether to propose amendments.

But one of the negotiators for the Sunni members of Parliament, Ayad al-Samarrai, said the Sunnis did not want to move ahead with any aspect of federalism until the constitutional questions were resolved.

And even then, he said in an interview on Monday night, Sunnis do not want to create any autonomous states that have the same level of independence as Iraqi Kurdistan.

A committee is needed to study how federalism would work in the Arab regions of Iraq, he said, "because we can't use the Kurdish style." Iraq will always require a strong central government to settle problems in the regions, he added.

In Baghdad, the government released a statement on Monday saying it would shut down the offices of the Kurdistan Workers' Party, or P.K.K. Rebels from the P.K.K., who live in the mountains of Iraqi Kurdistan near Iran and Turkey, favor an independent Kurdistan. They are enemies of Turkey and Iran, which have sizable Kurdish populations and reject calls for an independent Kurdish nation.

However, a senior Kurdish official in Baghdad said he strongly doubted that the decree would mean that the Kurdish militia, the pesh merga, would be called on to crack down on the rebels.

At the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein on Monday, prosecutors called the latest witness to describe the so-called Anfal military campaign of 1988, in which Mr. Hussein faces charges of gassing and killing more than 50,000 Kurds.

Darwan Abdullah Ali Tawfiq, a former pesh merga fighter, testified that he was left with permanent eye damage after he was gassed in 1988 when a rocket fell next to his tent. "After that, I ran toward a hill behind us," he testified, a pool report said. "While I was running, I was jumping over bodies of children and old people. I saw severed body parts.

"Until now, I suffer from the pain," he said. "When I take my glasses off in front of my children, they tell me to put them back on because they get scared of the way my eyes look."

Iraq Violence Kills At Least 41 People (AP)

By Elena Becatoros

AP, September 19, 2006

Bombers and gunmen killed at least 41 people and wounded dozens across Iraq on Monday, while parliament leaders again put off debate on legislation that some Iraqis fear could threaten the country's unity and bring even more violence.

The U.S. military relinquished control of a second Iraqi army division as Iraqi officials prepared to further tighten security ahead of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, when insurgent attacks tend to spike.

In a positive development for Iraq's leaders, predominantly Sunni Arab tribes in a volatile western province have joined to fight insurgents in the region and want the government and the U.S.-led coalition to supply them with weapons, a tribal leader said.

Tribal leaders and clerics in Ramadi, capital of violent Anbar province, met last week and set up a force of about 20,000 men "ready to purge the city of these infidels," Sheik Fassal al-Guood, a tribal leader from Ramadi, told The Associated Press.

"People are fed up with the acts of those criminals who take Islam as a cover for their crimes," he said. "The situation in the province is unbearable, the city is abandoned, most of the families have fled the city and all services are poor."

An indication of the situation came Monday when two suicide car bombers attacked a police station in Ramadi, killing at least two police officers and wounding 26 people, the Interior Ministry and U.S. military said. Al-Arabiya and al-Jazeera television put the death toll much higher, saying 13 people were killed.

A suicide bomber also struck in Tal Afar, a city 260 miles northwest of Baghdad that has seen much insurgent activity in the past, killing at least 20 people and wounding 17. Bombings and shootings in and around Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of the capital, killed 12 people.

At least six more people died in other incidents around Iraq, and authorities found at least five bodies, including two women, that probably were victims of the sectarian reprisal killings being waged between Shiite and Sunni Arabs.

In Baghdad, political leaders from Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni Arab groups met to discuss the federalism bill submitted to parliament this month by the largest Shiite bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance. They canceled a formal parliament debate scheduled for Tuesday.

The head of the largest Sunni Arab alliance, Adnan al-Dulaimi, said the faction leaders would meet again to discuss the issue Tuesday, but said the bill would not be debated until a later — as yet unspecified — date.

The legislation calls for setting up a system to allow creation of autonomous regions in the predominantly Shiite south much like the self-ruling Kurdish region in northern Iraq. Sunni Arabs fear that would split Iraq apart and fuel sectarian bloodshed.

The Kurdish north and Shiite south hold Iraq's oil fields, while the predominantly Sunni Arab areas don't have any.

Sunni Arabs say that before autonomy legislation can be passed, parliament must name a committee to amend the constitution — a key demand they made when they agreed to join Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government. One of the amendments they seek would weaken the ability to set up self-ruling cantons.

Al-Dulaimi, as well as Shiite and Kurdish lawmakers, said the Kurds had proposed setting up the committee simultaneously with submitting the draft bill for debate sometime in the future.

Monday's violence came as the government prepared to announce new security measures for Baghdad ahead of Ramadan, which is expected to start Sept. 24.

Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari told the AP the measures would be adopted two or three days before the holy month begins to "protect citizens from terrorists attacks."

The Iraqi army's 4th Division also came under Iraqi control in central Salahuddin province Monday, the government said.

It was the second of Iraq's 10 divisions to be put under direct Iraqi control since Sept. 7, when coalition forces handed over control of Iraq's armed forces command to the government.

Zarqawi Had Foes Within Al Qaeda (WT)

By Sharon Behn, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

Iraq's national security adviser yesterday released a letter captured after the death of terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi, in which he was criticized by another al Qaeda figure for his brutal methods.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie cited several points in English from the Arabic-language document, saying the letter reveals Zarqawi's intention to spur sectarian violence in the country.

The long letter was from Attyia al-Jaza'ri, purportedly an al Qaeda leader of Algerian origin, to Zarqawi before he was killed in an air strike on June 7.

DOJ_NMG_0065237

Mr. al-Rubaie's statement and the letter were given to journalists by the U.S. military at the request of the adviser with the caveat: "We have no knowledge of the matters contained in this message. If you have any questions, please contact the government of Iraq."

According to Mr. al-Rubaie, in the letter "the leader of al Qaeda criticizes Zarqawi for making decisions without seeking the counsel of senior al Qaeda leadership [and] reminds Zarqawi that he is not on the same level of these historic leaders."

Al-Jaza'ri also reprimanded the Jordanian-born terrorist for putting military acts above political action, expressed his reservations on Zarqawi's attempts "to prematurely declare war on the Shi'ites," and chastised him for not cooperating with Sunni scholars and tribal leaders.

The letter "expressed that al Qaeda leadership in Pakistan and Afghanistan are unhappy with [al Qaeda in Iraq] methods in Iraq [and] criticized [its] method of selectively choosing brutality and violence over mercy and kindness."

Zarqawi was the mastermind behind a number of gruesome videotaped beheadings, executions and kidnappings in Iraq, making him one of the most wanted men in Iraq.

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell told reporters on June 8 that Zarqawi's death and 17 simultaneous raids in Baghdad and the city's outskirts led to a "treasure trove" of information and intelligence.

But the euphoria over Zarqawi's death quickly faded as sectarian violence dramatically increased in the capital, leaving thousands dead in the past three months, their tortured and bound bodies found strewn around the city.

There was no immediate independent confirmation of the veracity of the documents released. Phone calls to the Iraqi national security council spokesman were not answered.

The President Of Iraq, Jalal Talabani, Shares His Views In 'Dear Americans' (MCT)

McClatchy Newspapers, September 19, 2006

Dear Americans:

As I am visiting the United States for the second time representing free and democratic Iraq, I felt it my duty to give you an update on what has been achieved in Iraq over the past year and on the challenges that lie ahead.

The first thing I would like to convey is the gratitude of all Iraqis, who are fighting for a democratic government and a civil society, to the Americans. Without your commitment, our struggle against despotism could not have made the progress that we have achieved. No expression of thanks could be enough for those who lost loved ones in Iraq. We feel your pain, we honor your sacrifice and we will never forget you.

To those of you who have family and friends in Iraq today, we say: Your sons and daughters are helping us through a historic transition. We will always remember the enormous sacrifice that America is making for Iraq.

Thanks to the United States, we are transforming Iraq from a country that was ruled by fear, repression and dictatorship into a country that is ruled by democracy and has the values of equality, tolerance, human rights and the rule of law at its heart.

April 9, 2003, the day of liberation, heralded a new era in the history of Iraq and the region. That day triggered a sequence of events that laid the foundation of a modern Iraq that is at peace with itself and the world.

All segments of Iraqi society have benefited from liberation.

Under Saddam Hussein, the majority of the Sunni Arabs of Iraq were marginalized, Saddam and his gang were ruling in the name of this community. But in reality, the Sunni Arabs never had the chance to choose their representatives democratically and have a say about their future. Today, they have 58 deputies in Parliament, a vice president, a deputy prime minister and a speaker of Parliament; all were elected by the people of Iraq.

The Shia majority of Iraq was for decades oppressed and discriminated against. They did not even have the right to practice their religious ceremonies. Now, they are equal citizens and hold key posts in government and parliament through their democratically elected representatives. Kurds were second-class citizens. They suffered from genocide and chemical bombardment; now they are equal members of Iraqi society and active participants in the running of their country, Iraq.

The same applies to the Turkomens, Assyrians and other groups of Iraqi society.

Iraq finally has an elected and representative government, a huge contrast to the authority of a vicious tyrant. In other words, Iraq is no longer the property of a gang that ruled by fear and repression. Every Iraqi today feels they have a stake in the new Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0065238

With the regime of Saddam gone, the countries of the Middle East no longer worry about the threat of new adventures by Saddam and his army across Iraq's international borders.

Every time that I visit the United States, I am convinced anew of the virtues and health of the American idea of government, and of the generosity of its people.

I was here around the same time last year. Here is what has happened between then and now, although I must say that I do not think that our situation can be understood simply by following the latest news. A much broader view of Iraq must be taken.

For this, I will start with the economy.

The economic conditions for most Iraqis have improved. The economy was liberated from the control of the state and we are now taking the first steps in creating a vibrant private sector.

Thanks to our independent businesspeople, our market places are bustling despite the unsettled security situation.

A new investment law is before our Parliament. It will further invigorate our private sector, streamline the procedures for starting a new business, and open the country to greater foreign participation and investment.

Salaries of government employees were raised 100 times or more. A policeman under Saddam received $2 to $3 dollars a month. Now a policeman is paid at least $200 a month.

The financial and economic boom is mostly noticed in the safer parts of Iraq. The city of Sulaymaniyah in Iraqi Kurdistan region now has more than 2,000 millionaires. Before liberation, the city had 12.

Politically, we had an eventful year. For the first time in Iraq's history, we ratified a constitution that enshrines many of the democratic values of human rights, equality, rule of law and good government.

After three historic ballots that remain landmarks in the history of the Middle East, we now have a government that arises out of the people, instead of over the people, to use the words of a great American patriot, Thomas Paine.

Unlike the previous election, last December more people voted - 10.5 million - and a more representative parliament and a national unity government are now in place.

Taking part in the national election and referendum on the constitution were the first steps in our national reconciliation efforts; we opted for the ballots and not the bullets to resolve our differences.

We consolidated this by the National Reconciliation Plan of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The plan aims at bringing into the political process all elements of the Iraqi political spectrum that condemn terror and violence.

In the period between the election and the formation of the national unity government, the political blocs - which formed the government later - agreed on the political program for the government and agreed on forming the Political Council for National Security.

An important event that marked the new Iraq over the past year is the trial of Saddam Hussein and his aides for the crimes that were committed against the people of Iraq.

We offered him the justice that he denied Iraqis for decades. The trials, the testimonies of the witnesses and those of the defendants are stark reminders and indications of what Iraq was like in the past and what the new Iraq is about.

Through the constitution and other legal means, we are redefining the foundations that Iraq was built on and are rebuilding what the country's bloody past has destroyed. We have no choice but to succeed.

Our enemy attempts to destroy and disrupt any part of the political process, not because they disagree with the tenets of the Iraqi constitution, but because they do not want a constitution.

This contingent of international terrorists and the supporters and beneficiaries of the old regime - the devotees of Saddam Hussein - constitute the driving force of our enemy.

They attempt to turn Iraqis against each other, and take Iraq back to its brutal and bloody past.

Their tactics of suicide bombings and beheadings make it obvious that they mean to govern by inciting terror and fear, just as Saddam did. Although portions of Iraq are already safe and secure, certain parts are still coming under attack from the vicious, bloodthirsty enemy.

With the support of the citizens of Baghdad, the government started its Baghdad Security Plan. This plan is already showing signs of success, with a marked drop in the reported incidents of violence over the last month.

The battle in Iraq today is not between the various communities. Their elected representatives have agreed on a government of national unity and on national reconciliation. Nor is it a battle between civilizations, as some have seen it.

It is a war "about civilization" as Prime Minister Tony Blair has phrased it so well - the conflict is between those who believe in having a civilization and those who don't believe in having one at all.

As you no doubt already understand, we are fighting a terribly difficult war in Iraq. We are doing everything within our power to protect our people from this clear form of fascism that seduces them into civil war.

The calculated crime of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and his henchmen in bombing the Shrine of Samarra, one of Iraq's religious and cultural treasures, is a prime example of their agenda. They wanted to slide the country into civil war.

Thanks to the presence of the U.S. forces in Iraq and the wisdom of my colleagues in the leadership of Iraq, that plan was thwarted and the short spate of violence was contained.

I want to be frank here. In order to rid Iraq of the constant threat of violence, we still need your help. As long as we are determent to outlast and outsmart our enemy, we shall reach our common goals.

Iraq is slowly gaining the ability to fight this war with its own soldiers, evidenced recently by the relinquishing of complete control of coalition forces to the Iraqi government. The coalition now employs more soldiers from Iraq than any other nation.

Slowly but surely, Iraq will be able to protect itself on its own.

The stakes of Iraq are enormous, world-shifting even. This is why our country should be a point of concern for every democratic country of the world.

I can assure you that the immediate departure of coalition forces would only unleash tensions between different communities; the prospect of a safe Iraq would be completely lost; and the previous descriptions of a civil war would seem insufficient and tame compared to the bloodshed of an Iraq that loses its international support.

And although I cannot promise when or how the American presence will completely end in Iraq, I can promise that American soldiers do not fight in vain.

We in Iraq recognize that an incredible amount of American resources have been offered to us. And we understand that many Americans are frustrated with the course of the war, and we understand that doubt naturally coincides with difficulty.

I realize that many Americans were apprehensive about the decision to go to war.

But I ask that you put this behind you in favor of supporting a democratic and free Iraq, and a future for Iraqis that excludes the threat of violence and extremism.

I ask that you consider what the terms of failure in Iraq would actually look like, and what they would mean for Iraq, the United States and the international community.

I would venture to say that the interest of Iraq and the United States are one in this matter.

The United States carries a heavy responsibility in helping us. As complicated as the relationship may be, America and Iraq are now siblings in the world.

Ex-Workers Testify About Halliburton (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Edward V. Sanchez, a truck driver for Halliburton, had just passed under a bridge near Baghdad on April 9, 2004, when another truck in his convoy hit a mine and "all hell broke loose."

"We began taking rounds of small arms fire from both sides," Sanchez said at a Capitol Hill hearing yesterday. "The shots were coming like a hail storm."

By day's end, seven civilians from the fuel convoy were dead and seven more were injured. Surviving convoy members and the families of the dead now claim the incident could have been prevented. Halliburton, they argue in a suit filed in federal court, had ample warning the route was unsafe to travel because of reports of a running battle between insurgents and the U.S. Army.

DOJ_NMG_0065240

That allegation was at the center of a Democratic Policy Committee hearing that renewed attention on Halliburton Co., which has come under intense scrutiny as the largest U.S. contractor in Iraq.

Past criticism has focused on accusations that the firm, once run by Vice President Cheney, is squandering taxpayer money. Testimony by two former Halliburton truck drivers yesterday raised the question of whether the company was protecting its workers. The firm's KBR subsidiary has lost 91 employees and subcontractors to violence in Iraq since the war began in March 2003.

In response to the lawsuit, the company has said decisions about convoy activity are out of its hands. "The U.S. military has command and control of all KBR convoys in Iraq . . . and is required to provide security for KBR's employees through the company's contract with the Army," the company said in a statement.

Halliburton has sought to have the suit thrown out, arguing the company is immune from litigation related to its work in Iraq for the U.S. government.

The drivers did sign liability waivers before heading to Iraq. But T. Scott Allen Jr., the attorney representing the drivers and their families, said yesterday that Halliburton should have to answer for sending the convoy despite knowing the roads were the scene of "active combat, that the areas were closed and off limits to civilian personnel."

Sean A. Larvenz, a former Halliburton driver who was traveling in another convoy on the day of the attacks, said he had to turn his truck around that morning because he saw insurgents firing at vehicles ahead of his. He said he notified his bosses at Halliburton. Sanchez's convoy was sent later that day.

Larvenz said he believed financial motivations had guided the firm's decision. "As long as the trucks rolled," he told senators, "they got paid."

Also testifying was Julie McBride, a former Halliburton employee who alleged the company inflated its profit by overstating the number of soldiers using Halliburton recreation facilities. Halliburton has a multibillion-dollar contract to provide the Army with logistics support, including gyms and computer clusters. McBride, who helped run those facilities at an Army base in Fallujah, said the firm lied about the number of soldiers who used them because it got reimbursed for its costs and then received a percentage for profit.

"Under its contract, the more facilities, equipment, staff and administrators Halliburton can show a need for, the more profit Halliburton makes," she said. "As the mantra at Halliburton camps goes, 'It's cost-plus, baby.' "

In a statement, Halliburton denied McBride's allegations and said they "clearly demonstrate a complete misinterpretation of facts."

The Army said this summer that it would not renew Halliburton's contract for another year, and instead would divide it up among three firms following a new bidding competition.

The hearing yesterday was the latest in a series held by Democrats who say they feel Republicans have failed to aggressively oversee spending on the war.

"There's something dreadfully wrong with the way that money has been spent and the lack of accountability," said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), who chaired the hearing.

Halliburton Ignored Dangers, Drivers Say (HC)

By David Ivanovich

Houston Chronicle, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON - Halliburton Co. officials knew a highway intersection near Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison was fraught with danger hours before the deadly ambush of a truck convoy known as the Good Friday Massacre, former company truck drivers told Democratic senators Monday.

And the Houston-based contracting giant may have tried to shield itself from lawsuits by including a clause in an application for a Defense of Freedom Medal, in which survivors would sign away their rights to sue, according to a document unveiled by the panel Monday.

"That is almost an unbelievable piece of paper," said Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-S.D., chairman of the Senate Democratic Policy Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0065241

Asked about the clause, Halliburton spokeswoman Cathy Mann said: "It was never KBR's intention to utilize any such release to preclude claims by current or former employees against the company. And we have no intention of doing so in the future."

Appearing before Dorgan's panel of Democrats, former workers accused Halliburton subsidiary KBR of sending unarmed civilians into an area they had been warned was the site of attacks by insurgents.

"One question haunts me: Why would KBR/Halliburton knowingly send unarmed noncombatant civilians in military tankers down a closed road where there was an ongoing battle?" said Ed Sanchez of Silver City, N.M., who survived the Good Friday Massacre.

Six KBR truck drivers and two soldiers were killed in that ambush. Another driver and one soldier are still listed as missing.

The leader of the convoy, Tommy Hamill, was kidnapped. He later escaped.

Mann said Halliburton's "priority has always been the safety and security of its employees, regardless of where they work around the world.

"The U.S. military," Mann added, "has command and control of all KBR convoys in Iraq, such as supplying pre-trip threat assessments and determining routes, and is required to provide security for KBR's employees through the company's contract with the Army."

Giving a warningSean Larvenz, a former civilian convoy commander for Halliburton subsidiary KBR, told the panel he had driven near that same intersection near Baghdad International Airport the morning of April 9, 2004.

Larvenz's convoy was attacked by small-arms fire, mortars and rocket-propelled grenades.

He said he could see mortar fire landing in the road at the interchange of two main supply routes, called Tampa and Sword. Over his radio, he could hear the sound of explosions and the chatter of drivers as their convoys were attacked.

Larvenz sent a text message to company managers warning of the danger.

"There is absolutely no question in my mind that ... KBR/Halliburton was aware of the hostilities that existed at the juncture," he said.

Three hours later, Sanchez's convoy, trying to deliver jet fuel to the airport, came under attack in the same area.

Sanchez told senators he was shot twice but managed to help two other truck drivers escape. During the attack his tanker truck caught fire, and Sanchez and the others had to abandon the vehicle.

When he was picked up by a military Humvee crowded with survivors he was handed an M-16.

"I fired that weapon for the first time in my life," he said.

Appears in a movieSanchez is one of the former Halliburton workers who appear in a recently released film, Iraq for Sale: The War Profiteers, directed by Robert Greenwald, who also produced The Crooked E: The Unshredded Truth about Enron. The film had its Houston-area theatrical release on Sept. 8.

Sanchez, along with other survivors of the ambush and family members of those who were killed, have filed suit against Halilburton in U.S. District Court in Houston.

Mann could not comment on the lawsuit, except to say that "Halliburton and KBR deny any allegations of wrongdoing and fully intend to vigorously defend our position."

T. Scott Allen Jr., a Houston-based attorney handling the case, said Halliburton is trying to get the case dismissed.

Release from liabilityThe panel also unveiled a letter from Halliburton's government operations office in Houston sent in November 2004 to one survivor of the ambush, Ray Stannard of El Paso.

Enclosed with the letter was a "medical records release form" which "authorizes me to share your medical records with the Pentagon Review Board for the purposes of awarding you the Secretary of Defense Medal for the Defense of Freedom."

The Defense of Freedom award, the civilian equivalent of a Purple Heart, was inaugurated in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to recognize civilians hurt or killed while aiding the military.

"You most certainly qualify," the letter assured Stannard.

Clause 9 of the form, however, would release KBR and the military "from any and all claims and any and all causes of action ... I may have against any of them."

Stannard could not be reached for immediate comment.

Democrats held the hearing on their own, arguing Republicans who control the Senate have showed little interest in pursuing the issues.

Afghan Bombings Kill 19, Including Four Canadians (WP/AP)

By Noor Khan

The Washington Post/AP, September 19, 2006

KAFIR BAND, Afghanistan, Sept. 18 -- Three suicide bombers killed at least 19 people across Afghanistan on Monday, including four Canadian soldiers in an attack that tested the NATO alliance's claim of success in driving insurgents from this volatile southern region.

The deadliest attack was in the usually calm western city of Herat, where an attacker strapped with explosives on a motorbike killed 11 people and wounded 18, including the deputy police chief, officials said.

The third attack, a car bombing in the capital, Kabul, killed at least four policemen and wounded one officer and 10 civilians.

In recent weeks, Afghanistan has been suffering the heaviest insurgent attacks since the Taliban was toppled in late 2001. The suicide bombings came a day after NATO troops in the region ended a two-week offensive that the commander called a "significant success."

"It does appear that they are resorting to these despicable tactics after the pressure we have them under in their strongholds," a NATO spokesman, Maj. Luke Knittig, said in Kabul.

NATO's Operation Medusa centered on southern Kandahar province's Panjwai district, where the first of Monday's suicide bombings killed four Canadian infantrymen delivering aid and wounded an unspecified number of other troops, the Canadian military said.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousaf Ahmadi, asserted responsibility for the bombing in a telephone call to the Associated Press.

NATO said 25 civilians also were wounded in the blast in Kafir Band, a clutch of mud-brick homes surrounded by grape and pomegranate orchards.

"Fifty to 60 soldiers were patrolling on the main street when a man on a bicycle stopped and blew himself up near the forces," said Fazel Mohammed, a farmer who lives near the blast site.

"This attack amounts to a serious violation of international humanitarian law," said Tom Koenigs, the top U.N. official in Afghanistan.

The commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, said the attack took place as Canadian troops were arranging aid, reconstruction and development for villagers in the district, which suffered heavy damage during the NATO offensive.

Reacting to the recent surge of western attacks, Afghan and foreign troops launched an operation Monday in Farah province, where a dozen Taliban fighters and Afghan police officers were killed during insurgent raids last week. Operation Wyconda Pincer involves Afghan soldiers and police along with U.S., Italian and Spanish troops, NATO said.

Afghan Bombing Attacks Kill 19 (WT/AP)

KAFIR BAND, Afghanistan -- Three suicide bombers killed at least 19 persons across Afghanistan yesterday, including four Canadian soldiers in an attack that tested NATO's claim of success in driving insurgents from this volatile southern region.

The deadliest attack was in the usually calm western city of Herat, where a militant strapped with explosives and riding a motorbike killed 11 persons and wounded 18, including the deputy police chief, officials said.

The third attack, a car bombing in the capital, Kabul, killed at least four policemen and wounded one officer and 10 civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0065243

Afghanistan has been suffering the heaviest insurgent attacks since the Taliban was toppled in late 2001, and the bombings came a day after NATO ended a two-week offensive against Taliban fighters in this region that the commander called a "significant success."

"It does appear that they are resorting to these despicable tactics after the pressure we have them under in their strongholds," a NATO spokesman, Maj. Luke Knittig, said in Kabul.

NATO's Operation Medusa centered on southern Kandahar province's Panjwayi district, where the first of yesterday's suicide bombings killed four Canadian infantrymen delivering aid and wounded an unspecified number of other troops, the Canadian military said.

The bombing was claimed by a purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousaf Ahmadi, in a telephone call.

NATO said 25 civilians also were wounded in the blast in Kafir Band, a clutch of mud-brick homes surrounded by grape and pomegranate orchards.

"Fifty to 60 soldiers were patrolling on the main street when a man on a bicycle stopped and blew himself up near the forces," said Fazel Mohammed, a farmer who lives near the blast site.

He said most of the village's 25 families fled the fighting and only the poor stayed behind.

The explosion tore through the Canadian patrol, shredding uniforms and military equipment.

The commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, said the attack took place as Canadian troops were arranging aid, reconstruction and development for villagers in the district, which suffered heavy damage during the NATO offensive.

"It is beyond comprehension that a suicide bomber should choose this time to attack, knowing that he could kill innocent children," Gen. Richards said.

At least 36 Canadian soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan since 2002. Five died during Operation Medusa, in which NATO estimated it killed at least 510 insurgents with air strikes and ground assaults.

On Sunday, Gen. Richards called Operation Medusa a success and said NATO had reclaimed crucial territory from the Taliban.

Afghan Suicide Bombs Kill 18, Including 4 Canadian Soldiers (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 18 — Afghanistan was hit by three devastating suicide bomb attacks on Monday, killing 18 people and wounding more than 60, many of them children, in one of the country's worst days of violence against civilians.

Four Canadian soldiers were killed in one explosion, when a suicide bomber on a bicycle set off a bomb as the soldiers were handing out gifts to children in a village in southern Afghanistan.

Eleven other soldiers were wounded as well as 27 villagers, many of them children, local government officials said.

The bombing was in the southern village of Char Kota, in Pashmul, one of the areas that NATO troops had only just wrested from the control of Taliban fighters after two weeks of heavy fighting.

The NATO commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, declared victory in the area on Sunday, saying that NATO had taken control of the area and had forced out the remaining Taliban fighters.

NATO confirmed that four soldiers from its International Security Assistance Force had been killed and several wounded but did not confirm their nationality.

NATO said the four were on patrol in a village and talking to children when the bomber approached on his bicycle.

"This action was as much an attack on the Afghan people as an attack on'' the military force, General Richards said in a statement issued in Kabul.

"This patrol was arranging the requirement for aid, reconstruction and development in the Zhare and Panjwai areas," his statement said. "It is beyond comprehension that a suicide bomber should choose this time to attack, knowing that he could kill innocent children." Another suicide bomber struck in the western town of Herat, killing 11 people and wounding 18, and a third blew up his car in Kabul, killing three policemen and wounding nine other people.

DOJ_NMG_0065244

A Taliban spokesman, reached by telephone, claimed responsibility for the attack in southern Afghanistan, identifying the bomber as a man from the southern city of Kandahar.

The attacks came a day after President Hamid Karzai left to attend the United Nations General Assembly and then to make state visits to Canada and Washington.

Mr. Karzai is hoping to win more support for his beleaguered country as violence worsens, and in particular to ask President Bush to bring more pressure to bear on neighboring Pakistan to help prevent the violence.

The Afghan government says Pakistan is providing refuge to the Taliban insurgents across the border.

The attack in Herat came at 7 p.m., as townspeople were leaving the main town mosque after evening prayers, according to the provincial governor's office. It said most of those killed had been young men and the wounded had included a 4-year-old boy.

While the first spokesman said he could not confirm that it was a suicide bombing, another city official said it was the work of a suicide bomber on a bicycle, The Associated Press reported.

In Kabul, a suicide bomber blew up his car as the police approached a suspicious-looking vehicle on the main road leading east out of the city, said an Interior Ministry spokesman, Zemarai Bashari.

Three policemen were killed and one was wounded, said Ali Shah Paktiawal, director of the crime unit for the Kabul police. Eight civilian passers-by were wounded and a civilian truck was damaged.

The three bombings in one day were a clear escalation in insurgent tactics, possibly linked to Mr. Karzai's visit to the United States and to NATO claims of success on the battlefield.

A Poor Yield For Afghans' War On Drugs (WP)

As Opium, Heroin Trade Booms, Police Net Mainly Smaller Players

KABUL, Afghanistan -- The grim-faced man in gray prison pajamas sat on a metal chair Saturday, listening silently while judges and lawyers debated whether he had known about the 37 pounds of heroin found hidden in the car he was driving cross-country to a city near the Iranian border.

No evidence or witnesses were presented. There were glaring gaps in the police report. The car's owner, a man named Shoaib, had not been arrested, so no one could check the defendant's story that Shoaib had given him money and a car to drive home from Kabul after visiting his sister in the hospital.

"People like Shoaib are the smugglers who use poor people like my client for their business," protested the man's attorney, provided by a foreign legal aid foundation. "We should be going after the real criminals who take advantage of the poor."

After a two-hour hearing, the driver, a young house painter and father of two, was sentenced to 16 years in prison. It was a harsh punishment, based on Afghanistan's tough new drug law and meted out by its year-old narcotics court, which is battling corruption, inexperience and a long-broken legal system to crack down on Afghanistan's skyrocketing opium and heroin trade.

Foreign backers of the government of President Hamid Karzai are growing impatient with the continuing production and trafficking. President Bush weighed in Monday, saying in a report to Congress that the Afghan government must be "held accountable" and toughen its fight against drugs even further.

"We are concerned that failure to act decisively now could undermine security, compromise democratic legitimacy, and imperil international support for vital assistance," Bush said in comments accompanying an annually compiled list of major drug-transit or drug-producing countries.

Two weeks ago, the top U.N. anti-drug official aroused new international alarm when he announced here that the cultivation of opium poppies in Afghanistan had increased by 59 percent in the past year. It grew despite a slew of expensive, foreign-funded programs to eradicate poppy fields and motivate Afghan farmers to grow other crops.

Poppy farming, banned in 2000 by the Taliban administration that U.S.-led forces overthrew the following year, quickly revived after the establishment of a U.N.-backed government and has been spreading rapidly ever since. It now accounts for more than half the country's gross national income and provides the raw material for about 75 percent of the world's heroin.

"It's become an industrial production," said Doris Buddenberg, director of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime here, noting that Afghanistan's opium output this year was a staggering 6,700 tons. Rural poverty, dashed hopes for economic recovery, Taliban blandishments and anti-government sentiment "all added up to more families deciding to grow poppy," she said.

But anti-drug officials and experts here say the expansion of drug smuggling and refining is a far more pernicious problem than poppy farming and could easily turn Afghanistan into another Colombia.

"Our main problem is these former commanders and warlords who are still in power. Now they are district chiefs and local police," said Maj. Gen. Sayed Kamal Sadaat, head of the anti-narcotics police force. "The drug mafia is getting more powerful day by day, and the only support we have is from the international community. The senior authorities not only do not cooperate, they get in our way."

Sadaat's force has arrested more than 600 people, but only 35 have been convicted of drug-related crimes. Most, like the house painter, have been small cogs in a fast-growing illicit enterprise. If higher-level traffickers are caught, Sadaat said, "they have personal relations with officials. I get telephone threats. It is a very difficult situation."

Over the past two years, the Bush administration has poured several hundred million dollars into combating drugs here. The money has funded programs to develop alternative crops, eradicate poppy fields, build prisons and train special anti-narcotics police officers, prosecutors and judges. But still production rises.

Thomas A. Schweich, a senior anti-drug official at the State Department, visited Kabul last week for consultations. He told a group of journalists there was no more room for excuses, such as that Afghan farmers are too poor to survive without poppy cultivation or that bureaucrats linked to drugs can be dealt with by rotating them into other jobs.

"We are looking for the government of Afghanistan to start prosecuting corrupt officials," Schweich said. "They must get out the message that if you grow poppy, you will be eradicated, and if you traffic, you will be prosecuted.

"There are a lot of rumors and finger-pointing, but they need to start building cases that will stand up in court."

Another U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity, described Afghanistan as "worse than Mexico" in the volume of its drug traffic but said the trade is informal and less organized, although some areas that once merely produced poppies have now built laboratories to refine opium into heroin. "It's bad and it will get worse, but there are more tools to fight it," he said. "What is really needed now is political will."

Senior Afghan anti-drug officials say that even with the training and technology provided by American and British experts, it is hard to do their jobs. They say the danger from Taliban insurgents, inadequate police training and poor government leadership in poppy-growing provinces have created a culture of impunity for drug traffickers.

"Poppy is threatening the existence of this country," said Habibullah Qaderi, the national counter-narcotics minister. "We have a good drug law now. We can record phone conversations, we can seize assets. But most of those arrested are drivers, and nobody investigates who the owner is. We are not going after the people who matter."

Police and other experts here described an efficient smuggling system in which taxi or truck drivers are hired to carry hidden bundles of opium, hashish and sometimes heroin in discrete stages from rural production areas to border-crossing points into Pakistan, Iran and the former Soviet republics to the north. Sometimes the contraband is mixed with shipments of legal exports, such as almonds or dried fruit.

Highway police officers often stop such vehicles, but they may be bribed to let them go or may not know how to conduct a proper investigation. If a person arrested with drugs is well connected, the pressure on police may be intense. Once the case goes to the special drug court in Kabul, the crime scene may be too far away to retrace steps missed by investigators.

In one case the drug court heard this week, an illiterate truck driver's assistant appealed a 10-year sentence for carrying 207 pounds of hashish in the truck's body. He denied knowing about the drugs and said he had been forced to put his thumbprint on a police report he could not read. The driver, who was also arrested, escaped from a jail bathroom. It was later learned that the custody officer was his brother.

The panel of three judges upheld the assistant's sentence, but the prosecutor acknowledged afterward that he could not prove that the man knew about the contraband.

"We don't have the drugs, we don't have the driver, we don't even have photographs of the truck, and all this happened in Herat," nearly 800 miles away, said the prosecutor, Azim Afzali. "Only God knows if this poor guy was an accomplice to the real smuggler."

Some analysts here say they are pessimistic that the government will begin seriously pursuing drug traffickers and their official accomplices anytime soon, especially given what they call Karzai's chronic reluctance to make difficult decisions.

But others said Karzai is committed to the anti-drug fight. They noted that he recently made a tough speech empowering all provincial governors to take such actions as firing corrupt or incompetent police officers. He also recently named a new attorney general, Abdul Jabbar Sabit, who has a reputation for honesty and determination.

Perhaps most important, they said, the Afghan government, which is protected by tens of thousands of international troops and heavily dependent on foreign aid, knows it is under enormous international pressure to do the right thing on drugs. It has pledged to begin going after major traffickers, no matter how prominent or powerful.

At the special drug court this week, a line of gloomy men in leg irons and handcuffs hunched awkwardly in the hall, awaiting their hearings. The chief judge, a thoughtful man named Mohammad Zaman Sangari, called each one "son" and asked if he understood where he was and if he had an attorney. Most defendants seemed bewildered and resigned, and most were given stiff prison terms.

"As you can see, the real perpetrators are rarely arrested," Sangari said with a sigh after several hearings. "We have a few bigger cases, but this court is new and the law is new. These things take a lot of time and preparation."

He mentioned the names of several men arrested with large amounts of drugs. "Just wait a little while," the judge said, with a gleam in his eye. "We will be bringing in some much bigger fish."

A Voice In The Afghan Wilderness (WP)

By Bob Thompson

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Shortly after the Taliban fell in Afghanistan, NPR correspondent Sarah Chayes found herself reporting a story she was sure had enormous implications for both that country and the United States.

She couldn't get it on the air.

Five years later, in her new book, "The Punishment of Virtue: Inside Afghanistan After the Taliban," Chayes returns to this unheard story. It's a starting point for a detailed, highly personal exploration of the enormous price she believes the United States is paying for a mistake now so widely acknowledged it has become a cliche: intervening militarily with "no concept" of how to "create a working society after the intervention."

It goes like this:

In December 2001, Chayes rushed across the Pakistani border in the company of a young fighter affiliated with the forces of Gul Agha Shirzai, a local warlord. Shirzai's militiamen had just taken control of Kandahar, the fabled southern city that had been a key Taliban and al-Qaeda stronghold. The takeover, Chayes knew, was in defiance of the orders of newly anointed Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who had designated another group to hold Kandahar.

What Chayes didn't know was the role played by American Special Forces troops attached to Shirzai's militia. She imagined the Special Forces guys cursing the renegade warlord, then saying: "They're attacking, we'd better go along with them." But when she asked her militiaman escort, "This kid looked at me and said, 'The Americans? They told us to do it!' "

What a story, she thought: No sooner has the new central government taken power -- representing the promise of a better life for the long-suffering Afghan people -- than its authority is undermined by "American soldiers egging on a warlord to snatch Kandahar away from President Karzai."

For whatever reasons, her editors saw it differently. They told her it was nothing but "squabbling among the Afghans" and cut it from her "All Things Considered" report.

Chayes, who grew up in Cambridge, Mass., is a slim woman in her mid-forties with an intense gaze and a deeply bicultural life. She left NPR in 2002, after her reporting tour in Afghanistan ended, and accepted an invitation from Karzai's uncle to help run a fledgling nongovernmental organization called Afghans for Civil Society. At a recent book party in Bethesda, she kept tugging at the straps of her little black dress as though it were an unfamiliar foreign garment -- which, in a way, it is. In Afghanistan, she has long dressed like an Afghan man, the better to move around in a male-dominated society.

Earlier in the day, she'd been asked to appear on PBS's "NewsHour." There had been a horrific bombing in Kabul, and the question of the hour, she says, was "Why this uptick in violence now?"

Her answer: Actually, Afghan violence has been spiking higher and higher since late 2002. "You guys have just started to notice it."

Chayes's book represents a paradox of which its author is fully aware. She has used her years of non-journalistic experience to offer an intimate insider's tour through a complex universe Americans need to understand -- one in which warlordism, corruption and renewed Taliban activity have combined to undermine the "civil society" she was trying to nurture. Hers is the kind of fleshed-out portrait that even the best on-the-run journalism rarely provides.

Yet, in book form, her insights may come too late to influence the fate of her adopted home.

This is not to say she hasn't been trying in other ways. "I've been saying this stuff steadily since late 2002," she says: in op-eds, in speeches, in widely circulated e-mails and directly to every influential person she could collar. "Getting into these people's offices and bossing them around" is how she describes these efforts, with a laugh. To get a sense of what she means, you need only read the chapter in which she hands Karzai an unsolicited eight-point plan for ridding Afghanistan of warlords.

One of her Afghans for Civil Society colleagues, she says, believes "that I actually don't see obstacles," so when one appears, "I get all outraged: How dare there be an obstacle in my way!"

There's truth to this, but in the end, she's not so obtuse. Experience has taught her, over and over, how formidable the obstacles to Afghan progress are.

At the book party, she passed around a photograph of Muhammad Akrem Khakrezwal, who was chief of police in Kandahar for much of the time she's lived there. "Akrem won people over, and not just with words," she writes of the man who became a close friend and ally and whose spirit permeates her book. "Akrem won them over because he did something. He was effective. And he had vision."

In June 2005, he was assassinated. "The Punishment of Virtue" begins with a chapter on his funeral.

The Diplomatic Version

When John Brady Kiesling decided, in February 2003, that the looming United States invasion of Iraq would make it impossible for him, in good conscience, to remain in the U.S. Foreign Service, he carefully crafted a letter of resignation from his post as political counselor in the Athens embassy. Widely praised for its eloquence, the letter briefly made Kiesling semi-famous. Eventually, it helped earn him a tiny advance from Potomac Books.

Yet when he later reread the letter, says the author of the newly published "Diplomacy Lessons: Realism for an Unloved Superpower," he was startled to find that it contained a gaping hole.

"It was so obvious to me that Iraq was going to be a disaster," Kiesling says, "that nowhere in my letter had I explained why it was going to be a disaster. . . . My knowledge that Iraq would be a disaster was intuitive."

One way of looking at his book is as a two-year effort "to figure out where that intuition came from."

The short answer is that it came from 20 years of diplomatic postings in places such as Morocco, Greece and Armenia, where he worked extremely hard -- motivated in part by what he calls his "intellectual vanity" -- to understand the way Moroccans, Greeks and Armenians thought and acted. That is a diplomat's fundamental job, he says, and "a resource for the United States of America."

The longer answer involves specific mistakes made and lessons learned.

In a chapter titled "Diplomatic Skepticism and the Lessons of Iraq," for example, he tells the story of his "failure to prevent a Florida con man from bilking the government of Romania out of $250,000." He then speculates pointedly as to whether this kind of humbling experience might have kept Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld from falling so hard for Iraqi exile Ahmed Chalabi, "an indicted embezzler who had already been written off by both the CIA and the State Department as a swindler."

Mainly, however, "Diplomacy Lessons" is a plea that Kiesling's old profession be taken more seriously.

DOJ_NMG_0065248

"Diplomacy is not a miracle cure for anything," he says. "Diplomats bust their butts for years, and most of the time what they achieve is that the planet is still spinning around on its axis at about the same speed it was when they started. But that's actually an incredibly important task."

Inside Politics (WT)

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

Bubbapalooza

The Clinton Global Initiative gets under way in Manhattan tomorrow under the tutelage of former President Bill Clinton. The three-day anti-poverty event showcases one particularly piquant cultural moment: a forum featuring first lady Laura Bush, Mr. Clinton, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf and others, moderated by Thomas Friedman of the New York Times.

Yes, Al Gore will show up later in the week at the "CGI" to air his green laundry; Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, will chat up the empowerment of women. A thousand guests paid $15,000 each to attend what the Wall Street Journal deemed "a cross between a Hollywood premiere and a tent-revival meeting."

Mr. Clinton got burned by a few folks, though.

"A few participants at last year's fest 'pledged' to carry out programs that already were under way. In other words, the initiatives weren't specifically generated by the CGI. Moreover, not all participants followed through on their commitments. That's a no-no," the Journal noted.

"So this year, the Clinton folks have adopted a Reaganesque principle: Trust but verify ... CGI's 10-person 'commitments team' has been working with participants to develop pledges for this year's conference. Some commitments were made months ago. Others will emerge at the meeting itself, as attendees rub elbows and drink cocktails with 60 heads of state and celebrity philanthropists, such as Bill and Melinda Gates and Warren Buffett," Mr. Friedman wrote.

"Those who don't follow through on their pledges won't be invited back. 'Just under 20 participants from last year's conference weren't invited to this year's session,' " said spokesman Jay Carson.

It's a gas

Well, here's one more convenient liberal conspiracy theory put to rest:

"There's no evidence we can find to suggest that anyone in the White House or Congress is manipulating oil or gasoline prices to make for an easier trip on this fall's campaign trail," stated MSNBC's John Schoen yesterday on the network's Web site.

Laura alone

First lady Laura Bush made a broad and gracious global outreach of her own yesterday, appearing with President Bush, his mother -- and a former first lady in her own right -- Barbara Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings and other luminaries at the White House Conference on Global Literacy at the New York Public Library.

The first lady is a considerable draw: Thirty nations were represented by their "First Spouse" and 40 nations sent their education ministers. They have their work cut out for them. According to UNESCO, 771 million adults around the world cannot read; 85 percent live in just 35 countries and two-thirds are women.

"Women who can read are advocates for their children's education," Mrs. Bush said. "Literacy helps adults make informed decisions to protect their health and the health of their children, and literacy helps adults -- women and men -- learn the basic financial skills that generate income, that foster independence and that boost local economies."

Sharing the podium, Mr. Bush took it one step further.

"I am deeply concerned about the spread of radicalism," he said. "One reason radicals are able to recruit young men, for example, to become suicide bombers, is because of hopelessness. One way to defeat hopelessness is through literacy, ... giving people the fantastic hope that comes by being able to read and realize dreams."

It's a go for Alice

DOJ_NMG_0065249

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, has released his hold on a senior Justice Department nominee, clearing the way for a confirmation vote today for Alice Fisher to become assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Criminal Division.

The Republican leadership had forced Mr. Levin's hand through a parliamentary maneuver, according to one GOP staffer, while vowing to press for another nomination the lawmaker has also blocked -- that of Kenneth Wainstein to be head of the Justice Department's new National Security Division.

"Watch this space," the GOP staffer told United Press International.

Mr. Levin has held up the confirmation of Mrs. Fisher for more than two years, maintaining the Bush administration stonewalled his requests for information about her role in handling reports from FBI agents on detainee abuse at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Mrs. Fisher was chief of staff to Michael Chertoff, the head of the Criminal Division at the time; Mr. Wainstein was general counsel at the FBI.

A Democratic staffer said Mr. Levin thinks "this stonewalling is part of a pattern of the administration stymieing legitimate oversight," later adding, "There's a lot of smoke, and unfortunately, we are going to be forced to take a vote before we find out whether there's any fire."

Wooing 43 million

Are the young and restless politically engaged? Hardly. A new survey of 18- to 24-year-olds reveals that 81 percent of the age group "aren't aware" that all 435 members of the U.S. House of Representatives, one-third of the U.S. Senate (33 seats) and numerous other public offices are up for election Nov. 7.

Ninety-one percent were also unaware there was a deadline to register to vote, while 22 percent said they did not plan to register. The poll of 2,032 young adults was conducted throughout August by the Ad Council and the Federal Voting Assistance Program (FVAP) and released yesterday. According to Polli Brunelli, director of FVAP, a tidy 43 million votes are at stake.

The two organizations have created a motivational Web site -- complete with cheeky satire and a state-by-state voting guide -- to get their point across (www.payattention.org).

Ney sayer

Rep. Bob Ney, who has agreed to plead guilty to federal corruption charges, stepped down from two House committee positions yesterday, the Associated Press reported.

The Ohio Republican said in two letters to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, that he would resign as chairman of the Financial Services housing and community opportunity subcommittee, which oversees the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, and as head of the House Administration Committee's Franking Commission, which governs lawmakers' use of public money for their mailings.

Ohio Republican Party Chairman Bob Bennett called on Mr. Ney to resign Friday, after it was announced that the lawmaker would plead guilty to making false statements, conspiracy to commit fraud and other charges. The congressman is expected to plead guilty in less than a month.

Mr. Ney has not participated in House floor votes since Sept. 12. Spokesman David Popp would not comment on whether Mr. Ney would return to his elected duties before his term expires in January. Last week, his attorney, William Lawler, disclosed that Mr. Ney wasn't ready to resign and was seeking treatment for alcohol abuse.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

HP's Leak Probe Included Covert Surveillance, Analysis Of Thousands Of Records (SFC)

By Benjamin Pimentel

San Francisco Chronicle, September 19, 2006

Hewlett-Packard deployed covert surveillance teams and analyzed thousands of e-mails and phone records, including those of its executive council members, in its internal probe of media leaks, according to a source familiar with the investigation into the spying scandal.

HP's investigative team also sent e-mails embedded with software that could pinpoint addresses where the messages are eventually forwarded.

The group also carefully analyzed media reports, comparing quotes from unnamed sources with the language typically used by directors.

The HP probe even delved into the personal ties between former director George Keyworth, who was the main target of the company inquiry, and journalists to whom he was suspected of leaking information, the source said.

For example, HP's investigative team noted that the father of a CNet reporter who contributed to articles that cited an unnamed HP source knew and worked with Keyworth in New Mexico.

The investigation was carried out by a team that included personnel from HP's information technology and global security investigations units, and outside consultants including Ronald DeLia, managing director of Security Outsourcing Solutions of Boston and a Florida agency called Action Research Group.

HP has admitted to using false identities to obtain personal phone records, a practice called "pretexting."

Among the targets of this tactic were current and former directors and executives, including former CEO Carly Fiorina and former board member Thomas Perkins, the source said.

The HP probe also targeted two employees in the company's media relations group, Michael Moeller and Brigida Bergkamp.

Moeller confirmed that he was investigated, but said CEO Mark Hurd and Patricia Dunn have apologized that the probe included him.

"Mark and Pattie have both personally apologized to me," he said. "It speaks volumes that I am still working hard at my job."

Bergkamp said the company has no comment.

The HP team eventually zeroed in on Keyworth, who has resigned from the HP board.

The HP investigators came to their conclusion by tracing records of phone conversations between Keyworth and CNet reporter Dawn Kawamoto.

The company investigators also did a detailed comparison of quotes in articles with the way Keyworth speaks.

For example, an unnamed source quoted in one of Kawamoto's articles used the phrase, "I plan to recommend...," which was typically used by Keyworth at HP meetings.

To collect more information linking Kawamoto to the leaks, the HP team sent her an e-mail using a false account. The e-mail contained a software attachment that could determine to whom the message would be forwarded.

In other news related to the scandal, attorneys for a congressional committee investigating the corporate spying scandal at Hewlett-Packard have begun going through documents and other materials turned over by the company as part of a house investigation.

"We have received a lot of documents," said committee spokesman Terry Lane. "We anticipate revealing what we have learned from these documents at the hearing."

The committee has requested HP executives, including Dunn and in-house counsel Ann Baskins, to testify before the house energy and commerce committee on the panel's probe of HP.

Also invited to testify are Silicon Valley Attorney Larry Sonsini and DeLia, the private investigator involved in the HP probe.

The problems for HP began in early 2005, when then-CEO Fiorina and other directors began looking into leaks of board deliberations to the news media.

After Fiorina was fired, her successor as chairwoman, Dunn, pursued the investigation, which eventually pointed to Keyworth.

Dunn has said she was not aware that potentially illegal methods were used in the investigation. She has agreed to step down as chairwoman in January and will be replaced by Hurd.

HP faces other inquiries, including probes by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the California state Attorney General and the Justice Department.

HP Scandal Shines Light On A Simple, Treacherous Act (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

When Adam Yuzuk had a question about his cellphone bill, a Cingular Wireless agent told him to check his online account.

The only problem: He hadn't established one.

That day in June 2005, Yuzuk, a former president of a New York leather accessories firm, discovered someone had used his Social Security number and a fake e-mail address to set up his online account and view his calling records.

He learned this year, as part of a legal dispute with his former partners in the firm, that they had paid a private investigator to dig up information on him, including $300 for his phone records.

Yuzuk's case was featured at a congressional hearing in June, part of lawmakers' effort to curb pretexting -- the act of impersonating someone to obtain their personal records. The drive has gained fresh momentum with recent revelations that a firm hired by a Hewlett-Packard Co. subcontractor used the technique to obtain phone records of the firm's directors and journalists. A House subcommittee is probing HP's practices.

Federal legislation is pending that would criminalize the use of pretexting to obtain phone records. Some states have passed laws banning it, and states, phone companies and the Federal Trade Commission are suing data brokers who practice it. Despite such efforts, including a 1999 law banning pretexting to obtain financial records, the industry continues to thrive. It is driven by systemic weaknesses in retail, financial and other sectors; lax company security standards; and demand from lawyers, debt collectors, and even law enforcement and tabloid journalists, experts said.

"The simplicity of acquiring information like this is almost sad," said James Rapp, who made $1 million annually using the technique -- which included getting information on JonBenet Ramsey and Monica Lewinsky-- until he was convicted on racketeering charges and put of out business in 1999.

"Companies make a statement that we have privacy, but when it gets right down to it, if you or anybody calls up and asks for information on me, if you ask nice enough, they'll give it," Rapp said.

In June, Yuzuk, his voice trembling in anger, told a congressional panel his story: After he learned in June 2005 that his Cingular account had been hacked, he had a supervisor put a password on it and red-flag it -- moves that would keep his information safe from prying eyes, the supervisor assured him.

"I wanted the highest level of security possible," he told the House Energy and Commerce investigative subcommittee.

Then last April, Yuzuk legally obtained documents revealing that a former partner, Steve Kahn, had hired Michele Gambino of Gambino Information Services Inc. to retrieve his cellphone records.

Gambino Information Services, whose Web site notes the firm can conduct "informative telephone" conversations to "obtain various types of information," prepared a file for Kahn that included four months of phone bill detail, with two sets of records printed in September and October.

"This means that someone broke into my Cingular account two additional times after my account was password-protected and I was given what I believed was the highest level of security," he said.

In May, Cingular sued Gambino and Kahn in federal court in Atlanta. Kahn settled, but the case against Gambino continues, Cingular attorney David L. Balser said.

On Monday, Yuzuk and his former partners reached a settlement that includes a confidentiality clause forbidding them from discussing the case.

Reached for comment, Gambino said she was not interested in speaking to a reporter and hung up.

Rob Douglas, a former private investigator and now an information security consultant in Colorado, said Gambino has a degree of notoriety in the business.

It was Gambino who made the pretext call that gave a young New Hampshire man the work address of Amy Boyer, a former high school classmate he was obsessed with, according to the Boyer family's lawyer, David Gottesman. In October 1999, Liam Youens shot and killed Boyer at her workplace.

Then he killed himself.

Boyer's mother sued Gambino and the Internet investigative firm that had hired her for wrongful death and invasion of privacy. The case was settled.

"There has been no single event that has changed my life more than the murder of Amy," said Douglas, who was a consultant on the case and left the private investigation business in 2000. He said he is determined to stop the subterfuge. He called the fact that Gambino is still in business "unconscionable."

The business is a booming one, worth at least $30 million annually, congressional investigators estimate. When Rapp, 46, turned off the lights in his office for good, he had 15 employees and 1,500 clients. His employees went to work for others or started their own practices, he said.

"If you can make $200 an hour, literally, and you work a couple of hours a day, that's wonderful," he said. "You can make great money."

Firms that use pretexting, the number of which has multiplied through the ease of Internet advertising, offer quick results.

First Source Information, a Florida company, offered "1 to 2 hour turnaround time" with "volume discounts available," according to records obtained by the House committee. An online subsidiary, LocateCell.com, which offered guarantees of "no data returned, no charge for the search," charged $110 for cellphone call records.

First Source was sued in December by Cingular and then by the state of Florida and other carriers. An Atlanta judge earlier this year ordered it to stop impersonating to obtain phone records, essentially shutting it down.

Douglas said firms that are closed often reappear under different names and that data brokers will repackage their services to get around laws. Despite the 1999 law criminalizing financial pretexting, he said, search firms are advertising services for obtaining financial records.

So how do they get the information? There are myriad ways, all playing off the company's willingness to please.

Setting up an online account is fairly easy once an investigator has a Social Security number, which can be obtained through commercial databases, Douglas said.

"You can go in and convince the phone company that the security code hasn't been set or needs to be reset, then you can go and change it to anything you want," Rapp said.

A more common way, he said, involves two calls.

In the first, an investigator poses as a customer to find out the balance, where to send the payment or how much was paid on the last bill.

With that data, Rapp said, "I call in a little bit later. I say I have an issue. I work for Acme Insurance and I get reimbursed for my expenses. I put out a little over two grand this month. I need that money, but I don't have everything I need."

Knowing the amount paid on the last bill establishes credibility. By saying that the call detail didn't appear on the bill, the investigator can cajole the operator into giving him an item-by-item recount, Rapp said.

E-mails and chat-room discussions on file with the House subcommittee's investigative panel shed more light on the practice.

Michele Yontef, an investigator whose skills have earned her the nickname "Ma Bell," asked a colleague in an August 2005 e-mail to help her get information on a Verizon cellphone number. "Merlindata (a commercial database) usually unblocks last 4 of SSN but on this target I cant get, do you have another database that possibly unblocks, if not, let me know and I will try to pretext it out of operator," she wrote.

Yontef, reached by phone last week, declined a request for an interview.

In a chat-room discussion in December, a participant identified as a Florida investigator wrote: "Many times the phone company will tell you that such and such is not available, but if you talk to the tech people, they'll tell you that they have it."

Authorities have focused their efforts on the data brokers but have largely ignored the brokers' clients. "There is mounting evidence that attorneys are top consumers of pretexting services," Chris Hoofnagle, former West Coast director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, wrote in a February letter to state bar ethics committees and the American Bar Association. The center has urged state ethics boards to review the technique under their ethical rules.

It also has identified dozens of Web sites that offer to obtain personal information through pretexting and has submitted the names of 40 such sites to the FTC for investigation and petitioned the Federal Communications Commission to protect individuals' phone records.

Larry Slade, a Los Angeles attorney for several data brokers, said his clients have long provided their services for free to law enforcement agencies. Until recently, that included obtaining phone records.

"I have a two-inch stack of documents, faxed requests from local, state and federal law enforcement," he said. "A lot of them are pre-investigative, whether they should pursue something, to help them identify possible suspects."

Paul Kilcoyne, an investigative director with the Department of Homeland Security's U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, testified in June that agents in the Denver office "appeared to have used (data brokers) to quickly filter out numbers that were not related to their investigation. The data re-sellers were able to respond to these requests for information within a few days, whereas cellular phone companies typically take several weeks."

Kilcoyne's office is drafting guidelines that encourage agents in its field offices to discontinue use of such services. He noted that law enforcement officials have subpoena tools to obtain the data.

The House subcommittee will hold a hearing on HP on Sept. 28 and has called to testify outgoing HP chairman Patricia C. Dunn, general counsel Ann Baskins, global investigations manager Anthony Gentilucci, an outside counsel, a Boston security consultant and a Florida investigator.

The bottom line is, the phone companies need to tighten their security measures, said Jeannine Kenney, a senior policy analyst with Consumers Union.

"The carriers would very much like to act as though the only problem here are the bad actors fraudulently obtaining phone records," she said. But, "they share the records far too liberally with their contractors and other third parties. In some cases, they may sell it. They don't have sufficient safeguards in place to make sure someone can't fraudulently obtain it."

Internal Security Expert Told H-P Its Leak Probe Might Be Illegal (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman And Steve Stecklow

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

A computer-crimes specialist with Hewlett-Packard Co. emailed his superiors this year warning that the company's investigation of board leaks -- then still in progress -- was being conducted in a manner that could be illegal, according to people familiar with the situation.

Specifically, Fred Adler, an official in H-P's global security office in Roseville, Calif., wrote that acquiring people's phone records through false pretenses could be against the law, these people said. H-P has since admitted that investigators working for the company used such a method, known as pretexting, in obtaining phone records of its directors, two H-P employees, nine journalists and an unspecified number of outsiders.

It is unclear who in H-P's management received the warning from Mr. Adler, a former Federal Bureau of Investigation special agent. Mr. Adler's unit is headed by Jim Fairbaugh, H-P's head of global security, whom people close to the matter have said worked on the leak probe.

The email raises new questions about when H-P executives and lawyers became aware that their investigators might be breaking the law, a question on which state and federal authorities are focusing. H-P and its contractors are being investigated by the FBI and California's attorney general for the use of pretexting in the probe to identify the source of internal board leaks.

H-P has said the Palo Alto, Calif., company and its chairman, Patricia Dunn, who launched one leak probe in early 2005 and another in January 2006, were assured by lawyers for H-P's private investigators that the techniques they used in the probe were legal.

Additionally, H-P's outside lawyer, Larry Sonsini, wrote in an email in June that the investigation was run by H-P's legal department, with outside experts, and that H-P's general counsel, Ann Baskins, "looked into the legality of every step of the inquiry and was satisfied that it was conducted properly."

A person familiar with the matter said Mr. Sonsini, of law firm Wilson, Sonsini, Goodrich & Rosati, also was pretexted in the board-leak probe. Mr. Adler referred questions to H-P's spokesman, Robert Sherbin, who declined to comment. Mr. Fairbaugh didn't return phone calls seeking comment. An assistant for Mr. Sonsini said he wasn't reachable for comment.

What H-P management did or didn't know about the leak probe -- including potential illegalities -- is at the center of the criminal investigation being conducted by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer. Investigators in his office's special-crimes unit are poring over documents obtained from H-P to piece together the chain of events and relationships that led to H-P's March 10 summary report on the leak investigation. That document, which named director George Keyworth as a leaker of information to the news media, summarized the personal-phone data that supported that conclusion. Mr. Keyworth quit the H-P board last week.

The U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee also is investigating the H-P scandal, and a person close to the committee said Ms. Dunn and Ms. Baskins have indicated they will testify at the committee's hearing on the matter set for Sept. 28. Mr. Sonsini hasn't said whether he will accept the committee's request to testify, this person said.

H-P has said Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd received that summary information but didn't know until some time later that the evidence may have been obtained improperly. The probe continued into April and possibly into May, said people familiar with H-P's probe.

H-P's investigation was carried out by a network of contractors, said a person familiar with the situation. Part of the investigation was handled out of H-P's Boston security office and by one of its officials there, Tony Gentilucci. Mr. Gentilucci contracted out the investigation to a Needham, Mass., investigator, Ronald DeLia, and his firm, Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. They in turned employed another contractor, Action Research Group of Melbourne, Fla. Action Research then parceled out some of the investigative work to another company, said this person.

Mr. DeLia couldn't be reached for comment. His attorney, John Kiernan, didn't return phone calls seeking comment. Mr. DeLia has indicated that were he to appear at next week's House hearing he would invoke his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, said a person close to the committee. The link leading from H-P through to Action Research was first reported in The New York Times.

This isn't the first time Action Research Group, an information broker, has been linked to a case involving pretexting. In 2000, Roger Clemons, a private investigator in Nashville, Tenn., sued Action Research in federal court for obtaining his cellular phone records by falsely impersonating him.

Mr. Clemons alleged that another private investigator working on a divorce case hired Action Research to get the phone records. His suit claimed a person working for Action Research contacted Mr. Clemons's cellphone-service provider, impersonated him and obtained phone billing records by fax. Action Research then sold copies of the phone records to the private investigator for $748.25, the suit claimed.

Besides Action Research, Mr. Clemons sued the private investigator and the client, accusing them of violating a federal wiretap statute. He lost the case and an appeal, with the courts ruling that the statute wasn't violated because receiving the faxed phone records didn't constitute an illegal interception.

Mr. Clemons didn't return a call seeking comment. Joseph DePante, owner of Action Research, declined to comment.

Action Research Group's Web site states that the company, founded in 1989, specializes in locating missing debtors. The site states: "When a debtor leaves you with a cell number, PO Box, disconnected number or has changed his number to a non-published number leaving you with nothing current what do you do? CALL US! ALL OF OUR INFORMATION IS 100% CURRENT AS OF TODAY! NO DATABASES OR MONTH OLD INFORMATION HERE!"

Privilege Likely To Be No Protection For HP Execs Summoned By Congress (LAW)

By Susan Beck And Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 19, 2006

The woes of Larry Sonsini and Hewlett-Packard Co. General Counsel Ann Baskins are growing. On Friday, the House Committee on Energy and Commerce revealed that it has asked both to testify at a Sept. 28 hearing entitled "Hewlett-Packard's Pretexting Scandal."

In most circumstances, lawyers can safely stand behind the attorney-client privilege and refuse to discuss client matters. But congressional committee investigations are a different, and more demanding, creature. "The House in theory does not recognize the attorney-client privilege," said David Kendall, of Washington, D.C.'s Williams & Connolly, who had frequent contact with House committees when he represented the Clintons in Whitewater investigations.

Leslie Fagen, a partner at New York's Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison, agreed. "Congressional committees don't necessarily acknowledge the attorney-client privilege," he said. In the 1990s, he had to testify before a committee investigating his client, the Metropolitan Transit Authority. Another lawyer who has represented clients before House committees says these committees can take a hard line.

"They're virtually intolerant of the attorney-client privilege -- and you can easily imagine a contempt citation if the witness refuses to testify."

In addition to Sonsini and Baskins, the committee has asked HP Chairwoman Patricia Dunn to testify, along with Ronald DeLia, the Boston private investigator who allegedly accessed the phone records of directors and reporters.

The Hewlett-Packard mess began when Dunn ordered an investigation to identify the source of leaks about board deliberations. On Saturday, Hewlett-Packard acknowledged that it improperly accessed phone records of two employees, including its own spokesman, during its internal investigation of media leaks. The company spokesman, Michael Moeller, said that Dunn and Chief Executive Mark Hurd both apologized to him.

Sonsini is the board's longtime outside counsel, but it's not entirely clear what role he played in the probe. In a June e-mail to former HP director Thomas Perkins, Sonsini wrote: "I was not involved in the design or conduct of the investigation," but instead that it was run by the HP legal department. "I am sure that Ann Baskins looked into the legality of every step of the inquiry," he added in the e-mail. Perkins resigned in May because of the probe and its methods.

Sonsini, who was asked to review the probe, also told Perkins that the pretexting -- in which someone lied about his identity to get the phone records -- was "within legal limits." He later told The Wall Street Journal that he was relying on the conclusion of an in-house lawyer. Sonsini has continued to advise the board on the controversy, according to press reports.

The committee's letters to Sonsini, Baskins and the others are cast as "invitations" to testify. But, according to one lawyer whose clients have received similar letters, the invited witness has little choice. "We've never declined [an invitation]," says this lawyer. "I can't imagine declination is a viable option." The committee also has the power to issue subpoenas to compel witnesses to appear.

Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati spokesperson Courtney Dorman did not respond to questions asking whether Sonsini plans to testify or whether he plans to assert privilege. It's also not clear if Sonsini has retained a lawyer.

HP spokesperson Ryan Donovan declined to comment Monday on whether Dunn or Baskins intended to appear at the upcoming hearing. While it is not known if DeLia will appear at the hearing, his lawyer John Kiernan has told The Boston Globe that DeLia is cooperating with investigations of Hewlett-Packard Co.'s conduct, saying, "We are trying to cooperate with everybody."

According to Kendall, the penalty for asserting the privilege could be more severe than a contempt citation. "If somebody asserts [the privilege], the House could lock that person up in the House of Representatives detention facility." Kendall notes, however, that he's not aware of that happening.

The parties usually negotiate a nonwaiver agreement that allows a witness to testify about specified matters, with the House agreeing that it won't assert that the witness has waived the privilege on all matters. Paul Weiss' Fagen says he negotiated with congressional staff which topics he would discuss. But even a nonwaiver agreement creates risk. "The danger with that," said Kendall, "is that [the agreement] is not binding on third parties." California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, for example, could assert that Sonsini or Baskins waived the privilege by testifying.

Another possible problem for Sonsini and Baskins is the so-called crime-fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege. Under that doctrine, the privilege is invalidated if a client used a lawyer to commit a fraud or crime. "The conduct would have had to have broached the possibility of criminal conduct," said Deborah Rhode, a Stanford Law School professor. If so, Sonsini and Baskins would clearly not be bound by privilege, she said. She adds that it doesn't matter whether they had criminal intent, or whether they were responsible for any crime.

Enron Ex-Officer Delainey Sentenced To 2 1/2 Years (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Laurel Brubaker Calkins

Bloomberg, September 19, 2006

Sept. 18 (Bloomberg) -- Former Enron Corp. executive David Delainey was sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison after prosecutors urged leniency, saying he helped unravel crimes at the energy company.

U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt in Houston imposed the prison term and a $60,000 fine for insider trading today on Delainey, 40, former head of Enron energy trading and retail energy services. Prosecutors asked for a light sentence, citing Delainey's cooperation after he pleaded guilty in 2003.

Delainey is the first former Enron executive ordered to prison since the Houston-based company's former top executives, Kenneth Lay, 64, and Jeffrey Skilling, 52, were convicted in May of spearheading the fraud that destroyed the company. Lay died six weeks later.

``You were not middle management," Hoyt said, ordering Delainey taken into custody. ``You were upper management. Eight or 10 of you represented the heart and soul of Enron."

Two other lower-ranking Enron defendants have been granted probation since the Lay-Skilling trial.

Timothy DeSpain, 41, a former assistant treasurer, was sentenced Sept. 15 to four months' house arrest and four years' probation for manipulating Enron's credit rating. Lawrence Lawyer, 38, a finance executive who didn't report income from an off-books partnership disguising debt, got two years' probation in June.

Two ex-prosecutors, now criminal defense lawyers, called Delainey's sentence fair.

Fair Sentence

``If the government believes in the seriousness of the offense, then even people who cooperate and testified should expect to do some time," said Ed Tomko, who is defending an Enron Broadband Services executive, Rex Shelby, on fraud and insider-trading charges. ``Otherwise, the government is saying Enron was the crime of the century, but if you help us it ain't so bad."

Brian Wice, a specialist in criminal appeals, said Delainey should serve time despite his cooperation.

``You shouldn't be able to walk out scot-free because you sang the government's song," Wice said. ``People who weren't innocent bystanders have to understand there are consequences for their actions, and that doesn't include catching the elevator with the jury when it's over."

Delainey admitted selling more than $4.26 million in Enron stock from January 2000 to October 2001 using inside knowledge of distortions of company financial statements.

`Herculean' Help

The former senior manager forfeited nearly $8 million in illegal profits as part of his plea deal.

Delainey's cooperation in the investigation of Enron corruption was ``nothing short of Herculean,'' prosecutors said, asking for a sentence substantially below federal guidelines.

Without specifically recommending probation, the government praised Delainey for his role in the investigation.

``Mr. Delainey's assistance at that early stage was critical to the government's efforts to work its way up the chain of responsibility at Enron," Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn Ruemmler wrote last week to the court. ``The timing of Mr. Delainey's assistance was one of the turning points in the government's investigation of wrongdoing at Enron."

Delainey was the first high-ranking Enron operating executive to enter a cooperation deal with the government describing Enron as a criminal enterprise where numerous employees engaged in frauds designed to disguise debt and make the company appear healthy.

Need for Insiders

``The government could not have gotten to the bottom of what happened at Enron without the assistance of insiders," Ruemmler wrote. ``Put simply, Mr. Delainey stepped up to the plate at a critical juncture in the government's investigation and at a time when others did not."

Delainey testified Skilling and others restructured business units to hide losses in Enron's retail energy services division. The collapse of Enron, once the world's largest energy company, wiped out more than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee retirement money.

Delainey agreed when he pleaded guilty to serve as long as 10 years, the statutory maximum for one count of insider trading. His deal said he might be granted probation, if prosecutors felt his cooperation was substantial enough.

Before his sentencing, Delainey wrote a seven-page memo to Hoyt telling how he slipped into criminal conduct.

`Intoxicating' Success

``The promotions and success became intoxicating," Delainey wrote, even as he ``participated in a number of financial statement manipulations and misrepresentations that I knew were wrong."

In refusing to let Delainey stay out of prison, the judge said the single count of insider trading wasn't all he might have been charged with.

``You and I both know there was a substantial amount of uncharged conduct that could've been charged in your case," Hoyt said.

To prosecutors, he said, ``I am not an instrument of the Department of Justice nor an arm of the defense bar."

Hoyt imposed the $60,000 fine, saying it costs $2,000 a month to house a federal prisoner and he wanted Delainey to pay for his 30 months of incarceration.

``You made a lot of money," Hoyt told Delainey. ``You really haven't lost any of it."

Victims' Fund

The judge directed that the fine go to an SEC-administered fund to compensate Enron victims.

When the judge said Delainey must be jailed today, Ruemmler started to protest.

Delainey will be on probation for two years after completing his 30-month sentence. If he goes home to Calgary, his probation will be suspended while he is out of the country and resume when he re-enters the U.S.

Lay, a former ex-chairman and chief executive officer, and Skilling, a former CEO, were convicted May 25 of deceiving shareholders about the company's performance and finances.

Skilling faces more than 20 years in prison and forfeiture of as much as $184 million when he is sentenced Oct. 23. He said he will appeal his conviction.

Lay died in July, before being sentenced. His estate has asked that his conviction be thrown out under a legal principle that erases convictions of people who die without exhausting their appeals.

The case is U.S. v. Delainey, H-03-420, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

Ex-Enron Exec Gets 2 1/2 Years In Prison (AP-Y)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

A former high-ranking Enron Corp. trading and retail energy executive was sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison Monday for insider trading in connection with the energy company's financial collapse.

David Delainey, who pleaded guilty in October 2003, had admitted to participating in schemes to manipulate earnings to please Wall Street. Prosecutors said he sold $4.25 million in stock throughout 2001 when he knew of a wide-ranging scheme to make Enron appear financially robust and inflate the company's stock.

"I'm so very sorry for my conduct," Delainey, 40, said before he was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt.

The Canadian citizen faced up to 10 years in prison. Prosecutors had recommended he receive a sentence on the lower end of the guideline range due to his cooperation in their investigation of Enron's collapse. He testified earlier this year in the trial of company founder Kenneth Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling.

His defense attorney, John Dowd, asked Hoyt to give his client probation, adding that Delainey had already made restitution — agreeing to pay $4.25 million to the Justice Department and $3.74 million to the Securities and Exchange Commission — and had suffered public humiliation.

"He never gave in to the temptation to cover up," Dowd told Hoyt. "He made an extraordinary effort to tell the whole truth."

Prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler told Hoyt that Delainey's help in their investigation of Enron's collapse was "critical to the case" and he was always forthcoming with information.

"He has never wavered from accepting responsibility for what he did," she said.

But Hoyt dismissed the request for probation, telling Delainey that any public humiliation he had faced was "a consequence of your conduct, not a punishment for it" and that any punishment he handed down would have to be a reflection of all of Delainey's actions and not just of the specific crime he pleaded guilty to.

"You and I know that this conduct (regarding) the Enron scheme is a lot deeper, a lot wider, even on your part," he told Delainey, who agreed.

Hoyt also ordered that Delainey, who had been free on his own recognizance, be taken into federal custody immediately.

After the court hearing ended, Delainey held his crying wife Dawna's hand for a few minutes before he was escorted away.

Hoyt also ordered that Delainey pay the SEC another $60,000 to be given to victims of Enron's collapse.

Enron crumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001, obliterating thousands of jobs and $60 billion in market value.

In February, during the trial of Lay and Skilling, Delainey testified he reluctantly acquiesced to a Skilling-approved plan to hide $200 million in losses.

Delainey ran the wholesale trading franchise until 2001, when he was chosen to take the helm of a highly touted retail energy unit, Enron Energy Services. Delainey testified Skilling gave the go-ahead to a plan to move the retail unit's trading arm into the larger trading franchise to hide the losses.

Delainey also said Enron wrongly dipped into reserves from the company's wholesale division to meet and beat earnings targets under pressure from Skilling.

Lay and Skilling's 16-week trial ended in May when a federal court jury convicted the two men.

Skilling, who faces sentencing Oct. 23, was convicted of 19 counts of conspiracy, securities fraud, lying to auditors and insider trading. Jurors acquitted him of nine counts of insider trading regarding a series of Enron stock trades in 2000.

Lay was convicted of six counts of conspiracy, securities fraud and wire fraud and in a separate case was convicted by a federal judge of one count of bank fraud and three counts of making false statements to banks.

He died of heart disease July 5 while vacationing with his wife in Aspen, Colo. Lay's attorneys have filed motions arguing that his death "necessitates" erasing his convictions. Prosecutors are hoping that Congress passes legislation that will prevent Lay's record from being wiped clean due to his death.

Former Enron Executive Sentenced (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Delainey Aided Prosecutors in Fraud Trial of Lay, Skilling

A former high-ranking Enron Corp. executive was sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison yesterday by a federal judge who acknowledged the official's cooperation with prosecutors but refused to give him the substantial break he requested.

David W. Delainey, 40, led two of the Houston energy trader's most important divisions before Enron filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December 2001. He pleaded guilty to a single count of insider trading and became a central witness against former chief executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling in their fraud trial this year.

Delainey admitted to selling Enron stock at the same time he knew the company was manipulating its financial statements. As part of his October 2003 guilty plea, Delainey turned over about $8 million to the government to resolve criminal and civil charges.

The insider-trading charge carried a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison. But John M. Dowd, a defense lawyer based in the District, had sought probation, given Delainey's detailed testimony about face-to-face meetings with Skilling and Lay, who were convicted by a jury in May. Delainey was the second senior Enron insider to admit wrongdoing and to help prosecutors in their long-running investigation.

Kathryn H. Ruemmler, deputy director of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, filed court papers Friday citing Delainey's "impressive and extraordinary" assistance. She wrote that he "stepped up to the plate at a critical juncture in the government's investigation and at a time when others did not."

But U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt in Houston rejected the defense's bid for probation, telling Delainey, a Canadian citizen, that he could have faced far more extensive criminal charges for his conduct at Enron.

Hoyt directed U.S. marshals to take Delainey into custody minutes after handing down the sentence, which includes two years of probation and a $60,000 payment to a victim fund. The marshals allowed Delainey to remove his tie and belt and to share a moment with his crying wife, Dawna, according to people in the courtroom at the time. The couple's two daughters, ages 9 and 12, were not present.

In advance of the proceeding, Delainey had written the judge a seven-page, single-spaced letter saying that Enron's "mercenary culture . . . was always very fast and loose with the rules." He said that his compensation and frequent promotions "blurred the line between right and wrong."

Dowd, of the law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP, said he is considering options for appeal of the sentence and the judge's decision to remand Delainey into custody without bond.

Delainey's sentence came three days after a different federal judge in Houston sentenced former Enron assistant treasurer Timothy DeSpain to four months of house arrest and four years of probation for conspiring to commit securities fraud. The company's onetime finance chief, Andrew S. Fastow, is to be sentenced by Hoyt on Sept. 26.

CA Negotiating Profit Recovery With Ex-Officials, Swainson Says (BLOOM)

By Ron Day

Bloomberg, September 19, 2006

Sept. 18 (Bloomberg) -- CA Inc., the world's second-largest maker of mainframe computer software, is negotiating with former employees to return money they made in a $2.2 billion accounting fraud, Chief Executive Officer John Swainson said.

CA is talking with ex-officials who have pleaded guilty to participating in the fraud, Swainson said, without naming the executives, after CA's annual meeting in New York. At least eight former employees, including ex-CEO Sanjay Kumar, admitted to illegally inflating sales by backdating contracts.

CA, formerly known as Computer Associates, will submit a plan to a Delaware judge in about a month outlining how it wishes to recover the money. Swainson said the money should be returned to current CA shareholders. CA paid a $225 million fine and is operating under the watch of the U.S. Justice Department.

``The company has funded largely this investigation that resulted in the conviction or the pleading guilty of the individuals, and the money belongs to our current shareholders and we should return it to them," Swainson said. The court will decide if former or current shareholders get the money, he said.

The plan to recover the money is being written by a board of directors committee that includes Renato Zambonini and William McCracken, Swainson said.

Shares of Islandia, New York-based CA rose 11 cents to $23.61 at 3:23 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. The shares had lost 17 percent this year before today.

Besides Kumar, former executives who have pleaded guilty include sales executive Stephen Richards, finance chief Ira Zar, general counsel Steven Woghin, and vice presidents Thomas Bennett, David Kaplan, David Rivard and Lloyd Silverstein.

Shareholders today elected all 11 company nominations to its board, including former U.S. Senator Alfonse D'Amato, who had been opposed by three proxy advisers.

Swainson, 52, also said he hopes the company reaches $6 billion in annual bookings by 2009, up from about $4 billion currently.

FBI Says Violent Crime Rose In 2005 (WP/AP)

By Hope Yen, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Violent crime rose 2.3 percent last year, the first increase since 2001, the FBI reported Monday. The agency found there were 1.39 million violent crimes _ which include rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault _ reported in the United States in 2005, up from 1.36 million the previous year.

The figures from the FBI's 2005 annual report largely track preliminary results from earlier this year.

The percentage jump was violent crime's largest increase since 1991, with only rape showing a decline in the past year.

The report comes as mayors and police chiefs at a recent crime conference said they were seeing spikes in violent crime for 2006. They have called for greater support from federal law enforcement, expressing concern that the Bush administration might be too complacent as it devotes time and attention to the war on terror.

In a briefing with reporters, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said it was still too soon to tell whether the numbers reflect ordinary year-to-year fluctuations. The figures are good news in the sense that violent crime has dropped 3.4 percent since 2001 and declined 17.6 percent since 1996, he said.

"It's certainly caused us to remain vigilant especially considering the anecdotal information in 2006 indicates there might be a rise in violent crime in several jurisdictions," McNulty said. "I'm anxious to spend more time with the police chiefs."

But he reiterated comments by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales earlier this month that additional crime-fighting funds for cities were not in the offing, noting that the war on terror remains the greater priority. "We have a problem of limited resources," McNulty said.

Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, which organized the recent conference on violent crime, said his group is looking forward to additional meetings with McNulty to find ways to combat the problem.

Property crime, including car theft, larceny and burglary, fell 1.5 percent in 2005.

Violent Crimes Rise After Years Of Falling (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's murder rate rose 1.8% last year after hitting a two-decade low in 2004, the FBI said Monday in a report that raised questions about whether violent crime rates will continue to head up after years of decline.

The overall rate for violent crimes — murder, rape, robbery and aggravated assault — rose 1.3% in 2005 but remained far below the high set in 1991, when homicide rates in many cities soared amid a sluggish economy and gang wars. Last year, in fact, the rate for rapes alone fell 2.2% and was the lowest it had been in more than 20 years.

The jump in the overall rate for violent crimes, however, gave ammunition to several police officials who have complained that the U.S. government has allowed anti-crime initiatives to languish as it has focused on anti-terrorism efforts here and abroad.

“This report should serve as a strong wake-up call,” said Police Chief Gil Kerlikowske in Seattle, which recorded a 25% increase in gun-related crime last year. “We better realign our focus to the war going on in some of our cities.”

Edward Flynn, police commissioner in Springfield, Mass., said local police agencies have yet to recover from the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, which led the federal government to redirect tens of millions of dollars in grants away from policing projects and toward homeland security programs.

“Police can't be good homeland security partners if they cannot do their core missions,” said Flynn, whose city of 155,000 had 18 homicides last year, double the number from 2000. “People need to see this as a sign for concern.”

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said Monday that it was “too soon” to determine whether the FBI report represented a significant departure from the annual declines in crime recorded during much of the past decade.

DOJ_NMG_0065261

During a briefing at the Justice Department, McNulty said anecdotal evidence from the first part of this year suggests there "might be a rise in violent crime in some jurisdictions." However, he noted that the overall crime rate — for violent and property offenses — remained low compared with the past 30 years.

McNulty said the recent increases in violent offenses could reflect a convergence of factors: a rise in gang membership, the spread of highly addictive methamphetamine and the increasing numbers of young people who are 18 to 24, the age group that generally commits the most crimes.

"The terrorism mission," he said, "has not cost us anything" in fighting crime domestically.

Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, a national association of law enforcement officials, said the FBI report was "not all gloom and doom." He cited declines in reported property crimes.

However, Wexler said members of his group are concerned about increasing violence across the nation. "We believe we're on the front end of a tipping point on violent crime."

Violent Crime In U.S. Rises For First Time Since 2001 (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, September 19, 2006

Sept. 18 (Bloomberg) -- Violent crime in the U.S. rose 2.3 percent last year, the first increase since 2001, according to an FBI study.

Murders increased by 3.4 percent over 2004 in the annual report on crime released by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Washington. Property crime, including motor vehicle theft, larceny and burglary, fell 1.5 percent. Victims of property crimes lost an estimated $16.5 billion last year, the report said.

The report ``overall is good news," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty because it shows the total crime rate is at its lowest in more than 30 years. Still, he said the increase in violent crime ``certainly causes us to remain vigilant."

The report may give more ammunition to critics of the Bush administration's crime policies, including local police chiefs and mayors. State and local officials say violent crime has been ignored at the federal level because terrorism and homeland security are a bigger priority.

Providence, Rhode Island, Police Chief Dean Esserman earlier this month said the federal government's overriding attention to terrorism ``concerns me the most" when looking at the rise in violent crime.

``Why can't we focus on domestic crime as well as homeland defense?" he said in an interview. ``We seem to have abandoned one to focus on the other."

Gang Membership

McNulty, speaking with reporters at Justice Department headquarters, said he has heard the local chiefs' complaints. While McNulty said it is ``too soon to know" why violent crime is up, he cited increases in gang membership and methamphetamine use as possible causes.

Today's survey contrasts with a Justice Department report last week that found the 2005 violent crime rate unchanged from the year before. That study didn't count murders. Both reports say that longer-term statistics show an overall decrease in crime.

While violent crime rose last year, it has fallen 17.6 percent since 1996, the FBI said.

The FBI report -- compiled from information provided by more than 17,000 city, county, state, tribal and federal law enforcement agencies -- said there were 1,390,695 violent crimes reported nationwide in 2005. There were 10,166,159 property crimes reported.

Law enforcement agencies made about 14.1 million arrests in 2005, the study found.

FBI Says Violent Crime Up In 2005 (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

Violent crime nationwide rose last year by 2.3 percent, while property crime fell 1.5 percent during the same period, according to a report released yesterday by the FBI.

FBI spokesman Bill Carter said the bureau's 2005 annual report on crime said 1.39 million violent crimes occurred nationwide in 2005, including incidents of murder and non-negligent manslaughter, forcible rape, robbery and aggravated assault.

Although violent crime totals grew over 2004, Mr. Carter said, they have dropped 3.4 percent since 2001 and 17.6 percent since 1996. He said murders were up 3.4 percent and arrests of juveniles for murder were up nearly 20 percent over 2004, while forcible rapes decreased 1.2 percent, the only violent crime category to fall.

According to the FBI report, there were 469.2 violent crimes per 100,000 inhabitants. The report said aggravated assault accounted for 62.1 percent, robbery accounted for 30 percent, forcible rape accounted for 6.8 percent, and murder accounted for 1.2 percent of the violent crimes reported in 2005.

Mr. Carter said that of the 14.1 million arrests made by law enforcement in 2005, drug violations accounted for more than any other offense. He said that according to the "Crime Clock 2005," a violent crime took place every 22.7 seconds and a property crime every 3.1 seconds in this country.

The report said 10.2 million property crimes were reported nationwide during 2005 and that an examination of two- and 10-year trends shows the number of property crimes last year decreased by 1.5 percent from 2004 and declined 13.9 percent when compared with 1996.

Mr. Carter said there were 3,429.8 property crimes per 100,000 inhabitants, two-thirds of which were larceny-theft. He said reported incidents of burglaries were up 0.5 percent, the only property crime to rise in 2005, and property crimes accounted for an estimated $16.5 billion dollars in losses in 2005.

In the FBI's Uniform Crime Reporting (UCR) Program, property crime includes the offenses of burglary, larceny-theft, motor vehicle theft and arson.

According to the report, 45.5 percent of the violent crimes and 16.3 percent of the property crimes reported nationwide were cleared by arrest or other means.

New York Is Safest Big City, F.B.I. Report Shows (NYT)

By Emily Vasquez

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

New York City remained the safest big city in the nation in 2005, according to an F.B.I. report released yesterday. The report also showed that the city experienced a 4.3 percent drop in overall reported crime last year compared with a nationwide drop of 1.2 percent.

“Today’s final 2005 report by the F.B.I. shows that our innovative efforts to reduce crime and increase New Yorkers’ quality of life are working,” Mayor Bloomberg said in a statement.

The data, almost 10 months old, show that while the number of reported homicides increased nationwide last year by 3.4 percent, the number reported in the city fell by 5.4 percent. Police statistics, however, show that through this Sept. 10, the number of reported killings is up 2.1 percent compared with the same period last year.

In 2005, the number of robberies reported nationwide increased by 3.9 percent, while in the city it increased by 1.4 percent. Over all, reported violent crime fell last year by 1.9 percent in the city, while nationwide it rose by 2.3 percent.

The city’s Total Crime Index ranked lowest for crime in 2005 among the nation’s 10 largest cities, including Dallas, Phoenix, Houston, Philadelphia and Los Angeles. Dallas had the worst index ranking, with 8,484.4 reported crimes per 100,000 people. That represents about one crime for each 12 people. Los Angeles, which ranked eighth, experienced 3,850.4 crimes per 100,000 people, or one crime per 26 people. New York City experienced 2,675.5 crimes per 100,000 people, or about one crime per 37 people.

Thus far in 2006, overall reported crime in New York City continues to fall, down 5.04 percent by Sept. 10 compared with the same period last year.

Though no specific national data is yet available for the year to date, law enforcement officials and crime analysts have noted a continued rise in crime in some areas across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0065263

David Kennedy, director of the Center for Crime Prevention and Control at John Jay College of Criminal Justice, said yesterday that many crime analysts believe the causes for that increase vary by region, but include traditional issues like illegally obtained firearms and drug availability. But some newer issues may also be at the root, he said.

"It's very hard to put your finger on, but a lot of us are convinced there's a very real spreading and intensifying of this street subculture" involving issues of "honor, respect, and issues of manhood inextricably tied up with violent responses," Mr. Kennedy said.

He added that some police departments across the country have cited a lack of resources.

Violent Crime Up In Minneapolis (MINNST)

By Chao Xiong, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 19, 2006

The city's crime rate has bypassed that of 2005, but police say a focus on juvenile offenses has helped to slow the increase.

Minneapolis' violent crime rate continues to outpace that of 2005, but authorities said Monday that a recent crackdown on juvenile crime is slowing the increase.

The violent crime rate from January to Sept. 11, 2006, was 25.8 percent higher than the same period last year, according to Minneapolis police. That includes murder, robbery, aggravated assaults and rape. The increase from 2005 was as high as 60 percent in January and stayed above 30 percent for most of the year.

Interim Police Chief Tim Dolan said a steady decline in the increase that began in June can be attributed to the department's focus on juvenile crime, juvenile curfews and the recovery of guns. Overall juvenile arrests between May and September were up 22 percent from 2005, and charges against juveniles are up 17 percent in 2006 compared with 2005, according to police.

Minneapolis police statistics show an increase in juvenile curfew arrests for every month this year, topping in July with 666 curfew arrests compared with 172 in 2005.

In addition, 726 guns were recovered so far this year compared with 631 during the same period last year. Dolan said 10 guns were seized from juveniles last week.

"So much of the uptick in crime in Minneapolis ... was among younger teenagers," said City Council Member Don Samuels, who agreed with Dolan's assessment that police are getting a better handle on the problem. "You have to concentrate on kids if you're going to address the crime issues."

It's an issue championed by Dolan, who was nominated to be chief by Mayor R.T. Rybak and who reestablished the juvenile crime unit earlier this year.

Despite the reports of progress, every category of violent crime continues to show an increase over the same period of 2005. According to preliminary crime reports from the department, homicides are up 18 percent, rape is up 22 percent, robbery is up 29 percent and aggravated assaults are up 24 percent.

Dolan said that an additional four or five homicides can bump up the percentage dramatically and that some crimes, such as rape, are difficult to stem because they are often committed by someone the victim knows.

On Monday, the FBI also released final crime numbers for 2005, which showed Minneapolis' violent crime rate for that year increased 13.5 percent over 2004. Nationwide, violent crime increased 2.3 percent from 2004 to 2005, with rape down by 1.2 percent. Robbery increased 3.9 percent and murder and non-negligent manslaughter was up 3.4 percent in 2005 across the country.

In St. Paul, where rallies have recently sprung up calling for city officials to fund as many as 200 additional police officers, violent crimes rose by a modest 1.5 percent from 2004 to 2005, the FBI numbers showed.

St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman recently announced the funding for a total of 15 more officers next year and has pledged to work toward a goal of hiring an additional 100 by 2009.

DOJ_NMG_0065264

Reports of aggravated assaults, an area St. Paul Police Chief John Harrington has repeatedly said was a high crime-fighting priority, decreased by 70 last year compared with 1,491 such reports filed in 2004. It was the first time in three years that the figure had fallen.

Violent Crime Reports Drop In City, FBI Says (PTR)

By Tony LaRussa, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 19, 2006

The number of violent crimes in Pittsburgh dropped by nearly 10 percent in 2005, according to an FBI report released Monday.

At the same time, the incidence of such crimes increased both statewide and across the United States.

In Pittsburgh, 3,385 violent crimes were reported last year, compared to 3,739 in 2004, a decrease of 9.5 percent. During 2005, the city reported 63 murders, 117 rapes, 1,617 robberies and 1,588 aggravated assaults, according to the FBI report.

Property crimes -- burglaries, thefts and arsons -- increased. In 2005, there were 15,628 property crimes reported in Pittsburgh, compared to 15,278 a year earlier, an increase of 2.3 percent.

The drop in violent crimes in Pittsburgh contrasts sharply with national and state crime figures released by the FBI.

The data show that such crime rose 2.3 percent last year in the United States, the first increase since 2001. The FBI said there were 1.39 million violent crimes reported in the United States last year, up from 1.36 million in 2004.

The number of violent crimes in Pennsylvania also increased, from 50,998 in 2004 to 52,761 last year, an increase of 3.5 percent.

The FBI report is compiled from information provided by more than 17,000 city, county, state, tribal and federal law enforcement agencies nationwide. Figures were not available for counties.

Pittsburgh police Chief Dominic J. Costa said while he has not yet analyzed the FBI's crime statistics, he has noticed a trend in law enforcement here in recent years that makes the decrease in violent crime understandable.

"One of the biggest thing we've seen in the past several years has been the increase in the level of cooperation between police officers and residents," he said. "Community groups, churches and residents in general are reaching out to help police do their jobs."

Costa said officer training has improved, and more and better technology is being employed.

Around the region, statistics for violent crimes last year in major population areas were:

= Westmoreland County: Greensburg, down 25.5 percent, with four rapes, nine robberies and 22 aggravated assaults; New Kensington, down 12 percent with six rapes, 18 robberies and 57 aggravated assaults.

= Fayette County: Uniontown, down 18.8 percent, with two rapes, 25 robberies and 25 aggravated assaults.

= Butler County: City of Butler, down 8.8 percent, with seven rapes, 15 robberies and 133 aggravated assaults; Butler Township, up 100 percent, with one rape, six robberies and 23 aggravated assaults.

= Beaver County: Aliquippa, up 10 percent, with one murder, two rapes, 25 robberies and 49 aggravated assaults.

The increase in violent crime nationally is due in part to growing numbers of people involved in gangs and the spreading methamphetamine problem, U.S. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said.

But crime rates, which are on the rise particularly in small and mid-sized cities, could continue to increase, he said.

The report "overall is good news," said McNulty, because it shows the total crime rate is at its lowest in more than 30 years. Still, he said the increase in violent crime "certainly causes us to remain vigilant."

The recent shift in violent crime trends has raised questions about whether police are fighting terrorism at the expense of crime. Some criminal justice experts and local police have suggested that the increase in violent crime may reflect the decreased funding for police work not related to terrorism.

Violent Crime Down In Oregon, Up Elsewhere (KOIN-TV)

KOIN-TV, September 19, 2006

WASHINTON, D.C. - New FBI figures show a decrease in Oregon violent crime from 2004 to 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0065265

That's the reverse of the national trend, where violent crime overall is on the increase. In figures released Monday, the FBI says there was a 2.3 percent increase in violent crime across the nation. But the opposite happened in Oregon, where there was a 2.5 percent decrease.

Oregon also showed declines in most other crime categories -- except auto theft, where there was a four percent increase.

The FBI compiled its figures from data submitted by nearly 17,000 law enforcement agencies across the nation.

Utah, U.S. Report Jump In Crimes (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, September 19, 2006

Violent crime is on the increase across the country, and Utah is no exception.

Deseret Morning News graphic A violent crime is being committed in the United States every 22.7 seconds. Every 3.1 seconds someone is the victim of a property crime, the FBI said in its annual crime report released Monday.

According to the FBI's Uniform Crime Statistics report, a homicide occurs in the United States every 31.5 minutes; a rape every 5.6 minutes; a robbery every 1.3 minutes; and an aggravated assault every 36.5 seconds.

According to raw numbers from the FBI's Uniform Crime Statistics report, violent crime rose 2.3 percent in America this past year. Property crimes dropped by only 1.5 percent. Homicides and robberies increased nationwide; rapes decreased. In the West, car thefts increased by 4.5 percent over the past year. The numbers have been published on the FBI's Web site, www.fbi.gov.

In Utah, preliminary numbers compiled by the Utah Department of Public Safety revealed that violent crimes increased slightly — up 1.24 percent in 2005. Robberies decreased by more than 10 percent, rapes increased 1.44 percent and aggravated assaults increased more than 5 percent.

"Violent crime increased, but property crime decreased," said Mary Ann Curtis, a data collections specialist for the Utah Bureau of Criminal Identification (BCI). "We didn't have a real big increase in crime."

The FBI reported 56 homicides and non-negligent manslaughters in Utah in 2005. BCI's report said there were 54 reported homicides in 2005, compared to 42 in 2004. BCI's definition of homicide includes murder and manslaughter.

"We may get updated reports," said Curtis, explaining the difference in homicide numbers. "It could be they were reported as a homicide and later found out it really was an accidental death."

The FBI has a cut-off date for its statistics, while BCI allows police departments to amend their reports.

"We look relatively safe," said Mike Haddon, director of research for the Utah Commission on Criminal and Juvenile Justice. He noted an increase in homicides in Utah and said car thefts have jumped nearly 9 percent for the population. Breaking it down by population, Haddon felt crime overall was declining.

In St. George, growth and construction is booming. So is property crime, police said.

"We've really been going on a lot of burglary and construction calls," St. George Police Sgt. Craig Harding said Monday. "The crimes that I think we're going out on are opportunistic crimes. We leave things out at and the criminal takes them."

More than $97 million in property was stolen in Utah in 2005. Only $31 million was recovered by police agencies in the state.

D.C. Corruption Eruption (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek, Daily News Washington Bureau

New York Daily News, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON - There is so much political corruption on Capitol Hill that the FBI has had to triple the number of squads investigating lobbyists, lawmakers and influence peddlers, the Daily News has learned.

For decades, only one squad in Washington handled corruption cases because the crimes were seen as local offenses handled by FBI field offices in lawmakers' home districts.

But in recent years, the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal and other abuses of power and privilege have prompted the FBI to assign 37 agents full-time to three new squads in an office near Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0065266

FBI Assistant Director Chip Burrus told The News yesterday that he wants to detail even more agents to the Washington field office for a fourth corruption squad because so much wrongdoing is being uncovered.

"Traditionally, a congressional bribery case might be conducted on Main Street U.S.A., but a lot of the stuff we're finding these days is here in Washington," said Burrus, who heads the FBI's criminal division.

He said typical crimes involve lawmakers' illegal interactions with lobbyists and "people who have a lot of savvy about how the congressional process works and appropriations."

Plus, the electronic and legislative paper trail that winds up as evidence is in Washington, as Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and ex-Rep. Randy (Duke) Cunningham (R-Calif.) can attest.

Ney has agreed to plead guilty to corruption charges. Cunningham was sentenced to eight years in the slammer for taking bribes.

Two years ago, only 400 agents worked on public corruption cases. Now, 615 agents nationwide - including 30 in New York - are trying to nail public servants for betraying the public trust in 2,200 ongoing cases.

A recent FBI search of the Alaska Statehouse was a first of its kind.

In Washington, agents conducted unprecedented searches of the offices of the CIA's third-ranking executive and the House office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.).

Both stemmed from bribery allegations.

Burrus wouldn't speculate about why there is so much graft, but said, "We have to pull the whole weed up or it's just going to grow back again."

Sketch Of Baby Kidnap Suspect Released (CO)

By Jeff Douglas

The Charlotte Observer, September 19, 2006

UNION, Mo. - Police released a sketch Monday of a woman they believe stole a baby after slashing the mother's throat, hoping to generate new clues in the four-day old case.

Stephenie Ochsenbine, 21, helped police artists with the composite drawing of the woman she said attacked her at her home on Friday and snatched her baby, Abigale Lynn Woods, now 10 days old.

Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke hoped the drawing, as well as a picture of a black scarf that was recovered near the home on Saturday, would generate new clues. Authorities also hoped the child was alive and well.

"From history, if somebody wants a child, I would assume that child's being taken care of," FBI agent Roland Corvington said.

The drawing shows a woman with dark hair wearing a baseball cap. Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke said the suspect is believed to be between 5 feet 4 and 5 feet 8 and weighs about 200 pounds.

Toelke said Ochsenbine "wasn't completely happy" with the sketch, "but it's the best we could come up with." He said more than 300 leads have come in so far.

"The phones have been ringing off the walls," he said at a news conference.

Ochsenbine did not attend the news conference. Her grandfather, James Ochsenbine, declined to comment on behalf of the family and declined an interview request with his granddaughter, saying they wanted her to rest.

Ochsenbine told police she did not know the woman who came to her door and entered the house asking to use the telephone. Ochsenbine's 1-year-old son, Connor, also was in the house but was unharmed.

Corvington said authorities were still awaiting lab results on fingerprints from a knife found near the home, about 45 miles southwest of St. Louis.

The mother and others close to her are not considered suspects, but Toelke said no one has been ruled out.

Authorities have asked hospitals and doctors to be on the lookout for anyone bringing in a newborn. Fliers showing the baby were posted in gas stations and restaurants in Union. The 6-pound girl, born Sept. 8, has dark hair and a strawberry birthmark on her forehead.

DOJ_NMG_0065267

The abductor has been profiled as someone who had a child die recently or as someone who could not have children, told people she was pregnant and needed to steal a child so her lie would not be found out.

"Historically, these types of people have cased hospitals," Corvington said.

About 100 members of the Missouri National Guard who have assisted in the investigation have ended their grid search of the area near the home. Toelke said authorities will rely on tips and interviews, though additional searches are planned.

From 1983 to 2002, there were 217 reported cases of non-family infant abductions, and all but a few babies were recovered safely within 25 miles of where they had been taken, according to a 2003 study by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. About three-quarters of the kidnapped infants were recovered in fewer than five days.

Sketch Puts Face To Baby Case (SLPD)

By Todd C. Frankel, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 19, 2006

ST. CLAIR -- Rose Arnold studied the eyes. There was a fleeting feeling of recognition as she stared Monday at the just-released sketch of the suspect in the kidnapping of a baby, now 10 days old.

The shaded drawing showed a masculine woman with wavy hair, heavy eyebrows and unusually large, dark eyes. Arnold stepped closer to the picture posted in a gas station window. Next to it was the "Amber Alert" flyer for the missing baby, little Abby Woods, who is Arnold's grand-niece.

"I've seen somebody with eyes like those," Arnold, 54, said. "But I don't know where."

And then the feeling was gone.

The FBI and Franklin County authorities released the sketch Monday, along with a photograph of a scarf that may have been worn by the kidnapper, in hopes of developing new leads in a bewildering case. The baby was abducted from her mother's home in nearby Lonedell on Friday when a stranger held her mother at gunpoint and stabbed her, then barricaded her in the bathroom while fleeing with the infant, officials said.

"Lots of good tips"

More than 300 tips had been called in, some from as far away as Texas and Virginia, officials said. And a fresh wave of calls was prompted by the release of the sketch, which was quickly posted around the rural county and broadcast by the media.

"The phones have been ringing off the walls. We've been getting lots of good tips," Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke said.

The release of details about the scarf raised concerns about the investigation's progress. The baby's mother, Stephenie Ochsenbine, told authorities that the kidnapper either wore or carried a scarf. The scarf in the picture, which is black with fringe on both ends, was discovered Saturday during the National Guard's search of Ochsenbine's property, Toelke said. But the sheriff also said that Ochsenbine "does not recognize the scarf."

That was on top of a sketch which Ochsenbine was not entirely happy with, but "it got to the point where she felt she couldn't improve upon it," so they decided to release it, Toelke said.

Toelke and Roland Corvington, special agent in charge of the FBI in St. Louis, stressed they were making progress. A fillet knife recovered outside Ochsenbine's house was being tested for forensic evidence. Both Ochsenbine and the baby's father, James Woods, had been cooperative with authorities, they said. And although authorities do not consider the parents to be suspects, nothing has been ruled out, Corvington said.

"They stabbed me"

Ochsenbine was not yet "in an emotional state" in which she could talk publicly about the kidnapping, Toelke said.

Woods works in a scrap metal business run by Kinney "Konny" Arnold, who is Arnold's husband. Woods was at work on Friday until they learned of the kidnapping, she said. Arnold answered the phone early Friday afternoon when a panicked and crying Ochsenbine, 21, called looking for her live-in boyfriend. The young mother, cut and bleeding, had walked to a neighbor's house with her 1-year-old son, Connor.

DOJ_NMG_0065268

"I got on the phone and she was crying," Arnold recalled. "She said, 'Auntie Rose, is James there?' I said no. And she said, 'Is Konny?' And I said no. And she was just crying. 'They stabbed me,' she said. And I said, 'They?' She said, 'A woman stabbed me and took Abby.'"

Arnold said Woods walked in the door at that moment, briefly talked with Ochsenbine and then sped home.

"They had nothing to do with it," Arnold said.

The hunt for Abby and the mystery of why someone abducted her has consumed this community. As the days pass without answers, there has been more speculation about what happened - what local police call "seeing ghosts."

"You hear so many stories, especially in a little town," said Tena Sohn, who was eating lunch at Lewis Cafe with her daughters and a newborn grandson, just six days old.

Sohn wondered why authorities hadn't tested - or released the results - for fingerprints on the knife that was recovered. Her daughter, Angela, 25, wondered why they hadn't done the same for the doorknobs. The second-guessing was caused by a desire to see little Abby returned home safely.

"I just pray to God they find her," Tena Sohn said.

At a Casey's gas station across the street from the FBI's command post, a clerk called in a tip when she spotted a customer fitting the suspect's description on Sunday afternoon. The customer was a heavy-set woman with a female moustache - a detail that stood out for many people here, said Assistant Manager Deidre Merritt. The customer purchased a jar of petroleum jelly and left. The clerk then called police, who asked the clerk to download the store's surveillance tape. The clerk called Merritt to come to work and burn the footage onto a CD. But authorities did not pick up the CD until the next morning.

Merritt figured authorities must have determined it was not worth pursuing. Still, it struck her.

"It's really weird being in a small town," Merritt said, "and they can't find anything."

U.S. Appeals Court Freezes Wecht's Trial (PPG)

Considers request from ex-coroner to remove judge

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has stayed the criminal trial of former Allegheny County Coroner Dr. Cyril H. Wecht pending its decision on whether the judge hearing the case should be removed.

Last week, attorneys for Dr. Wecht argued to a three-judge panel that U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab has not been impartial in his rulings, and because of that, their client cannot receive a fair trial.

The appeals court has not issued a formal ruling, but late Friday, it issued an order staying the trial. That order became public early yesterday morning as the parties met before Judge Schwab for the final pretrial conference in the case.

Dr. Wecht's trial on 84 counts, including mail and wire fraud, was scheduled to begin Oct. 16. Dr. Wecht's lawyers declined comment on the development, as did Judge Schwab.

Recusals are very rare, so the court's action staying the case is noteworthy, experts say.

John Burkoff, a professor at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law, said it's "almost impossible" to win a recusal case.

"That's a real slap from the appellate court to the trial court, and that doesn't happen very often," he said. "It's an easy thing to say but very difficult to prove. A recusal based on an allegation of bias [is] very rarely [granted]."

The federal judiciary does not keep a tally of how often such motions are granted.

Though issuing a stay is an unusual step, it does not automatically mean the appeals court is planning to remove Judge Schwab.

It might indicate that there is some potential substance in the argument raised by the defense that the appeals court wants to review.

Mr. Burkoff believes that the issue before the court isn't whether Judge Schwab issued the wrong decisions, but whether he abused his discretion in not recusing himself when the defense attorneys asked.

"You can have a judge who's done everything right, but is there an appearance of impropriety?" Mr. Burkoff said. "He may not have done anything wrong, but the appellate court could think it looks like he did."

DOJ_NMG_0065269

Dr. Wecht's attorneys said they would seek Judge Schwab's recusal in June after he said he would pursue contempt proceedings against them after the trial because they did not follow his orders.

The defense contends that the judge had improper, secret communications with the prosecution; that he has shown bias against Dr. Wecht in his court rulings; that the judge improperly reviewed potential evidence in the case on his own and then used that information in a ruling; and that he has prohibited Dr. Wecht's attorneys from pursuing a zealous defense.

During oral arguments, at least one of the appellate judges, Julio Fuentes, might have shown which way he was leaning in the case when he said, "In listening to [defense attorney Jerry] McDevitt, he makes a pretty good case. It's an extraordinary remedy, but he's putting together a series of events that he says show bias on his client."

Former 3rd Circuit Judge Timothy K. Lewis, who left the federal bench in 2000, said that issuing a stay in the trial proceedings is the right thing to do to be fair to all the parties involved.

"That said," he continued, "this is not by any means a tip of the hand they're going to rule in favor of Wecht," he said. "It's an indication only that they have not found it to be a frivolous matter, and they're considering it seriously.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said she would not comment, other than to say, "It's impossible to read anything into the court's order."

In an opinion by the 3rd Circuit Court in August 2004, Judge Schwab was chastised for taking the entirety of a proposed opinion filed by a defense attorney and using it as his own.

He had granted a dismissal of a lawsuit filed by John Bright, whose 8-year-old daughter, Annette, was murdered in 2001 by a man on probation. Mr. Bright sued probation officers in Westmoreland County for not doing enough to keep the killer away from her.

Judge Schwab asked for a "consolidated statement" of the defense position, and after the lawyers submitted a proposed opinion, he adopted it without making any substantive changes, other than those for style, and never gave Mr. Bright a chance to reply.

"Courts and judges exist to provide neutral [forums] in which persons and entities can have their professional disputes and personal crises resolved," wrote Judge Richard Nygaard in a 2004 opinion. "Any degree of impropriety, or even the appearance thereof, undermines our legitimacy and effectiveness."

If Judge Schwab is removed from the case, a newly appointed judge would meet with the lawyers to discuss what motions and arguments need to be resubmitted and decide how the case will proceed.

"A new judge would want to be extremely careful to review everything that had been disputed to make sure improper appearance is corrected," Mr. Burkoff said.

Judge Schwab, who sought a seat on the federal bench for 17 years, was appointed to the court in the Western District of Pennsylvania in September 2002.

He first was considered for the district court in 1985. Then in 1988, Judge Schwab, now 59, of Butler County, was considered a lock for a position on the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals when Judge Joseph F. Weis Jr. took senior status. But his nomination was foiled when the American Bar Association gave him an "unqualified" rating.

At the time, Judge Schwab said he believed the rating was based on his conservative religious and political beliefs. He is an evangelical Christian.

But the chairman of the bar association's screening committee said Judge Schwab received the unfavorable rating because he lacked experience in federal court.

Before joining the district court, Judge Schwab worked at the law firm Buchanan Ingersoll, serving for his last two years as chief counsel for complex litigation.

The judge served as a federal court clerk out of law school, and began his career in private practice in 1973 at Reed Smith, where he served as deputy head of the litigation group and was the first chairman of the firm's Techlex Group, which specialized in legal services for high-tech firms. He left Reed Smith in 1990.

U.S. Court Stays Wecht Trial (PTR)

By Jason Cato

DOJ_NMG_0065270

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 19, 2006

The long-awaited public corruption trial of Dr. Cyril H. Wecht might be further off than its scheduled Oct. 16 start date.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia ordered a stay of the trial while it considers a number of appeals in the case, including whether to remove U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab, 59, of Sewickley.

Wecht's lawyers have accused Schwab of bias, saying the judge has made a number of rulings that unfairly favor prosecutors. Their principal complaints are that Schwab admitted all of the prosecution's evidence and that he thwarted their efforts to question the lead FBI agent about his disciplinary records after having secret communication with prosecutors.

Getting a judge disqualified from a case isn't easy, and nothing should be read into the court's decision, former 3rd Circuit Judge Timothy Lewis said.

"This doesn't mean they've decided to remove him at all," said Lewis, 51, a Squirrel Hill native who now practices law in Washington, D.C. "It just means they need time to examine the issues carefully. This is not a tip of the hand by the court."

A two-hour court hearing was held Sept. 12 before 3rd Circuit Judges Julio M. Fuentes, D. Michael Fisher and Myron H. Bright. Following the hearing, the judges retreated to chambers to discuss the case, take an initial vote and decide who would write the opinion.

The stay might indicate the judges are split, or that one judge isn't certain, Lewis said.

Fisher openly questioned Schwab's decision to allow prosecutors to use all 1,352 exhibits at trial after defense lawyers failed to meet a court-ordered deadline to file objections. He said he was troubled that Schwab seemed to be more concerned with his schedule than anything else. Fuentes said Wecht's lawyers made some compelling arguments.

Howard J. Bashman, a lawyer in suburban Philadelphia who hosts a Web log on appellate issues, said the stay indicates the judges see merit in at least some of the defense's contentions and want time to carefully review the matter.

"In complicated cases, it is not unusual for the 3rd Circuit to take from six months to a year to issue a decision on appeal," Bashman said. "To be sure, the 3rd Circuit sometimes decides complex cases very quickly, but here a stay avoids the need for such a rush to judgment."

Approximately 60,000 appeals have been filed annually over the past six years in the 12 federal appellate courts across the country, according to data from the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. The agency does not track how many times district judges are removed from cases, a spokeswoman said.

The number is "infinitesimal," Lewis said.

In 2004, the 3rd Circuit removed U.S. District Judge Alfred M. Wolin from three asbestos bankruptcy cases and reassigned them to Joy Flowers Conti, a federal district judge in Pittsburgh.

Parties in the case questioned Wolin's impartiality after he appointed lawyers to assist him who also were representing clients in other asbestos cases. The court said it could not find "even the slightest hint of any actual bias or partisanship by Judge Wolin." However, Wolin was still removed because the judges said the test was not "actual bias" but the "perception of bias."

Should Schwab be removed, Wecht's lawyers told the appeals court they also would like a number of his rulings vacated, including those relating to evidence and a request to dismiss charges.

Wecht, 75, of Squirrel Hill, was charged in January with 84 counts of mail fraud, wire fraud and theft of honest services. He is accused of using his public office while Allegheny County coroner for private financial gain.

His trial has not been cancelled. Schwab told lawyers yesterday to continue preparing. If the appeals court decision is not made by Oct. 10, however, Schwab said he will release the approximately 300 people in the jury pool, which will effectively postpone the trial.

Wecht Trial Delayed While Attorneys Wait For Appeals Court Ruling (SCCD)

By Joe Mandak

The State College Centre Daily, September 19, 2006

PITTSBURGH - Former Allegheny County coroner Dr. Cyril Wecht's federal corruption trial has been delayed until an appeals court rules whether a judge is biased and should be removed from the case.

The stay was issued by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Friday. On Monday, U.S. District Judge Arthur Schwab issued an order postponing a pretrial hearing that was to be held Tuesday.

A three-judge appeals court panel heard arguments last week in Philadelphia about whether Schwab should be removed from Wecht's upcoming trial on an 84-count indictment charging him with theft of honest services, mail fraud and wire fraud.

Federal prosecutors in Pittsburgh contend that Wecht used his county staff to do work for his multimillion-dollar private pathology practice, traded cadavers for lab space at a local college, and overbilled clients using faked limousine bills.

Wecht is a renowned pathologist who has consulted on high-profile deaths including those of Elvis Presley and JonBenet Ramsey and, most recently, the son of former Playboy model Anna Nicole Smith. He resigned from county office in January after he was indicted.

If the appeals court does not rule by Oct. 10, Schwab said he would cancel jury selection that was to begin Oct. 11 and release a pool of 300 potential jurors. Opening statements in Wecht's trial had been scheduled for Oct. 16.

Wecht's attorneys appealed after Schwab upheld FBI searches for Wecht's records and computers. Wecht's attorneys had attacked the credibility of the FBI agent who obtained the search warrants. Schwab overruled some defense objections because he said Wecht's attorneys missed a deadline for filing them.

Wecht's attorneys contend Schwab has favored prosecutors in his rulings. The judge has threatened to hold a contempt hearing for Wecht's attorneys after the trial.

Malone Pleads Guilty In Las Vegas Strip Club Bribery Case (AP)

AP, September 19, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A former county commissioner accused of arranging and delivering bribes for a strip club owner pleaded guilty to conspiracy Monday in a deal with prosecutors that could result in a 20-year prison term.

Former Clark County Commissioner Lance Malone, 44, agreed in U.S. District Court to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. With his trial nearing, Malone negotiated the plea last week with U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden, who said the guilty plea was a victory for people in the county.

"These offenses strike at the very foundation of our government, and it reaffirms that elected public elected are not above the law," Bogden said Monday in a statement.

Authorities have dropped wire fraud and conspiracy to commit wire fraud charges, and agreed not to object to Malone serving his sentence concurrently with a three-year sentence a federal jury in San Diego levied against him last summer for similar charges.

Malone has agreed to drop his appeal in the San Diego case and forfeit up to $750,000 in assets.

A sentencing hearing was set for Dec. 18. He faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

Malone's trial was to cap a three-year FBI investigation into corruption and bribery on the Clark County commission, the major political decision-making body in southern Nevada.

The center of the probe was Michael Galardi, the former owner of three strip clubs who claimed to have paid off dozens of politicians in Nevada and Southern California with cash and favors.

Authorities said Malone, who was hired as Galardi's lobbyist after losing a bid for re-election, acted as Galardi's bagman, delivering wads of cash to his former colleagues. In return, Galardi said he sought favorable votes on the commission, which was reviewing plans to expand one of his clubs.

The FBI recorded many of the transactions through hours of wiretapped phone calls.

Galardi, 44, pleaded guilty in 2003 and testified in Las Vegas and in a related San Diego federal bribery case. He is expected to get no more than five years in prison when he is sentenced in November. Former Clark County commissioner Erin Kenny also pleaded guilty and testified in May in the trial of former commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera.

The plea agreement describes more than 16 payments made by Galardi or Malone to Herrera, Kenny and Kincaid-Chauncey from October 2000 to November 2002, according to Bogden.

In his trial, Herrera, 33, a one-time Democratic candidate for Congress and former state assemblyman, acknowledged taking cash from Malone and knowing it was from Galardi, though he said he did not consider it a bribe. He was found guilty and sentenced to 50 months after being convicted of 17 of 19 charges of conspiracy, wire fraud and extortion.

Kincaid-Chauncey was sentenced to 2 1/2 years in federal prison on similar charges.

"Mr. Malone is now the third person to admit there was a coordinated effort to defraud Clark County and its citizens of the honest services of public officials for the benefit of Michael Galardi and his businesses, and the fifth person to be convicted of these crimes," Bogden said.

Malone's lawyer, Dominic Gentile, did not immediately return a call for comment.

Guilty Plea Seals Malone Deal (LVRJ)

By Adrienne Packer, Review-Journal

Las Vegas Review-Journal, September 19, 2006

Severity of sentence for ex-commissioner to be decided in December

The 3-year-old political corruption case against Lance Malone took an anticlimactic turn Monday when the soft-spoken former Clark County commissioner formally entered a guilty plea before a federal judge.

A few reporters attended Malone's hearing Monday, in contrast to the crowds that watched as co-defendants Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, both former county commissioners, were convicted and sentenced earlier this year.

Sitting expressionless next to his attorney, Dominic Gentile, Malone formally changed his plea from innocent to guilty after signing an agreement with the government last week.

The deal allowed Malone to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act, a charge that stemmed from paying Clark County politicians cash bribes on behalf of strip club owner Michael Galardi. The other 32 counts against Malone were dropped.

Malone took a deal only after government officials stopped insisting that he admit accepting illegal gifts or money from Galardi or anyone else during his four-year term, Gentile said last week.

Gentile and the 44-year-old Malone declined to comment Monday.

U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks scheduled Malone's sentencing for Dec. 18. He set aside the entire day to hear the government and Gentile argue over the severity of the sentence.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Schiess indicated that he will prove that Malone accepted illegal cash and other gifts while he served on the commission from 1996 through 2000. Malone's sentence could be enhanced if the judge believes Schiess' argument.

Also, the government will push for a tougher sentence because prosecutors think Malone was a leader in a scheme to bribe elected officials for favorable treatment of Galardi's strip clubs. Malone, who lost his bid for re-election in 2000, went to work for Galardi and became his go-between with commissioners.

"We will be arguing to the court whether an adjustment can be made for leadership," Schiess told Hicks.

The prosecution agreed in the plea deal to recommend that Malone's sentence run concurrently with the three-year term levied in San Diego last summer after he was convicted of bribing three city councilmen. Schiess said the law mandates concurrent sentences if the same course of conduct can be proven in two separate cases.

But Hicks warned Malone that he has the authority to impose consecutive sentences.

"It is possible the court may or may not make the same finding" as the government, the judge said.

In changing his plea on Monday, Malone admitted that he paid off Herrera, Kincaid-Chauncey and former Commissioner Erin Kenny.

Galardi, the money source, pleaded guilty in 2003. Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey unsuccessfully fought the charges they took the payments. Kenny pleaded guilty.

That left Galardi's bagman, Malone, to battle the case or sign an agreement. He opted for the latter four days before his trial was scheduled to start.

A remaining question for Malone is how much time he will spend in prison.

Hicks explained he could face a maximum prison sentence of 20 years. And, the judge said, no matter what sentence is levied, Malone's agreement denies him of the right to appeal his sentence or withdraw his plea.

Malone is unlikely to serve two decades in jail, but the severity of the sentence will be up to Hicks to decide after hearing arguments from both sides.

Herrera received the harshest treatment from Hicks last month. Hicks ordered Herrera to spend 50 months in prison, one month less than what the government recommended. He also must pay $16,600 in fines and forfeit $60,000.

Hicks sentenced Kincaid-Chauncey to 30 months in prison and ordered her to pay $8,800 in fines and forfeit $19,000.

Although Galardi pleaded guilty early on, he was ordered to forfeit $3.8 million and sell his lucrative strip clubs. For his cooperation, the government agreed he would not spend more than five years in prison. Galardi is scheduled to be sentenced in November.

Because Kenny signed an agreement in 2003 and worked with prosecutors, her prison sentence will be no longer than 46 months. She was forced to forfeit $70,000.

The forfeiture amounts were based on how much money the government could prove each elected official received in bribes. For Malone, forfeiture will be calculated based on how much the judge believes the prosecutors could prove he paid out to politicians.

Malone's plea agreement said he will forfeit up to $750,000. His fine will be a maximum of $250,000.

Hicks read the 14-page agreement to Malone in court on Monday, ensuring that he understood each element.

When he determined Malone was not signing a deal under a threat, he asked Malone to enter his new plea.

"Guilty, your honor," Malone said quietly, staring straight ahead.

Sen. Bryant's UMDNJ Job Was No-show One (AP)

AP, September 19, 2006

State Sen. Wayne R. Bryant, D-Camden is accused of being paid $35,000 a year for a no-work job at UMDNJ while helping the school garner millions of new dollars in funding.

Document: View the Report (Requires Adobe Reader) A powerful southern New Jersey politician was paid for a no-work job at the scandal-ridden University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey while helping the school garner millions of taxpayer dollars, according to a report made public Monday.

The school paid state Sen. Wayne Bryant $35,000 a year "to lobby himself in his capacity as state senator," according to the report of a federal monitor who had been checking into the school's finances.

The report said that all Bryant appeared to do at the university's School of Osteopathic Medicine was show up for three hours most Tuesday mornings and read newspapers. He produced no memos, reports or other evidence of doing work, though, the report said.

Herbert J. Stern, a former federal prosecutor and judge, was appointed to investigate the state university in December after the school admitted overbilling Medicaid by more than $5 million. The probe quickly broadened: Another report he has issued suggested losses from fraud and abuse there could exceed $243 million.

Bryant, D-Camden, was the sole subject of the report by Stern released Monday. It quickly spawned criticism of Bryant from the governor's office and some Republican lawmakers. Federal prosecutors also said they would look into its allegations.

Bryant was scheduled to attend a groundbreaking for a college building in Bloomfield on Monday morning, but he did not show up. He did not return calls seeking comment.

The monitor's report said he also did not grant an interview to investigators.

One of the state's most influential elected officials, Bryant worked for the university's School of Osteopathic Medicine from March 2003 until February 2006. During that time, the school's allocation from the state skyrocketed.

According to the report, he helped deliver a total of $12.8 million over the three years - up from about $2.8 million per year before the school created a job for him.

In 2002, Bryant met with Stuart Cook, then the president of UMDNJ, according to the report. Cook told investigators that Bryant explained that the university would have to pay taxes in Camden if it opened a facility in the city - even though it is a nonprofit organization normally exempt from taxes. Then, Cook said, Bryant asked about a job at the medical school.

The report said Cook said he ended the conversation before Bryant would say exactly what he would do if he had such a job.

In 2003, the osteopathic school created a position for Bryant and did not advertise it publicly, the report found.

John Crosbie, an official at the school, told the investigators that Bryant was hired only for his "political juice."

Bryant was initially hired as a part-time employee ineligible for benefits or pension credits. But by the time the paperwork went through, he was getting benefits and pension credits.

The report suggested that Bryant also influenced UMDNJ to help his political cronies. He said, for instance, that spending $32,000 to sponsor a designated driver program at the Tweeter Center "had to be done." The program was run by Jodi Nash, the wife of Jeff Nash, who at the time was director of the Board of Chosen Freeholders in Camden County.

Ultimately, UMDNJ gave $20,000 to the program.

Stern, the federal monitor, said it's up to prosecutors to determine whether Bryant should face criminal charges. Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office would study the report.

Meanwhile, Gov. Jon S. Corzine, also a Democrat, suggested Monday that Bryant consider stepping down as chairman of the powerful Senate Budget Committee while the investigation runs its course. But the governor said that decision should be made by legislators. Some Republican lawmakers used the report to argue for reforming state ethics rules.

Bryant and his family's personal finances and his political work have been closely tied before.

From 2002 until earlier this year, he worked at Rutgers University in Camden, where he gave lectures and mentored students. His final contract there was for $35,000. It was not renewed this year because of a budget crunch, said university spokesman Michael Sepanic.

Bryant was a key force in getting New Jersey to agree in 2002 to put $175 million to fix infrastructure and attract private investment to Camden, which was recently named America's poorest city.

The revitalization efforts focused on expanding the universities and health care providers in the city.

Within a year after the legislation was signed, Bryant had jobs at Rutgers and UMDNJ. Another recipient of money from the state was CAMcare, a nonprofit system of medical clinics run by Bryant's brother, Mark Bryant.

Bryant's wife and his son, who died earlier this year, both have held jobs for public entities, as have several other relatives.

Report Takes Bryant To Task (CHCP)

By Sarah Greenblatt, Courier-Post Staff

Cherry Hill Courier-Post, September 19, 2006

Gov. Jon S. Corzine hinted that state Sen. Wayne Bryant should step aside as head of a key budget panel following the release of a scathing report that said he pressured officials at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey to hire him for a no-show job.

Bryant, D-Lawnside, the powerful chairman of the Senate Budget and Appropriations Committee, "was paid $35,000 per year by UMDNJ to lobby himself," according to a report released Monday by Herbert J. Stern, the federal monitor appointed to investigate the university's finances.

The report said UMDNJ administrators created a job description to fit Bryant's credentials and then provided full benefits, although he spent about three hours on campus each week.

While on campus, the report said, Bryant read newspapers but did not produce any reports or provide other tangible evidence of work.

"He didn't perform any duties," said John Ingelsino, an attorney in the office of the monitor who is overseeing UMDNJ as part of a deferred prosecution agreement.

During Bryant's tenure from 2003 to 2006, the fiscal picture brightened for UMDNJ's School of Osteopathic Medicine in Stratford, where state support climbed to a total of $12.8 million, up from a total of $8.4 million for the three years prior to Bryant's tenure.

Bryant declined to answer investigators' questions, according to the report, which was forwarded to U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie.

The senator did not return calls seeking comment on Monday.

Stern, a former federal prosecutor and judge, was appointed to investigate the state university in December after the school admitted overbilling Medicaid by more than $5 million. The inquiry quickly broadened: Another report he has issued suggested losses from fraud and abuse there could exceed $243 million.

Corzine stopped short of calling for Bryant's ouster but acknowledged that other elected officials under investigation have stepped aside.

"There are many precedents where people step aside while an investigation goes on," Corzine said, adding that the decision is up to legislators.

Senate President Richard J. Codey, D-West Orange, took a neutral stance.

"There's a process under way here and I think we owe it to everyone involved to let that process take its course before we make any judgments or decisions," Codey said in a prepared statement.

Senate Minority Leader Leonard Lance, R-Clinton Twp., Hunterdon County, said that whether Bryant continues as committee chairman is Codey's call.

"If I were Senate president, overseeing Republican committee chairs, I would expect them to uphold the highest ethical standards," Lance said, adding that he is "very disturbed" by the monitor's report.

Assemblyman Alex DeCroce, R-Parsippany-Troy Hills, issued a statement contending that the new report underscores the need for a special session of the state Legislature to address ethics reform.

The monitor's report said Bryant used his position at UMDNJ to help political allies.

The administrator who supervised Bryant told investigators he had no control of the senator's activities and said the politician's chief contact at UMDNJ was the former dean, R. Michael Gallagher. In April, Gallagher resigned after the monitor found he improperly billed UMDNJ $200,000 for extravagances and pressed subordinates to doctor financial records to help him qualify for a $15,000 bonus.

UMDNJ witnesses told investigators that Bryant, through Gallagher, pressured them to pay $20,000 to sponsor a designated driver program at the Tweeter Center, where Jodi Nash, the wife of then-Camden County Freeholder-Director Jeffrey Nash, worked on marketing.

Jeffrey Nash did not return a call Monday seeking comment.

The report said Gallagher, whose fortunes at the university stood to benefit from additional funding, instructed his staff to create a job for Bryant, who had already asked then-president of UMDNJ Dr. Stuart Cook to hire him.

Gallagher's attorney, Jeremy Frey, could not be reached for comment.

Cook told investigators he was uncomfortable with Bryant's request and abruptly ended a conversation on the topic with the senator. But members of Cook's staff said he ultimately relented, seeking political allies to fend off a proposal to merge the university with Rutgers.

According to the report, Cook directed his legal staff to determine if hiring Bryant would create a conflict of interest. The monitor said, however, that there is no documented analysis of potential conflicts by former UMDNJ general counsel Vivian Sanks-King, who resigned in December.

Ingelsino said the position Bryant eventually filled was never posted outside UMDNJ, which violated university policy.

Coincidentally, Ingelsino said, a visitor who happened to be qualified for the job and saw an announcement about it on a UMDNJ bulletin board applied for the post, complicating Bryant's appointment.

The university hired that applicant for a different job, Ingelsino said.

UMDNJ spokeswoman Anna Farneski said in a prepared statement that elected officials would not be able to manipulate the university's system today.

DOJ_NMG_0065276

"The kinds of actions described in the monitor's report would not be tolerated now, and will not be tolerated in the future," Farneski said.

The report, which relied on interviews with 35 UMDNJ sources, said many university employees had voiced concerns about Bryant's appointment before he was hired.

U.S. Says Politician A UMDNJ No-show (PHI)

By Jennifer Moroz And Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 19, 2006

State Sen. Wayne Bryant was given a no-show job at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey to mask what he was really hired to do - use his political influence to secure more state funding for the school - a federal monitor concluded yesterday.

In a report submitted to U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie, former federal Judge Herbert J. Stern said Bryant, chairman of the powerful Senate Budget and Appropriations Committee, ultimately was "paid $35,000 per year by UMDNJ to lobby himself."

The findings, which invited immediate criticism from some legislators, were enough to prompt Gov. Corzine to suggest the veteran Democratic lawmaker consider giving up his chairmanship duties.

Stern, who was appointed by Christie in December to review practices at the scandal-ridden university, said Bryant, 58, asked for a job and was rewarded, in March 2003, with a part-time "program support coordinator" position created especially for him at UMDNJ's School of Osteopathic Medicine in Stratford.

Stern said Bryant, who did not return messages left at his legislative and law offices yesterday, did not cooperate in the investigation. But based on more than 35 interviews with current and former UMDNJ officials and "supporting documentary evidence," Stern concluded that university officials, led by R. Michael Gallagher, then dean of the osteopathic school, skirted hiring procedures to bring the Camden County Democrat on board. And once he was hired, Stern wrote, Bryant "performed little to no work."

Stern said that the senator, who was getting paid about $38,000 a year when he left the job in February, generally spent three hours a week at his office at the school and that the only activity observed "by anyone was that he read the newspapers."

Bryant, the most prominent figure to be trapped in the federal monitor's net, was being compensated for his "political juice," Stern concluded.

In that regard, the report said, Bryant was successful. According to Stern, the osteopathic school was getting about $2.8 million a year from the state before Bryant was brought on board. In the three years Bryant worked for the school, it received a total of $12.8 million, Stern said.

The report also said Bryant used his ties at the school to help his political allies. According to Stern, the senator leaned on the school to sponsor a Tweeter Center program affiliated with the wife of Jeff Nash, then director of Camden County's freeholder board. In the end, UMDNJ gave $20,000 to the program.

Bryant's attorney, Carl Poplar, did not return messages yesterday.

The findings invited immediate criticism from Republicans.

Senate Minority Leader Leonard Lance (R., Hunterdon) said he was "very disturbed by the report," adding there should be a ban on legislators doubling up in public jobs.

Corzine, a fellow Democrat, suggested that Bryant consider stepping down as chairman of the Senate Budget and Appropriations Committee until the matter was cleared up. But the governor said that decision was up to legislative leaders.

Feds Visit Wellington In Masilotti Probe (PALMBEACHP)

By Dwayne Robinson, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), September 19, 2006

WELLINGTON — Federal investigators are interviewing village employees and have subpoenaed records in their ongoing probe of land deals involving beleaguered Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti, village officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0065277

Wellington, the largest community in Masilotti's district, joins the county and Royal Palm Beach as part of the federal investigation of Masilotti's role in a series of complicated land deals.

The exact focus of the probe in Wellington was unclear Monday.

"I have been instructed that there is an ongoing federal investigation, and it's inappropriate for me to comment at this time," Village Manager Charlie Lynn said.

Masilotti said he knew nothing about the investigators' visit to Wellington.

"The investigation on me is basically over," Masilotti said. "It's just political nonsense. Nope, nope, I have no comment and I can guarantee it has nothing to do with me."

Village employees were hesitant to discuss the probe, and some were noticeably tense. By midday Monday, the news had spread to village satellite offices.

"There's some interviews going on, but I don't know who they're interviewing or what they're interviewing about," said Gary Clough, director of environmental and engineering services.

Other high-ranking village officials confirmed that investigators have been talking to employees since last week. More appointments are scheduled in the next few days.

The interviews appeared to be focused on the village's community services department, which oversees code enforcement, zoning, development and annexation.

FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela declined to comment, citing an ongoing investigation.

A federal grand jury began investigating Masilotti in May, after The Palm Beach Post reported that a Masilotti family trust made as much as $1.3 million in connection with the South Florida Water Management District's 2003 purchase of 3,000 acres in Martin County.

Later reports showed that Masilotti pushed for the district's land buy without revealing his family's financial stake. Records show that Masilotti ultimately profited from the transactions in his divorce settlement.

In 2003, Masilotti promoted a private land deal in Royal Palm Beach that was supposed to include a public park. The Diocese of Palm Beach sold the land after being told that Masilotti and the village were working on it. No park was built and Royal Palm Beach Mayor David Lodwick says he knew nothing about any plan for it.

Attorneys Wrap Up Third Gotti Trial (WP/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

NEW YORK -- A prosecutor presented a Top 20 list of reasons John "Junior" Gotti never quit the mob, and his defense lawyer played taped conversations to prove he did, as they wrapped up arguments in Gotti's third racketeering trial on Monday.

Whether Gotti quit the mob is considered critical because he can win an acquittal if the jury concludes he left the mob before summer 1999, That would mean the five-year statute of limitations had expired by the time prosecutors brought the current case.

If he is convicted of racketeering and ordering two assaults on the founder of the Guardian Angels, Gotti could face up to 30 years in prison. He is free on $7 million bail. Jury deliberations were to begin Tuesday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Victor Hou created a Top 20 list including allegations the Gotti continued communicating with Gambino colleagues and living off the millions of dollars he made as the crime family's street boss for years.

Then Hou put a picture of a bloody Guardian Angels shirt on a large screen before the jury and again accused Gotti of ordering two 1992 attacks on radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa, who started the crimefighting group.

"Picture yourself in the cab having to fight just to save your life," he said of the attack, which occurred after Sliwa's on-air criticism of Gotti's father, John Gotti, who died in prison in 2002.

Hou urged jurors to "follow the money" to a conviction and then described how Gotti continued to benefit from finances earned through mob crimes.

"You don't retire from the Mafia," Hou said. "You have all their secrets."

When Hou finished, defense lawyer Charles Carnesi got in the last word, saying his client left the mob and never looked back.

He said jurors could find evidence in tapes of Gotti's prison conversations in which he said he wanted nothing to do with mob life anymore.

"Is he in danger today?" Carnesi asked the jury, suggesting Gotti might face retaliation for announcing that he had quit the mob.

"I don't know," the lawyer said. "But I do know his commitment to his wife, his children and his family is stronger than any fear he has."

Earlier, Hou had referenced Gotti's two earlier trials, which ended in deadlocked juries.

"You may be asking yourself why we are doing this again," the prosecutor said. "Very simple: Nobody is above the law."

For Gotti Jury, A Test Of Time (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 19, 2006

In considering fate of 'Junior' in racketeering trial, panel will have to decide when he severed his once-revered ties to the mob

In the summer of 1990 at the now defunct Ravenite Social Club on Mulberry Street in Little Italy, the late Gambino crime boss John Gotti asked some friends to recommend his son John A. Gotti to be a captain in the mob.

It was a supreme act of nepotism and no one would argue with the elder Gotti.

Gotti's friends, underboss Frank LoCascio and Sammy Gravano, then formally introduced the younger, "Junior", Gotti to his father as a captain and both Gotti men locked in a close embrace, according to an FBI report cited on The Smoking Gun Web site.

But in recent days, the younger Gotti, 42, in an effort to fight racketeering charges that could send him to prison for a maximum of 20 years, has been trying to prove to a federal court jury in Manhattan that he had distanced himself from the mob and his father's criminal legacy.

Today, the jury will begin to decide Gotti's fate after prosecution and defense attorneys spent part of yesterday arguing in rebuttal summations over a central issue: Did the younger Gotti abandon his mob membership in 1999?

That date is crucial because it could put the indictment outside the statute of limitations. If the jurors find that he did leave mob life behind, Gotti will walk away a free man. If the decision favors the prosecution, then Gotti is assured of some time behind bars when he is sentenced.

The issue of Gotti's withdrawal from the mob also arose in his two previous federal trials last year and earlier this year on the same racketeering charges. Both resulted in mistrials. Since 2005, Gotti had been under house arrest on his Oyster Bay estate.

Before Judge Shira Scheindlin charged the jury yesterday, both lead defense attorney Charles Carnesi and assistant U.S. attorney Victor Hou gave rebuttal summations - the main summations took place on Friday - that focused on the evidence for or against the withdrawal defense.

Hou argued that prison tapes made while Gotti was in jail on an earlier federal case, as well as the testimony of cooperating witnesses, showed that Gotti continued to reap the benefits of the spoils of Gambino family rackets well into 2000 and beyond.

"There is no legitimate money," Hou argued to the jury, pointing to evidence that Gotti received allegedly illicit funds from extortion and construction rackets through businesses he had stakes in.

"You can retire from the mob, but you can't take the money with you," Hou said.

Carnesi also used extracts from prison tapes, including some of Gotti talking with his imprisoned father in 1999, to make the case that he had withdrawn. At one point, Carnesi used a chart to show that in 1997 most of the men allegedly in the younger Gotti's crew had been promoted away from him or were in jail. The attorney also played other prison tapes of Gotti railing against the mobster life and telling friends not to be part of it.

"I think my family suffered enough, I believe they suffered enough," said Gotti on one tape. "My mother suffered enough and my family."

GOING AFTER 'JUNIOR'

Previous trials

Prosecution case: Prosecutors alleged that John A. Gotti was a key member of Gambino crime family racketeering conspiracy.

Defense case: Gotti dropped out of membership and an active role in the mob by July 21, 1999.

Results: On eve of 2005 trial, government dropped murder conspiracy charges. In September 2005, jury acquitted Gotti on securities fraud and couldn't reach a verdict on remaining charges. A mistrial resulted. In March retrial, jury couldn't come to a unanimous agreement on Gotti's withdrawal from mob defense. A mistrial resulted.

Current trial

Prosecution case: The government added an obstruction of justice charge related to alleged attempt to get Michael "Mickey Scars" DiLeonardo, Gotti's former friend and mob crony, not to become a government witness in 2002 and 2003.

Defense case: The withdrawal from the mob defense is still key.

You Know You're Wiseguy When... (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 19, 2006

From the home office in Howard Beach, the Top 10 signs John A. (Junior) Gotti never left the Mafia:

10. Velour sweatsuits still in the closet.

9. Stash of frozen horse heads in the garage.

8. Friends who go by nicknames like Johnny Boy, Tommy Sneakers and Jackie Nose. ...

For a while yesterday, it sounded like the taping of the "Late Show with David Letterman" had moved to Manhattan Federal Court as prosecutors listed their own - decidedly serious - Top 20 reasons for believing the mob scion had never left the family business.

Jurors are expected to begin deliberations today in a racketeering case that ended in mistrial the last two times out.

Among prosecutor Victor Hou's "Top 20 Reasons Gotti Never Withdrew," displayed on a large screen in court:

Gotti passed mob messages to pals while he was imprisoned after pleading guilty to separate racketeering charges in 1999.

Gotti was demoted to captain in 2001, causing him to rail at his uncles, whom he was convinced had gone behind his back to tell his father that he was "a greedy mobster."

Gotti continued to reap the profits of his life of crime by collecting rents on properties purchased with mob money.

"You can retire from the mob, but you can't take the money with you," Hou said. "There's simply been no withdrawal."

Both sides used closing arguments to jurors to focus attention on the centerpiece of Gotti's defense - that he bailed from the mob life he inherited from his father, Dapper Don John Gotti.

Junior Gotti must prove that he was out of the Mafia - by July 1999, five years before his 2004 indictment. Prosecutors must prove that at least one act in the wide-ranging conspiracy was committed after that date.

Gotti, 42, is accused of ordering thugs to attack radio host Curtis Sliwa in June 1992 after the Guardian Angels founder called his father "a drug dealer" and worse on the air.

Gotti's attorneys pointed jurors to his repeated disavowals of the mob, captured on audiotape intercepted by the feds in 2003 and 2004 while he was serving a six-year term at an upstate New York prison.

"Tell me my son is involved in the street, and I'll go hang myself," Gotti tells pal John Ruggiero. "I couldn't do another day in jail."

Later, he adds: "If we are stupid enough to raise our children around this, then we deserve to die in jail."

DOJ_NMG_0065280

Hou mocked a witness-stand claim by one of Gotti's friends, who said the ex-Gambino boss quizzed him about Mafia gossip while he was in prison, just as a football player might read the sports page to find out how his old teammates were doing.

"John Gotti Jr. is not a retired football player looking back fondly on his career," Hou said, "... because you don't retire from the Mafia."

FEDS' 20 REASONS TO CONVICT 'JUNIOR' (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, September 19, 2006

A federal jury will soon begin its deliberations in the trial of John "Junior" Gotti - after prosecutors yesterday borrowed from David Letterman and listed the "Top 20" reasons why the former Gambino leader never retired from the Mafia.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Victor Hou said the top reason was the money, arguing that Gotti has continued to live richly off ill-gotten gains he reaped as head of the Gambino crime family, hiding his wealth in real estate and shell companies.

"You can retire from the mob, but you can't take the money with you," Hou said in his closing argument yesterday.

The prosecutor quoted a prison conversation in which Gotti allegedly lambasted his uncles for demoting him and stealing cash.

"What's my father's money is my money. My money was my father's money. You understand me?" Gotti ranted to a pal visiting him in Ray Brook federal prison in 2003.

Also in the Top 20, prosecutors claim Gotti continued to pass messages to his criminal associates, received regular updates on Gambino affairs, tampered with a witness and collected $50,000 in loan-sharking proceeds.

Gotti is on trial for a third time for racketeering charges after two previous juries failed to reach a verdict.

3 Charged In Embezzlement Scheme (MH)

By Patrick Danner And Dan Christensen

The Miami Herald, September 19, 2006

A former top executive of giant Miami engineering firm PBS&J was charged Monday in a $36 million embezzlement scheme and in the contribution of $11,000 to the campaign of Florida U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez through ``strawmen."

The charges came out of a federal grand jury investigation into the embezzlement and whether PBS&J illegally reimbursed employees for thousands of dollars in political contributions to disguise their source. Ex-Chief Financial Officer W. Scott DeLoach and two former underlings also cited in the investigation, Maria Garcia and Rosario Licata, waived indictment Monday in federal court. Their lawyers said they will plead guilty, possibly by the end of the week.

The charges are a first step in an unfolding scandal at one of South Florida's biggest companies, with almost 4,000 employees. The case also carries national implications because PBS&J does business with and contributes to politicians across the country. Fort Lauderdale attorney Benson Weintraub, one of Garcia's lawyers, said he expects other company officials and possibly the company itself to be indicted as the investigation continues.

"This is just the tip of the iceberg," Weintraub said.

Mark Schnapp, a Miami lawyer for PBS&J, acknowledged that company money apparently was used in the 1990s to make illegal reimbursements but said they ``were not of any significant magnitude."

"Charges shouldn't be on the table, and as far as I know they aren't," Schnapp said.

Schnapp said DeLoach carried out the reimbursement scheme described by the government in court papers alone to put "himself into a highly visible position in the Mel Martinez campaign." He did not elaborate.

PBS&J has made more than $500,000 in political contributions since 2003. The alleged scheme to repay contributions emerged during a probe into the embezzlement led by the U.S. Attorney's Office and the FBI, which has gone on for a year.

In court documents, prosecutors allege DeLoach made six contributions totaling $11,000 to Martinez's 2004 Senate campaign through straw donors. The donors are identified only by their initials and apparently are cooperating with authorities.

It's unclear why DeLoach wasn't charged in connection with contributions he made to Martinez and other candidates under his own name. Assistant U.S. Attorney Joan Silverstein declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0065281

The case comes on top of another campaign flap that ensnared Martinez earlier this year, when he shed a $2,500 contribution from Ohio U.S. Rep. Bob Ney tied to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Last week, Ney agreed to plead guilty to corruption charges.

Campaigns can sometimes be forced to disgorge illegal contributions. Martinez's office could not be reached late Monday evening.

Also under investigation is the embezzlement, which occurred between 1993 and 2005. The scheme, according to court documents: DeLoach, Garcia and Licata issued company checks to themselves and funneled money from the company's healthcare-benefit fund into secret bank accounts under their control. They concealed the theft by doctoring the books.

PBS&J has said the former employees overcharged various state transportation agencies, including Florida's, but there was no such mention in the court papers.

The trio used the proceeds to "fund lavish lifestyles," according to the documents. DeLoach bought Florida Keys property and luxury sports cars, Garcia acquired an interest in a local restaurant and Licata bought property in Florida and Nicaragua and engaged in ``high-dollar gambling activities."

The trio is cooperating with investigators, according to their lawyers. Said Jane Moscowitz, DeLoach's lawyer: "He gave the company everything he owned, easily worth over $16 million." That included his homesteaded property and proceeds from his 401(k) retirement account.

Garcia's attorney credited her with tipping off the authorities and returning about $2.5 million to $3 million. "Right down to the rings on her fingers," said lawyer Paul Petruzzi.

Licata's attorney, Jay Moskowitz, declined to offer any details of her cooperation.

"Rosario has done everything she can to make amends for this unfortunate chapter in an otherwise law-abiding life," he said.

Company attorney Schnapp said PBS&J is negotiating with state and federal agencies to decide how much to reimburse its government clients. Bond for each defendant was set at $100,000. The sentencing guidelines call for prison terms of between 78 and 97 months.

PBS&J is a major government contractor in South Florida, based in Miami since 1960. About 300 of its 3,900 employees are in South Florida. The employee-owned firm, with 75 offices and $530 million in 2005 revenue, plans to move its headquarters to Tampa next week.

Ex-Fruit Of Loom Exec Charged With Conspiracy, Money Laundering (FWST)

By Brett Barrouquere

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 19, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - A former environmental manager for Fruit of the Loom was charged with hiring friends to do work that was never performed, then taking kickbacks for awarding the contracts, prosecutors said Monday.

A federal grand jury in Bowling Green charged Kalen W. Watkins, 44, of Bowling Green, with conspiracy to commit mail fraud, money laundering and obstruction of justice.

The owners of the companies hired - Laura Leigh Wells, 31, of Lexington; Kenneth Scott Harris, 44, of Euless, Texas; Curtis Hopkins, 43, of Corbin; Ronald R. Pollock, 48, of Bowling Green; and Tyrone N. Tackett, 35, of Pensacola, Fla. - were also charged in the indictment returned Wednesday.

They face the charges of conspiracy to commit mail fraud and money laundering.

In a lawsuit, Bowling Green-based Fruit of the Loom accused Watkins of paying more than $1.7 million to companies run by Wells and Harris for little work done.

Watkins served as environmental manager for Fruit of the Loom from February 1997 until September 2003. The company said in the lawsuit that Watkins was fired for misconduct related to conflicts of interest and violating company policies related to business ethics.

The indictment alleges that Watkins, who worked at the Bowling Green plant, doled out contracts to the five companies run by her associates from May 1, 1998, until Sept. 30, 2003, then approved fraudulent invoices submitted by those companies.

In exchange for approving the invoices, the companies paid hundreds of thousands of dollars back to Watkins, the indictments say.

Watkins faces a charge of obstruction of justice for fabricating documents after a grand jury issued a subpoena in the case, prosecutors said. Hopkins also faces a charge of obstruction of justice. Prosecutors said he attempted to persuade a witness to provide inaccurate information to an FBI agent.

The lawsuit is pending in U.S. District Court in Bowling Green. It lists as defendants Watkins; his wife, Lori Watkins; Wells; her company, Environmental Technology Associates; Harris; and his company, Risk Management Group.

In filings in the lawsuit, Watkins and Harris deny any wrongdoing.

Lori Watkins is not charged in the indictment. Hopkins is listed as the owner of Cobra Coal Co., Pollock is listed as owner of Pollock & Associates and Tackett is listed as owner of Cyclone Inc.

Attempts to locate the defendants on Monday were unsuccessful. A Fruit of the Loom spokesman did not immediately return a message seeking comment.

Justice Dept. Defends Mandatory Web-labeling Bill (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, September 19, 2006

Bush administration dismisses free-speech impact of prison time for not labeling "sexually explicit" Web pages.

WASHINGTON--The U.S. Department of Justice has stepped up its defense of a proposal to imprison Web site operators who don't label pages containing sexually explicit material.

The idea, outlined in an April speech by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, is approaching a vote in Congress. Even though there have been no hearings, the legislation has been attached to two separate measures--a massive communications bill and a bill to fund large portions of the federal government including the State Department--that are likely to be considered by the full Senate this fall.

The proposed restrictions are no different from requiring multipurpose stores like 7-Eleven to shield pornographic magazines with so-called blinder racks, Larry Rothenberg, an attorney in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy, said at a panel discussion here hosted by the Internet Caucus Advisory Committee on Friday.

"We have what we consider to be a rather modest (proposal) to protect consumers," Rothenberg said. "This is not censorship. It's not a major break with First Amendment principles."

His critics, however, remained unconvinced. "There's no way to avoid vagueness, no way to avoid overbreadth, and, more important, no way to avoid chilling free speech," said Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy and Technology.

Under the proposal, all commercial Web site operators would have to place "identifiable marks or notices," to be determined by the Federal Trade Commission, in the code of each page that contains "sexually explicit material" as defined by existing U.S. criminal statute. The idea, supporters maintain, is to make it easier for Web-filtering programs to pick up objectionable sites.

Sen. Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican, was the first politician to latch onto the Justice Department's plan, introducing a bill in June that mirrored its demands but upped the possible prison sentence to a 15-year maximum.

That bill hasn't gone anywhere on its own, but its major components have since appeared in two seemingly unlikely places: as amendments to the massive communications bill approved earlier this summer by the Senate Commerce Committee and to a 2007 spending bill that will fund the Commerce Department, the Justice Department and some science-related agencies. Both amendments reduced the possible prison sentence to two and five years respectively.

Although the future of the Senate's communications bill remains up in the air, thanks to an ongoing tussle over the concept of Net neutrality, the spending bill's approval is a virtual inevitability.

The question that remains is whether the Web-labeling proposal will be altered or rewritten, as it's hardly unusual for amendments to be altered at the last moment. The issue may not be resolved for several weeks. An aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said it's unlikely the spending bill will be voted on until after the November elections. (This is not the first time a measure designed to target sexually explicit speech on the Internet would be attached to a spending bill: It's happened at least once before.)

Civil liberties advocates blast the approach as overly sweeping. That's in part because courts in the past have ruled that the same definition of "sexually explicit" referenced in the legislative proposal could be applied to fully clothed genital areas, making perhaps unintended sites fair game. The proposals do offer one minor carve-out: Content that constitutes only a "small and insignificant part" of a large Web site does not need to be labeled.

"When you have a label that applies to hard-core porn, Victoria's Secret, an episode of 'The Sopranos' from HBO, and an outsider artist that has a Web site, and all of them put the same label on, you don't have a label that empower parents," the CDT's Harris said. "You just have a label that will disappear vast swaths of the Internet from peoples' viewing."

An absence of hearings on the Justice Department's proposal and the hasty amendments indicate that Congress is trying to sneak through a bad proposal without proper vetting, opponents argued. The best way to protect consumers and children from Web content they don't wish to see, they said, is for the government to encourage education, innovation on the filter and parental-control front, and collaboration with the Internet industry.

It may be a good idea for Congress to hear additional testimony on the matter, but that wouldn't diminish the need for such a law, the Justice Department's Rothenberg said, adding: "At the moment we happen to think we're well-intentioned and rightly guided, and that's why we're moving forward."

Seeing Is Believing (WT)

By Kathleen Maloney-dunn

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

When my son offered to help his 13-year-old friend shovel driveways in our neighborhood last winter, I felt a surge of maternal pride in his 10-year-old enthusiasm for volunteerism. His spontaneous act of service reminded me of what my parents and grandparents called "the good ol' days." Little did I know that this wholesome outing would cost my son's innocence. While they worked to clear one neighbor's driveway, my son's teen-age friend asked, "Hey, have you looked up porn on the Internet yet?" My son asked, "What's porn?" His friend replied, "You don't know? Look it up on the computer." I found out about this neighborly exchange only after my son followed his friend's suggestion. My son "Googled" the mysterious four-letter word when he got home and a voluminous list of sites to explore popped up on his computer screen. One touch of the mouse prompted another. Days later, a suspiciously quick click to close a "window" as his father entered the computer room triggered our son's confession of what he had been doing and why. He had ventured into a growing wasteland of smut and slime. Mini-porn has become a mega-business. Revenues from mobile porn sales globally reached $1 billion last year. The Mobile Adult Content Congress met in Miami this year for its first-ever trade show. The event was such a success and interest in mobile porn services so profitable that another Congress will convene in Reno next month. Porn on the go is the reality in America, available to anyone, including -- and no doubt particularly -- children. I learned, painfully, just how and why this industry is so successful. After my son told me what he had done, I asked him: "Why did you keep searching after you saw what was on the first site?" I expected him to say he was just curious, but instead he answered, "Because, Mom, it's addictive." I was stunned. How insightful. And how painfully true -- for millions of Internet porn users around the world. I scrutinized my son's face. I had never seen such sadness, shame and disgust on my son's smooth young face before and it shocked me to see unfamiliar emotions contorting his features. "Mom," he said quietly, "I saw things I wish I had never seen." He suddenly resembled a veteran of war. I struggled to comfort him, to help him make sense of the twisted images he had absorbed. After he went to sleep, I reviewed the sites he had visited. The graphic digital displays I encountered disturbed and traumatized me, even though I am an adult with sexual experiences spanning almost three decades. How could my 10-year-old son, who has never thrilled to his first kiss, digest these degrading, unnatural images? I felt as if someone had ripped my newborn away from me and fed him garbage before he had tasted the natural sweetness of milk or whole foods. How would his taste buds recover? After this unwelcome exposure, could our son hang onto what we have taught him about sex? Could he recapture the view of girls and women as whole persons to appreciate, to treasure, rather than as piecemeal objects merely to use and demean? My husband and I berated ourselves for not having installed filtering software on our computer. We foolishly thought we had a couple of more years before having to worry about our young son doing an on-line porn search. I tried to get the coarse images I saw that night out of mind. I wish I could persuade the purveyors of porn of how insidious it is to expose unwitting Internet users, especially children, to their freely accessible trash. I want to impress on them how wrong, how immoral it is, to profit from the most common typos, female name searches and innocuous entries that lead computer users inadvertently to "adult entertainment" sites which are illegal for minors to visit. But of course they know all that, and relish the vulnerability of our children. Most of all, I hope my son has somehow erased from his memory, visual and emotional, the ugly scenes that stole his sexual innocence from him. Now we supervise his computer use much more closely. Help may be on the way. Several Internet providers, including Comcast, Cox and Verizon, are introducing features enabling parents to receive daily e-mail notifications of the Web sites their children visit. AOL will enable parents to see a daily log of screen names and e-mail addresses their children communicate with. But we're bracing ourselves for the new wave of porn photos and videos being made available on pocketsize, portable, wireless devices. We're determined to be ahead of the curve this time. But a computer desktop is much easier for parents to monitor than downloads or pop-ups to mobile phones, handheld computers, or portable game and digital music players. Soon there will be no limit to what our children can be exposed to when they, a friend, or a stranger press the "on" button of any cell or electronic device in any location. The purveyors of digital porn are mobilizing. Shouldn't we?

Former LA School Teacher Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charge (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, September 19, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A former elementary school teacher faces up to 10 years in federal prison after he pleaded guilty to possessing child pornography, authorities announced Monday.

David Stein, 46, of Hollywood pleaded guilty last week to a single-count indictment charging him with possession of child pornography, officials said.

As part of a plea deal, prosecutors recommended that he serve 21 to 27 months in prison and register as a sex offender, said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office.

However, the charge is punishable by up to 10 years in prison. A judge will make the decision at Stein's sentencing scheduled for January 8.

Authorities began investigating in August 2003 when Croatian officials provided the FBI with information about a U.S. citizen transmitting child pornography on the Internet, said J. Stephen Tidwell, the bureau's assistant director in charge in Los Angeles.

Further investigation led to Stein, a teacher at the Pacific Boulevard School in Huntington Park. Agents searched his home and found a computer and several compact discs containing sexually explicit images of minors, the FBI said.

Stein was transferred to an administrative office after Los Angeles Unified School District officials learned of the federal probe. He worked there until his arrest in May 2005, the FBI said.

Armed Man Runs Vehicle Into Barrier, Rushes Capitol (USAT/AP)

By Jim Abrams

USA Today/AP, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — An armed man ran through the U.S. Capitol after crashing his vehicle on the Capitol grounds Monday in the worst breach of security since a gunman killed two police officers in 1998.

Acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher McGaffin identified the intruder as Carlos Greene, 20, of Silver Spring, Md. He said Greene, tackled after a foot chase through the Capitol, was armed with a loaded handgun and had crack cocaine in his possession.

Greene appeared to be under the influence of a controlled substance and "exhibited signs of seizure," McGaffin said.

He was taken to Greater Southeast Community Hospital.

Police planned to charge Greene with federal felony possession of a handgun and assault of a police officer, McGaffin said.

"This was unacceptable by my expectations for Capitol Police," McGaffin said. "It was an unfortunate breach of our security."

The incident happened shortly before 8 a.m. The House of Representatives was not in session, and the Senate didn't convene until the afternoon.

McGaffin said Greene, driving an SUV stolen earlier in the day, slammed into a police vehicle blocking an entrance to a major construction site on the Capitol's east side, across from the Supreme Court.

Greene drove onto the site, McGaffin said, then bolted up the Capitol steps, entering the building through a third-floor construction door. He made his way to the basement on the opposite side of the building before being subdued by police outside an office for distribution of flags that lawmakers present to constituents.

McGaffin said there was no information that Greene was brandishing his weapon and said police chasing him chose not to use deadly force. He praised Capitol Police for their actions in capturing the intruder but said there would be a review of security measures and protocols.

Greene entered at "an access point that must be available to construction vehicles," he said, and "there is a risk. That's why we have concentric rings of security."

The Capitol was locked down for about an hour before reopening for staff and tourists.

"I would say this Capitol is a safe building," McGaffin said. "It was safe this morning, and it is safe tonight."

Angry Gunman Finally Tackled In U.S. Capitol (WT/AP)

By Jim Abrams

The Washington Times/AP, September 19, 2006

An armed man ran through the U.S. Capitol after crashing a sport utility vehicle on the Capitol grounds yesterday in the worst breach of security since a gunman killed two police officers in 1998.

Acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher M. McGaffin identified the intruder as Carlos Greene, 20, of Silver Spring. He said Mr. Greene, tackled after a foot chase through the Capitol, was armed with a loaded handgun and had crack cocaine in his possession.

Mr. Greene appeared to be under the influence of a controlled substance and "exhibited signs of seizure," Chief McGaffin said. He was taken to Greater Southeast Community Hospital.

Police planned to charge Mr. Greene with federal felony possession of a handgun and assault of a police officer, Chief McGaffin said.

"This was unacceptable by my expectations for Capitol Police," Chief McGaffin said. "It was an unfortunate breach of our security."

He said Mr. Greene, driving a silver SUV stolen earlier, slammed into a police vehicle blocking an entrance to a major construction site on the Capitol's east side, across from the Supreme Court.

Mr. Greene drove into the site, stopping at a skylight for the new Capitol Visitor Center, which is scheduled to open next year, Chief McGaffin said, adding that Mr. Greene then bolted up the Capitol steps, entering the building through a third-floor construction door. He then made his way to the basement on the opposite side of the building before being subdued by police outside an office for distribution of flags that lawmakers present to constituents.

Chief McGaffin said there was no information that Mr. Greene was brandishing his weapon and said police chasing him chose not to use deadly force. "That should have been a last resort," the chief said.

He praised Capitol Police for their actions in capturing the intruder, but said there would be a review of security measures and protocols.

Mr. Greene entered at "an access point that must be available to construction vehicles," he said, and "there is a risk. That's why we have concentric rings of security."

The incident occurred shortly before 8 a.m., and the Capitol was locked down for about an hour before reopening for staff and tourists.

Pfc. W. Scott Humphrey of the Capitol Police went on duty yesterday at 7 a.m. at the north entrance of the Capitol. Although Officer Humphrey did not see Mr. Greene, he said he had heard the crash and estimated that Mr. Greene had run about 50 yards, from the crash site into the Capitol.

"He was fast, very fast," Officer Humphrey said.

The House was not in session yesterday, and the Senate didn't convene until yesterday afternoon.

The visitors center is being built in part to provide an extra layer of security before people enter the Capitol following the 1998 shooting deaths of two Capitol police officers.

In that case, a man with a history of mental illness ran through a first-floor door of the Capitol, fatally shot one officer at the door and another inside the adjacent office of then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Texas Republican.

Security around the Capitol increased significantly after that shooting, and again after the September 11 attacks.

Chief McGaffin defended a delay of more than nine hours before police released any official details of the intrusion.

"This is a very unusual event for us, fortunately. I wanted to make sure that we had addressed all of the security needs of the complex before I took time to come forward and share any information with you," he told reporters.

"I would say this Capitol is a safe building. It was safe this morning, and it is safe tonight," he said.

Armed Man Crashes Through Barricade, Arrested At Capitol (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, September 19, 2006

Capitol Police apprehend armed man at Capitol as lawmakers raise concern over security protocol.

The Capitol Police apprehended an armed man carrying crack cocaine yesterday inside the U.S. Capitol after he crashed his car through a Capitol Visitor Center (CVC) barricade into a fountain and sprinted into the building, according to the acting chief of police.

At a briefing over nine hours after the incident, Acting Chief Christopher McGaffin said the 20-year old suspect from Silver Spring, Md., Carlos Greene, drove through a construction barrier at First Street and Maryland Avenue at approximately 7:45 yesterday morning.

The vehicle, a light colored Chevrolet SUV which was reported stolen in Montgomery County, was stopped by the seat wall surrounding an 8-foot-wide, 18-inch deep pool of water that surround one of the two Great Hall skylights of the CVC complex.

Greene ran up the Capitol steps and entered the building on the third floor and was subsequently caught by Capitol Police on the first floor.

In addition to a loaded small pistol, Greene was in possession of crack cocaine.

“We believe this individual was under the influence of a controlled substance,” McGaffin told reporters.

Shortly after he was apprehended, he suffered a seizure and was transported to Greater Southeast Community Hospital where he has remained under police supervision.

McGaffin said while the breach was unacceptable, officers followed protocol. He praised officers on the interior of the Capitol for their quick reaction to the unauthorized individual.

Asked why Greene was not shot before entering the building, McGaffin replied that lethal force is the last resort and that officers used “perfect judgment.”

He said that Greene would be charged with a number of offenses, including assaulting a police officer.

McGaffin said Greene has a criminal record, but declined to elaborate.

The Capitol was locked down for approximately one hour following the incident.

A CVC spokesman referred all inquiries to Capitol Police, as did the Architect of the Capitol.

For many on Capitol Hill, this incident brought back memories of July 24, 1998 when Russell Eugene Weston Jr. shot and killed Capitol Police officers Jacob J. Chestnut and John M. Gibson outside of then House Majority Leader Tom DeLay's (R-Texas) office.

That incident caused the police to revamp and add security procedures inside the building.

A spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee said staff intends to work with the police to examine yesterday's events so a similar incident could be avoided in the future.

"The committee has been briefed on this incident by the Capitol Hill Police," said House Administration Committee spokeswoman Salley Collins.

A spokeswoman for the Senate Rules Committee said the committee staff director had received preliminary information from the police and had no intention of holding hearings to examine the incident.

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) who oversees the U.S. Capitol Police in his role as the chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on the Legislative Branch, said, "Capitol Police Acting Chief Christopher M. McGaffin said that [yesterday's] security breach was not a funding or resources issue, but a hole in the security plan. The Capitol Police are completing an after action report to study this gap in security and other possible security issues."

He added, "It's unacceptable that there was a security breach and I expect Capitol Police to work to ensure that this kind of security breach does not happen again."

In May, reports of gunfire locked down the Rayburn House Office Building for hours; however, the sound turned out to be construction equipment.

Spokeswomen for the House and Senate sergeant at arms did not return calls for comment.

Armed Man Bursts Into Capitol, Leads Police On Four-Floor Chase (WP)

By Allison Klein And Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

A man drove past security and onto the grounds of the U.S. Capitol yesterday morning and then ran deep inside the building, leading police on a wild chase covering all four main floors before he was cornered in the basement.

More than 25 officers pursued the man, and some managed to wrestle him to the floor outside a room where flags are stored. It was only after they searched him that they found a loaded gun in his waistband. No shots were fired, and no one was injured.

The man, identified as Carlos Greene, 20, also was carrying crack cocaine and cash, authorities said. He suffered a seizure after his arrest and was hospitalized last night.

Police said they had been unable to interview Greene and had not determined why he went to the Capitol in a borrowed sport-utility vehicle.

The episode raised questions about security, and authorities have promised a thorough investigation. Besides getting onto the grounds by crashing through a construction site just behind the Capitol, Greene apparently had little trouble getting inside the building through a restricted entrance on the third floor.

The incident was remarkable in light of the security buildup that followed the slayings of two Capitol Police officers in 1998 and the roughly $2 billion Congress has budgeted for its security since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. It also uncovered weaknesses in a Capitol police force that has grown to 2,300 officers -- bigger than the police departments of some cities.

"It's not a good set of circumstances when a person with a gun can enter the Capitol," said former Capitol Police chief Terrance W. Gainer, who left the department in the spring. "Something didn't happen right."

The incident began about 7:45 a.m. and ended minutes later. Authorities locked down the Capitol until 9 a.m. while they sorted out what had happened, and the security gaps were quickly apparent. It was not until 5:30 p.m. that Acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher M. McGaffin came forward to give the first official account; throughout the day, his spokeswoman declined repeatedly to talk to reporters.

McGaffin pledged to review security and make all needed improvements.

"This was unacceptable by my expectations for the Capitol Police," he said. "It was an unfortunate breach of our security, but it wasn't a total breach. . . . We isolated this individual. We subdued him. No one was hurt."

Greene, of Silver Spring, had drugs in his system, McGaffin said. Greene, who will be charged with possession of a handgun and related offenses, including assaulting a police officer, McGaffin said, could be in U.S. District Court by today.

Court records show that Greene has had brushes with the law in Maryland and the District in the past three years. He was convicted of disorderly conduct in Montgomery County and of fleeing a law enforcement officer in the District. He is awaiting trial in the District after a June arrest on gun and traffic charges. He was to appear today before a judge in Montgomery for allegedly violating terms of his probation.

Greene was locked up for a short stretch this summer but apparently has been free since late July. Attempts to reach his family members for comment, at home and by telephone, were unsuccessful.

Police said Greene drove the Chevy Trailblazer down First Street NE, near the Supreme Court and the east side of the Capitol.

Accounts varied on how the SUV came to be there. At one time, police said it had been stolen. Later, authorities said they were told it had been rented by a Montgomery man who had then given the keys to a relative.

Montgomery police gave this account: About 8:30 a.m. they received a report that the vehicle, with the key in the ignition, had vanished from near an apartment complex in the 11700 block of Old Columbia Pike in Silver Spring.

After the Capitol incident, Capitol Police talked to the man who made the report. The man, according to Montgomery police, then said that the SUV was not stolen but that it had not been returned as expected. Capitol Police said they could not confirm the account.

At the Capitol, the Trailblazer hit or nicked a Capitol Police vehicle and cruised through an open gate to a construction site on Capitol grounds, where workers were erecting the Capitol Visitor Center, police said. The center -- a project budgeted at more than $550 million -- is set to open next summer and has been under construction for several years.

The Capitol Police vehicle was supposed to be blocking the gate, McGaffin said. But Greene got past it and crashed the SUV into a concrete barrier that was protecting a skylight at the visitor center. He then bailed out of the truck, ran about 150 feet and darted up the east stairs to the rotunda and into the building.

Greene first tried to enter the Capitol on the second floor but was unsuccessful, police said. He got in through a construction entrance on the third floor, McGaffin said.

That door was open because construction workers were working inside the entrance, law enforcement sources said. That entrance did not have a metal detector and was not open to the public. McGaffin said he had no information about whether the entrance was guarded.

Once inside, Greene raced past the second floor, which houses offices of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Next he went downstairs to the area known as the Crypt, according to a law enforcement source who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing. Greene fled down another set of stairs and into the basement, where he was caught, authorities said.

Because of the early morning hour, the building was not crowded with staffers and visitors.

Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) said the incident represented the most serious security breach at the Capitol since July 1998, when a former mental patient stormed past a screening device and killed Capitol Police officers Jacob J. Chestnut and John M. Gibson.

Norton said police acted heroically yesterday, but would have to scrutinize security, especially at the entrances. "He did penetrate the Capitol," she said.

McGaffin said police use rings of security, including technology, alarms, officers and barriers. He added that authorities are going over surveillance tapes, protocol and procedures and will make improvements.

"This is not the fault of a police officer," McGaffin said. "We're taking a look at our systems."

The Capitol is a "safe building . . . safe this morning, and . . . safe tonight," he said yesterday.

Man With Gun Leads Police On Chase Through The Capitol (NYT)

By John Files

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 18 — A man crashed his vehicle into a security barricade near the Capitol on Monday morning and ran into the building with a loaded handgun before being arrested, the authorities said.

The man, Carlos Greene, led police officers on a chase through the building, past the offices of the Congressional leadership, and into the basement where the police captured him. The acting chief of the Capitol Police, Christopher M. McGaffin, said the police found that Mr. Greene was carrying a loaded gun and what appeared to be crack cocaine.

"This was unacceptable by my expectation for the Capitol Police," Mr. McGaffin said at a news conference. "It was an unfortunate breach of our security."

Mr. McGaffin said he had ordered a review of his department's security measures.

Mr. Greene, 20, of Silver Spring, Md., had a seizure after he was apprehended him, the police said, and was taken to a Washington hospital for treatment. He was charged with felony possession of a firearm, and other charges were pending the result of further investigation.

Shortly before 8 a.m., Mr. Greene drove a sport utility vehicle through a barricade at the construction site for the Capitol Visitors Center, the future entry and screening point for visitors. The site is on the east side of the Capitol, across from the Supreme Court.

The Capitol was closed briefly, and staff members of lawmakers were instructed to remain in their offices while the authorities investigated. Neither the House nor the Senate were in session at the time.

Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District of Columbia's delegate in the House, called the episode "the most serious breach of the Capitol since we lost two Capitol police a few years ago."

Ms. Norton pointed out that Mr. Greene entered the building through a construction site, rather than through one of the visitor entrances. She urged the Capitol Police to ensure that such sites would be made more secure.

In the summer of 1998, two Capitol Police officers were shot to death when a man darted beyond a weapons detector just inside the building and opened fire.

Entrances to the Capitol are well-guarded, and visitors must pass through metal detectors to come into the building.

The latest episode was unsettling, in part, because the Capitol Police waited much of Monday before addressing it publicly.

"People are wondering how it happened," a senior House leadership aide said. "Nobody has all the facts."

While security around the Capitol increased significantly after the 1998 shooting, and again after the terrorist attacks of September 2001, there have been several security alerts involving the office buildings for members of Congress and their employees.

Killer Of Police Officer Asks U.S. Supreme Court To Stay His Execution Again (LAW/AP)

By Ron Word, The Associated Press

AP, September 19, 2006

A condemned cop killer who received a stay of execution from the U.S. Supreme Court because of his challenge of lethal injections appealed to the Court for a second stay of execution on Monday.

A three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals turned down Clarence Hill's appeal Friday night, leaving him with only limited court options to escape Wednesday's scheduled execution for the 1982 murder of a police officer in a savings and loan robbery.

Defense attorney D. Todd Doss said he had filed a petition and an application for a stay with the Supreme Court, which in January stopped his execution minutes before he was to die. Hill claims the chemicals used in lethal injections are too painful and constitute cruel and unusual punishment.

Doss contends the state, by setting an execution date, is "manipulating the process" and denying Hill the right to challenge the chemicals used. He declined to comment on his next move if the appeal to the High Court is unsuccessful.

"This was done to preclude judicial resolution and violated Mr. Hill's right to due process," Doss' motion to the U.S. Supreme Court states.

Doss also said that inmates facing death in different parts of the country are treated differently.

"Condemned inmates in similar positions to Mr. Hill have been allowed to pursue litigation in order to have the merits of their claim reviewed. In other circuits, however, inmates with the exact same constitutional challenge have been executed without consideration of their claims," Doss said.

Carolyn Snurkowski, a death appeals attorney for the state Attorney General's Office, said she would file court papers attempting to block Hill's appeals.

Hill, 48, was strapped to a gurney and had intravenous tubes attached to his arms in January when the Supreme Court stopped the execution. In an 9-0 ruling in June, the high court ruled that Hill could lodge a civil rights challenge to the chemicals Florida uses in its lethal injection.

Hill has argued that the three chemicals -- sodium pentothal, pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride -- can cause excruciating pain. The first drug is a painkiller. The second one paralyzes the inmate and the third causes a fatal heart attack.

However, neither the federal court in Tallahassee nor the Atlanta appeals court have agreed to consider Hill's challenges to the chemicals.

Both courts have said Hill should have made those arguments years ago. Doss said he could not challenge the chemicals until Florida Gov. Jeb Bush signed a death warrant.

Hill was convicted of first-degree murder for killing Pensacola police Officer Stephen Taylor and was sentenced to death in May 1983. The Florida Supreme Court ordered a new sentencing hearing in October 1985. In April 1986, Hill was again sentenced to death.

States Await Ruling On Use Of Lethal Injection (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

MIAMI, Sept. 18 — Clarence E. Hill was strapped to a gurney last winter, a few moments from death, when the United States Supreme Court halted his execution.

Mr. Hill had claimed that Florida's lethal injection method caused so much pain that it violated the Constitution's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court said in June that the federal district court in Tallahassee had to consider the argument on procedural grounds. That cleared the way for death row inmates around the country to file lawsuits that would otherwise have been prohibited by tight restrictions on petitions for habeas corpus.

But last month, before the district court could review the case, Gov. Jeb Bush rescheduled Mr. Hill's death for Sept. 20. Then, to the surprise of death penalty opponents who thought the district court would take testimony on the state's lethal injection method, the court swiftly rejected the case again. In Atlanta, the United States Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit upheld the decision last week.

Now, with Mr. Hill scheduled to die Wednesday, he has again appealed to the Supreme Court. And lawyers on both sides of the debate are waiting to see how his case may affect the way lethal drugs are administered in 37 states.

Courts in California and Missouri have allowed extensive hearings this year on the lethal injection process, delaying executions until they can study the question of just how painful the current methods are.

Oklahoma recently changed its protocol so that the condemned receive more anesthesia before they are killed, and a federal judge in North Carolina ordered that a brain monitor be used to make sure an inmate was unconscious when the final drug was given. South Dakota delayed its first execution in 59 years last month after Gov. Michael Rounds said lawmakers needed time to review lethal injection protocols.

Other states, including Texas and Virginia, have continued to execute inmates since the Supreme Court's ruling on the Hill case without holding evidentiary hearings on the specific procedures and combinations of chemicals used.

DOJ_NMG_0065291

"Nationally there is an inconsistency in the review of lethal injection challenges," said Richard C. Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center, a research group that opposes capital punishment. "If the Florida case was that serious for the Supreme Court, I would think at a minimum in Florida they would hold an evidentiary hearing to hear from both sides about whether there are particular problems."

The case of Mr. Hill, who killed a police officer in a 1982 robbery in Pensacola, is peaking days after the American Bar Association called for substantial changes in Florida's death penalty laws. In March, the Florida Supreme Court urged the Legislature to require jury decisions to be unanimous in capital cases. Florida is one of the few states without such a rule.

Florida switched to lethal injection in 2000 after flames shot from an inmate's head during his execution by electric chair.

When he reinstated Mr. Hill's death warrant last month, Governor Bush said in a letter to prison officials that the stay from the Supreme Court had expired. But Mr. Hill's lawyer, D. Todd Doss, said Mr. Bush, a Republican who supports the death penalty, could instead have filed a motion to accelerate the rehearing of the case.

On Monday, Mr. Bush said the delays in Mr. Hill's case had made "a mockery" of the judicial system.

"The challenges have been exhausted," he told reporters in Tallahassee. "Unless there's other challenges, I have a duty to sign death warrants, and the system has a duty to carry out the sentence."

Like most other death-penalty states, Florida uses a combination of three chemicals in lethal injection: one to anesthetize the inmate, a second to paralyze the body and a third to stop the heart. Mr. Hill, 48, has based his case on a 2005 study published in the British medical journal The Lancet that concluded that the anesthetic could wear off before an inmate died.

The Supreme Court ruled unanimously on Mr. Hill's case in June, saying that inmates facing execution by lethal injection could invoke a federal civil rights law to challenge the state's choice of drugs and the manner in which they are administered.

In rejecting Mr. Hill's civil rights claim a second time, a three-judge panel of the 11th Circuit court in Atlanta said he had waited too long to file it — he did so four days before he was to be executed in January — and was merely trying to stall.

Mr. Hill's complaint charged that Florida had adopted its lethal injection procedure without medical research or expertise; that "unqualified" prison officials carried it out; and that the drugs used would "create a dangerous likelihood that Mr. Hill will be conscious throughout the execution process and, as a result, will experience an excruciatingly painful and protracted death."

Mr. Doss, his lawyer, said he had hoped for a hearing in which witnesses could testify to whether Florida's method of lethal injection caused undue pain. But Carolyn M. Snurkowski, assistant deputy attorney general for Florida, said the Supreme Court had made no such guarantee.

"No one has thus far suggested that he is entitled to any kind of hearing," Ms. Snurkowski said. "The Supreme Court said the equities lie with the state, and if he's too late in filing this, he might not have a vehicle by which he can get relief."

In California, a federal judge is to review the state's lethal injection method in a hearing scheduled to start next week and is to decide whether it presents an unacceptable risk of inflicting extreme pain in violation of the Eighth Amendment. And in Missouri, a federal judge ruled last week that a new protocol for lethal injection still fell short of providing constitutional protections, preventing executions there.

"Whether we win or lose," Mr. Doss said, "it's not going to go away. Each and every person coming up behind us is going to raise this issue."

Stay of Execution in Tennessee

NASHVILLE, Sept. 18 (AP) — A federal appeals court issued a stay of execution on Monday for a convicted killer who was to die early Tuesday in Tennessee's first electric chair execution in 46 years.

The killer, Daryl K. Holton, confessed to the 1997 assault rifle killings of his three young sons and their half-sister. In granting the stay, the court said it wanted to review the district court's ruling that Mr. Holton's lawyers had failed to prove he was not competent to abandon a federal appeal of his sentence.

Court Issues Stay In Tenn. Execution (FINDLAW/AP)

(AP) - NASHVILLE, Tenn.-A federal appeals court issued a stay of execution Monday for a convicted killer who had stopped appealing his death sentence and was set to be die in the electric chair.

Daryl Keith Holton, who confessed to the assault rifle slayings of his three young sons and their half-sister, had been set to die Tuesday in Tennessee's first electric chair execution in 46 years.

He had resumed appealing his death sentence.

Kelly Gleason, a post-conviction defender working with Holton, confirmed the stay issued by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and also acknowledged she typed and sent a handwritten petition from Holton to the U.S. Supreme Court requesting that his execution be stopped.

"We discussed it and I filed it over the weekend," Gleason said.

Holton, 44, who turned himself in within hours of the 1997 slayings, chose earlier this year to stop appealing his death sentence.

He also chose to be put to death in the electric chair rather than by state's preferred method of lethal injection. Tennessee allows death row inmates to choose between the two execution methods if their crimes were committed before 1999.

Three Cleveland Charter School Operators Indicted (WKYC)

By Kim Wheeler

WKYC-TV Cleveland, Ohio, September 18, 2006

Three former Cleveland charter school operators are facing charges for allegedly defrauding the Ohio Department of Education.

Channel 3's Education Reporter Kim Wheeler broke the story of problems at the Cleveland Academy of Math, Science and Technology back in November of 2003.

Three years later, Auditor of State Betty Montgomery, U.S. Attorney's office, FBI and Labor Department have finished their investigation.

The former charter school officials are charged with defrauding the state out of nearly $2.2 million.

Former officers Shirley Haynes, Timothy Daniels and developer Mark Olds all face charges.

The Auditor's office says the defendants used charter school money for their personal bank accounts, inflated student enrollment, housed children in a building without heat and did not provide sufficient food for students.

Charter schools are supported by tax dollars.

Inmate Tracking Systems Breed Errors (WP)

By Theresa Vargas

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Christopher T. Broady appeared last week on a wanted poster under the words printed in bold: "PRISONER ESCAPE."

But he didn't escape. He didn't even run. Instead, the accused killer was allowed to walk out of the Prince William County jail in a moment of confusion between court and jail officials.

Months earlier, the same jail had kept another inmate, Fernando Cruz, confined two months too long. The problem, officials said, was that his last name was listed in court computers as "Antonio Cruz." To the jail, it was just "Cruz."

The disconnect between two branches of the criminal justice system highlights a fragmented method of tracking inmates in Prince William and other jurisdictions in the Washington region. Although many cities and counties across the country -- particularly those with large immigrant populations -- have used computerized criminal databases for decades that seamlessly share information between courts and jails, the system in area jurisdictions, for the most part, remains disjointed, officials say.

For some, it can create a situation in which a deleted hyphen or a "Smith" spelled "Smyth" can mean an inmate's jail records won't match the court records. The growing immigrant population is particularly susceptible because of the less obvious spellings and the tendency for some to use two last names.

Across the region, officials say they recognize the need to make their court and jail data compatible within each jurisdiction. But for now, most use safeguards that are inconsistent from one area to the next. Some fingerprint all inmates; some don't. Others type in a slew of aliases, while others shun names for numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0065293

"The easiest thing would be if the systems could talk, if we could have systems that just work together," said Susie Doyel of the Arlington County Sheriff's Office. "I think September 11 brought that home. We had so many systems that didn't talk to each other."

Arlington's system is similar to Prince William's, in which officials question whether the current system can keep up with an ever-growing and diversifying population.

"We've watched this place grow for years and years, and the complexity of the town has changed," said Col. Charles "Skip" Land, who heads the Prince William jail. "You can't live in the 1980s and expect to get your job done. You have to learn and grow with the population. Otherwise it'll eat you up."

General District Court Clerk Tawny G. Hays agreed. "There is so much that can be done, that should be done. The longer we wait, the harder it's going to be."

Those who work in the criminal justice system will readily admit that errors happen, especially when dealing with inmates, who are not always cooperative, not always willing to offer up personal information.

Corrections officers tell story after story of inmates lying about their identities -- the scared 19-year-old who gives his neighbor's name and address, the convicted felon who claims to be a sibling with a clean record, the inmate who memorizes another inmate's Social Security number and personal information in hopes of sneaking out early.

The only defense, all agreed, is to put in place as many safeguards as possible.

In such cities as Miami, San Antonio and Los Angeles, which have large, diverse populations, criminal justice officials learned long ago not to depend on names to track inmates. Instead, inmates are fingerprinted and assigned an identifying number that stays with them for life. Their numbers are used to access information in a centralized database that is shared by the courts and jails.

"If a woman was arrested as Delafuente the first time and Flores the second time, it still would always come back to Delafuente," said Lt. Tim Murphy, the watch commander of the inmate reception center in Los Angeles. When there is an error, he added, it is almost always a clerical mistake.

"The system is almost foolproof," Murphy said.

About two years before the Cruz and Broady incidents, a group of Fairfax County officials traveled to Los Angeles to study its criminal tracking system.

"I have never seen coordination that close between those different agencies," Sheriff Stan G. Barry said of the police, courts and jails. "It was as if it was just one agency."

"The information was just much more central, much more accessible to everybody," he said.

The Fairfax sheriff's office is transforming its system, but it has been susceptible to some of the same struggles as Prince William's, officials said. Second Lt. Jason Travis, a supervisor in charge of booking for the jail, said that once every few months, he catches a situation in which an inmate's name was changed just slightly and two separate booking files were created as a result.

In Prince William, officials said they struggle with Hispanic names that tend to be long and reflect both a mother's and father's surname, as was the case with Cruz.

"It's not always limited to ethnicity, but it is a little bit higher [among Hispanics], and the reason for that is the language barrier," Travis said. "If we don't know how to totally ask for their name, they could say Jose Palacio and they are Jose Palacio-Hernandez."

In Northern Virginia, most of the jails use a local system, and the courts tap into a state-operated system managed by the Supreme Court of Virginia. Karl R. Hade, executive secretary for the Supreme Court, said that there is movement toward creating a centralized offense-tracking database but that it might be snagged because the jails are not yet on one system.

In Alexandria, the system is integrated.

"If I'm looking for an inmate in the system, he's in here," said Veronica Mitchell, chief deputy of the Alexandria sheriff's office. "We have a good record. We make very sure no one stays not a day longer than they're supposed to and that those that are supposed to stay really do stay."

DOJ_NMG_0065294

Montgomery County jail officials said they are also moving to an integrated countywide system. Arthur M. Wallenstein, the director of the correction and rehabilitation department, described it as the county's highest information-technology priority.

"All of the departments have gotten together and agreed to play in the same sandbox, for lack of a better word," said Carl Furr, records manager for the corrections department.

Beverly Young, a spokeswoman for the D.C. Department of Corrections, said that there is an effort to move toward a seamless system but that for now the department relies on various safeguards.

D.C. inmates are given numbers that stay with them for life. A comprehensive jail management system put into place in the late 1990s also records massive amounts of information, such as warrants, detainers, commissary accounts and visitor information. Jail and court officials can read information in each other's systems, and as a matter of policy jail officials must check a court database before releasing an inmate.

Both of the Prince William mistakes might have been avoided if jail and court officials were working off of the same information base -- if they could peek in on what each other was doing.

Broady, 19, who was charged with shooting a District man in the head over a drug dispute, was released Sept. 8 as a result of confusion caused when the murder charge was dropped in Circuit Court but was still pending in a lower court. He was captured Thursday and returned to jail.

In Cruz's case, he should have been released when the charges against him were dropped in December, but he wasn't let go until February.

Because of confusion over his name, jail officials failed to bring him to court Dec. 12, when the assault charge against him was dropped. The General District Court clerk's office then failed to issue a release order. He was released but only after a clerk took the time to listen to his brother, who spoke Spanish and had already come to the courthouse several times.

Afterward, four Prince William jail employees spent a week poring over about 800 criminal files, checking names, typing in aliases and paying special attention to the records of Hispanic inmates.

"With the newer people coming in, you have to be more creative," said Land, the head of the jail.

Lt. Victor Quintanilla, the booking supervisor at Bexar County jail in San Antonio, where about 80 percent of inmates are Hispanic, said it might be costly for smaller jurisdictions to move toward a centralized tracking system like the one Bexar has used for some time. But, he said, every place must weigh the money against the possibility of a mistake.

"You look at the liabilities that are involved here," Quintanilla said. "What is more cost-effective here? You walking the tightwire or just playing it by chance that nothing is going to happen?"

CIVIL LAW:

Anti-Abortion Group Fights Campaign Law (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Barring corporations and unions from buying political advertisements during peak election season amounts to government censorship, a Wisconsin anti-abortion group argued Monday.

Wisconsin Right to Life is challenging a ban on corporate ads that mention candidates two months before a general election. The Wisconsin nonprofit group wants to run advertisements telling voters to contact their senators about political issues. The Federal Election Commission says the ads would influence the election.

"You're going to outlaw everything: Rush Limbaugh, the evening news, everything because it has an electoral impact," attorney James Bopp Jr. told a three-judge panel.

Congress passed the advertising restrictions in 2002 to curb the ability of advocacy groups to run attack ads that say they are about political issues. Wisconsin Right to Life says such phony ads may be banned but not at the expense of legitimate political speech.

If the group prevails, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and other lawmakers fear it will open a loophole.

DOJ_NMG_0065295

Wisconsin Right to Life has been fighting the law since 2004, when it sought to run an advertisement urging voters to contact Wisconsin Sens. Russ Feingold and Herb Kohl, both Democrats, and ask them not to hold up President Bush's judicial nominees.

Because Feingold was running for re-election in 2004, the ad was prohibited. Wisconsin Right to Life argued that it wasn't trying to influence an election and said the law restricted its constitutional right to petition the government.

The FEC says the government has an interest in regulating campaign speech and says the Wisconsin group isn't harmed by the restriction because it can either not name the candidates or purchase advertisements through its political action committee, which isn't covered by the law.

If the government prevails, the opponents said, advocacy groups will be prohibited from publicly debating legitimate political issues that arise around election time.

"It would go so far, the First Amendment would be a farce," Bopp said.

The federal panel did not rule Monday. It had dismissed the case last year but the Supreme Court overturned the dismissal and said Wisconsin Right to Life could argue its case before the lower court.

Feds Monitor SoCal City's Recall Election (AP)

AP, September 19, 2006

ROSEMEAD, Calif. - A recall election of two longtime councilmen will proceed Tuesday under the watchful eye of U.S. Justice Department observers.

A court ordered the observers after the councilmen facing recall, Gary Taylor and Jay Imperial, complained their opponents had violated the Voting Rights Act by distributing petitions that were only in English.

Eighty percent of Rosemead residents speak a language other than English at home, according to Census records.

A lawsuit initially delayed the recall effort, led by residents who opposed the pair's vote in support of bringing a Wal-Mart Supercenter to the suburban city 10 miles east of Los Angeles. A higher court ultimately allowed the recall to move forward.

Rosemead's City Council has paid a price for approving the Wal-Mart in 2004. Two incumbents were voted out of office the following year and replaced by Wal-Mart opponents.

The Wal-Mart opened last week.

Feds To Monitor Polling Places In Boston, Springfield (AP)

AP, September 19, 2006

BOSTON - Federal observers will monitor polling places in Boston and Springfield on Tuesday to determine if those cities are protecting the voting rights of Hispanic, Chinese, Vietnamese and other immigrant voters.

Both cities were sued by the Justice Department for alleged polling place violations and the sides settled their cases before trial.

Springfield announced last week that 73 new bilingual poll workers were hired to help Spanish-speaking residents at the polls. One in four poll workers are bilingual, city officials say. The city says it will have 95 bilingual poll workers for the November election.

Last September, Boston agreed to provide ballots, registration notices, and other forms in Spanish, Chinese and Vietnamese.

Boston also agreed to provide more training to poll workers regarding the Voting Rights Act, and to hire more bilingual poll workers.

Hispanic residents comprise 14 percent of Boston's 590,000 residents, while Chinese and Vietnamese residents make up just more than 5 percent, according to 2000 Census figures.

Twenty-seven percent of Springfield's 152,000 residents are Hispanic, according to Census figures.

The lawsuits were part of a national initiative to ensure compliance with the Voting Rights Act in various cities.

DOJ_NMG_0065296

The observers and monitors will gather information concerning compliance.

The Voting Rights Act requires communities with a minority voter population of at least 5 percent or 10,000 people to provide election help in that group's language.

Osceola's Voting System Faces Legal Test (ORS)

By Mark Pino, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, September 19, 2006

The federal trial will examine whether the at-large setup is unfair to Hispanic voters.

Three days in federal court this week could rewrite the course of politics in Osceola County if a federal judge decides the at-large system for electing county commissioners should be abolished because it dilutes the voting power of the county's growing Hispanic population.

U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell essentially ruled that to be the case in June when he indefinitely halted this fall's scheduled commission elections. The action put nine commission hopefuls in limbo until the case is resolved. And the resolution could result in a completely different way of selecting commissioners, allowing only those who live in their district to vote for them.

The trial that starts today in federal court in Orlando is set for three days, but implementing the judge's ruling could take months with commission elections expected in March.

"It's going to be one of the most interesting six months in the political life of Osceola County," said Atlee Mercer, now property appraiser who was a commissioner when the Justice Department sued the county last year regarding the way it elects commissioners. "It's going to be a bumpy ride."

About 38 percent of the electorate in Osceola is Hispanic, according to court documents. Presnell gave a clear indication of his thinking when he issued the injunction, finding that " . . . Hispanics in Osceola County are politically cohesive, and that the Anglo majority vote is racially polarized."

"I think this case has been 95 percent tried already," Presnell said at the time. "Yes, I could change my mind in a trial on the merits; but I think you can see that I have been attentive to the evidence presented. I've reviewed all of the evidence. I think I've dealt with all of the issues, and I'm not sure what more there is to try in a merits trial with the possible exception of the issue of proportionality."

A Hispanic-majority district would have to be similar in size to the other districts so that votes wouldn't have unequal weight in different districts.

In a pretrial brief submitted last week, the county argues that cannot be done. Attorneys for the Justice Department counter with experts who say it is possible.

"If you took the county's defense to its logical conclusion, there never would be a remedy to a voting-rights case mid-decade," Jon Greenbaum, director of The Voting Rights Project at the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law in Washington, D.C., said referring to the interim between censuses.

And historically, that hasn't been the case.

"There is no good legal reason for the county to continue to fight," said Greenbaum, a former Justice Department attorney. "The court also found intentional discrimination [during the injunction hearing]. Normally, that is very hard to overturn on appeal."

If Presnell rules against the county, the next step would be the remedy phase.

Greenbaum said the county gets the first shot at a solution and could propose several alternatives. At the same, the Justice Department will be preparing potential plans. Ultimately, it's up to the judge, who could implement his own plan, he said.

Commissioners have refused to negotiate with the Justice Department, and the acting county manager said she wasn't aware of any settlement offers or negotiations since Presnell delayed elections -- including a round of commission primaries that would have been held Sept. 5. Osceola has spent more than $1 million defending itself in the meantime.

In a document filed last week, the county says that failure to elect Hispanic candidates is "caused by the apathy and indifference of the Hispanic electorate."

But Armando Ramirez, a proponent of single-member districts, disagrees.

DOJ_NMG_0065297

"Perhaps the apathy that exists right now may be due to the discriminatory system of electing our leaders," Ramirez said. "Perhaps many Hispanic voters feel helpless and because of that they have said, 'Why should I vote? My vote will not mean anything.'"

Ramirez is confident that single-member districts are coming, and he said the county is losing its opportunity for input by not negotiating during the ongoing litigation. He thinks the judge will want to see a new system by the end of October.

Mercer has confidence in the county's position, but he said that if the federal government prevails, the process to create new districts will be complicated.

"You will have to completely redesign all of the districts, because if you change one, you've got to change them all," he said.

Greenbaum goes a step further and says a sitting commissioner could find himself drawn out of a district.

"Typically that's why governments negotiate. The danger is that the judge may not be concerned with where the incumbents live."

Mercer worries that the delay will translate into poor voter turnout. He points to the recent 13 percent turnout in the primary.

"You can't predict who will be elected."

Presnell had no doubt in June about how a Hispanic-majority district would perform.

"There is no reason to believe that a majority Hispanic district will not perform, that is, exercise its franchise to elect candidates of their choice," he said.

Prince George's Officer Kills Unarmed Man (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

A Prince George's County police officer responding to an assault call in District Heights yesterday morning fatally shot an unarmed man who allegedly made a threatening movement, police said.

It was the fourth shooting by county officers in three weeks and the second killing.

Cpl. Diane Richardson provided this account of yesterday's incident:

About 1:30 a.m., a county patrol officer from District III went to the 1900 block of Rochelle Avenue in response to a report of a man assaulting a woman. The officer arrived and saw a man later identified as Gregory B. Boggs Jr., 24, standing over a woman, who was on the ground beside an apartment building.

The officer ordered Boggs away from the woman. Boggs picked up the woman, and the officer told him to let her go. The woman either fell or was pushed away.

When the officer ordered Boggs to put his hands up, he reached for his waistband. Fearing that Boggs was reaching for a weapon, the officer fired one round into his upper body.

Boggs was unarmed, police said. He was taken to an area hospital and pronounced dead.

The officer, who was not immediately identified, was placed on administrative leave pending an internal investigation. A county grand jury will also investigate.

Boggs's relatives said yesterday that they did not believe the police account.

Boggs, who lived with his family in a townhouse in Upper Marlboro, went to the District Heights apartment complex to watch a football game with his girlfriend, relatives said.

Boggs was arguing with her when police arrived, said Mary Pitt, Boggs's aunt. Pitt said relatives have spoken with the woman, who Pitt said was not injured.

Pitt said she didn't believe Boggs would do anything to provoke deadly force.

Relatives said Boggs graduated in 2001 from Suitland High School, where he played on the school's football team.

According to Prince George's Circuit Court records, Boggs was facing charges of possession with intent to distribute about $4,000 worth of crack cocaine, second-degree assault and resisting arrest in connection with an incident June 4 in Upper Marlboro.

DOJ_NMG_0065298

Charging documents allege that Boggs pushed and ran away from an officer who tried to conduct a traffic stop about 3 a.m. As he ran, Boggs dropped two bags of crack cocaine, and a loaded .40-caliber handgun was found in his vehicle, the documents said. Boggs was charged with a handgun violation, which was dismissed by a judge Friday.

Richardson said so many police shootings occurring in a short period is an aberration.

In each of the four incidents, officers feared for their lives or for the lives of civilians, Richardson said.

"You can't put all these cases together," Richardson said. "Each should be viewed individually. In each case, the officer had real fear and reacted to that fear."

On Sept. 4, two county police officers, Robert E. Lee and Bruce Bowen, fatally shot a man in District Heights who allegedly drew a .40-caliber handgun, police said. The man, Anthony A. Johnson, 35, had threatened two workers at a nearby grocery store, police said.

The other two recent shootings occurred Sept. 3. In one, Officer David Cheatham Jr. wounded his mother in the Landover home they shared. Cheatham believed his mother was an intruder, police said.

In the other incident, Officer Curtis Gouldin shot a man he believed to be holding a weapon in Clinton. The man, who was wounded in the wrist, was holding a cellphone.

Few Black Churches Get Funds (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

The Bush administration's faith-based initiative is reaching only a tiny percentage of the nation's black churches, most of which have limited capacity to run social programs, hampering the initiative's promise of empowering those congregations to help the needy, according to a study to be released today.

The national survey of 750 black churches by the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies found that fewer than 3 percent are participating in the program, which funnels at least $2 billion a year in federal social services spending to religious organizations.

Black churches in the Northeast and those with self-identified progressive congregations and liberal theologies were most likely to be taking part in the program, a finding that surprised the researchers, who concluded that the White House has not used the program as a political tool as some critics have suspected.

"Those people who were most worried can exhale," said Robert M. Franklin, a professor of social ethics at Emory University who worked as a consultant on the survey. "Churches have not been manipulated by Karl Rove. They have not sold out."

Despite instances of grants going to political and ideological supporters of President Bush, the survey found that, overall, liberal-leaning churches were more likely to apply for and receive the grants, even though they tend to view the program more skeptically than their conservative counterparts do.

"The thing is that the churches that are most likely to actually do social outreach or social ministry are liberal churches, they are not conservative churches," said David A. Bositis, a senior research associate at the center who conducted the study. "Those churches may have significant reservations about the program. But if the money is there, they are going to take it. They are the ones who have the capacity and the infrastructure to get grants and administer them."

While many of the churches surveyed had an interest in assisting those in need and frequently offered small-scale programs such as food pantries or used-clothing giveaways, most had neither the money nor the expertise to do more -- or even to seek more resources.

Most of the nation's estimated 50,000 black churches are led by pastors who work other jobs full time and have little more than administrative help in running their churches. The survey found that more than one in four black churches had annual revenue of less than $100,000 and half had revenue of less than $250,000. Only 12 percent reported taking in more than $1 million a year.

"The survey reveals for us the breadth of churches in the African American community, and it shows how churches that already have capacity have a leg up on churches that may do some good things" but are not in a position to do them on a larger scale, said Harold Dean Trulear, a professor of religion at Howard University who was an adviser on the study.

Jay Hein, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, said that while participation in the initiative among African American churches may not be high, interest is. He said his office has trained thousands of community leaders in the mechanics of the program and has encouraged state and local governments to do the same.

Under Bush's initiative, federal departments have worked to make it easier for religious groups to compete for federal grants to operate programs including drug treatment counseling and Head Start. Bush signed executive orders authorizing the initiative in 2002. It allows religious groups to receive federal grants while exempting them from certain civil rights statutes.

Bush, who has said he wanted to level the playing field between religious and secular organizations, has often said he believes that faith-based groups are more efficient and effective in helping the needy than many government-run social services programs.

"Some Republican strategists had thought of charitable choice as a way to broaden the appeal for the Republican Party among African Americans," said John C. Green, a senior fellow in religion and American politics at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life.

Green said many people had asked him whether the Bush administration was being political or sincere in launching the initiative. "I think both," he said. "What you may be seeing in this survey is evidence of the sincere part of the program."

Smithfield Foods To Buy Premium Standard For $674 Million (AP)

AP, September 19, 2006

SMITHFIELD, Va. - Leading pork products maker Smithfield Foods Inc. said Monday it agreed to buy Kansas City, Mo.-based rival Premium Standard Farms Inc. for $674 million in cash and stock.

Smithfield Foods is the leading processor and marketer of fresh pork and processed meats in the United States and the largest producer of hogs. Premium Standard Farms is the second-largest pork producer and sixth-largest pork processor.

The deal represents the latest expansion for Smithfield. It recently agreed to acquire most assets of the branded meats business of ConAgra Foods Inc., giving it well-known brands such as Butterball, with its premium turkeys, in time for the holidays.

Hours after the announcement, Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., called on U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to review the merger to assess how it would impact competition in the pork industry.

Talent said he wanted the Justice Department to make sure the merger would fairly treat Missouri pork producers who contract with PSF and that competition in the marketplace is not harmed.

Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt also sent a letter to Gonzales, seeking assurances that the merger fully complies with antitrust laws.

Smithfield already owns Farmland Foods, Inc., in Kansas City, Mo., and Murphy-Brown, LLC, in Nevada. About 244 employees work for Farmland Foods in Platte County, Mo., and 32 work for Murphy-Brown in Vernon County, Mo.

PSF has more than 2,100 employees in Missouri. About 40 employees work in Kansas City, with another 2100 divided between facilities in Mercer and Sullivan Counties.

"This merger is an exciting announcement for these valued Missouri employers," Blunt said in a statement. "While I look forward to their continued presence in our state, my first concern remains protecting Missouri farmers and Missouri jobs."

The Justice Department typically reviews most major corporate mergers to make sure the action does not reduce competition.

Smithfield, in partnership with investment group Oaktree Capital Management LLC, also recently bought the European meats business of food and apparel company Sara Lee Corp.

DOJ_NMG_0065300

Under terms of the latest agreement, each Premium Standard share will be converted into the right to receive 0.678 Smithfield shares plus $1.25 in cash. That was worth about $20.07 per PSF share based on Smithfield's closing price on Friday, and was a 13 percent premium over Premium Standard's closing price Friday.

Smithfield will also assume about $117 million of Premium Standard's debt as part of the deal.

ContiGroup Cos., which owns 38.8 percent of Premium Standard Farms, has agreed to vote its shares in favor of the deal, Smithfield said.

The deal is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007, after which it is expected to be beneficial to Smithfield earnings.

"We have strong expertise in both live hog production and in fresh pork processing," said C. Larry Pope, Smithfield's president and chief executive. "Strategically, this is a very good long-term fit and near-term, this combination should generate benefits for both organizations and our customers."

The agreement enables PSF shareholders to receive an immediate premium for their shares, said John M. Meyer, president and CEO of PSF.

Smithfield will issue about 21.9 million shares in exchange for PSF shares. PSF has about 32 million shares outstanding.

All current PSF hog production contracts will be honored and Smithfield will remain committed to purchasing "significant" numbers of hogs on the open market, Smithfield said.

Smithfield added that PSF plants will remain open and operating at least at current production levels.

Premium Standard Farms shares rose $2.26, or 12.8 percent, to close at $19.99 on the Nasdaq Stock Market, while Smithfield shares fell $1.02, or 3.5 percent, to end at $28.22 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Smithfield Foods To Purchase Rival (RTD)

Richmond Times-Dispatch, September 19, 2006

Meat company sets $674 million deal for Premium Standard

SMITHFIELD -- Smithfield Foods Inc. said yesterday that it agreed to buy rival Premium Standard Farms Inc. for $674 million in cash and stock.

Smithfield, based in Isle of Wight County, is the largest pork company and one of the largest meat-processing companies in the world.

It has been on an acquisition binge in recent years, but company executives made it clear in a conference call yesterday that they would be concentrating now on integrating the company's acquisitions rather than making new ones.

Under terms of the latest agreement, each Premium Standard share will be converted into the right to receive 0.678 Smithfield shares plus $1.25 in cash. That was worth about $20.07 per Premium Standard share based on Smithfield's closing price on Friday, or a 13 percent premium over Premium Standard's closing price Friday.

Smithfield also will assume about $117 million of Premium Standard's debt.

ContiGroup Cos., which owns 38.8 percent of Premium Standard, has agreed to vote its shares in favor of the deal, Smithfield said.

The deal is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007 and will be reviewed by the Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission.

"We believe this transaction . . . will result in positive benefits for consumers," Smithfield spokesman Adam Weiner said.

As for the impact on Virginia farmers who contract with Smithfield, Weiner said the company will honor all hog-production contracts and will remain committed to buying hogs on the open market.

Times-Dispatch staff writer Greg Edwards contributed to this report.

Blunt Seeks Anti-trust Investigation Of Merger (SLBIZ)

St Louis Business Journal, September 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065301

Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt sent a letter Monday to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales calling for an anti-trust investigation into the merger deal between Smithfield Food Inc. and Premium Standard Farms Inc.

In his letter, Blunt requests a stringent and thorough review to ensure that the merger is fully compliant with all antitrust laws and regulations of the United States.

"This merger is an exciting announcement for these valued Missouri employers. While I look forward to their continued presence in our state, my first concern remains protecting Missouri farmers and Missouri jobs," Blunt said in a statement.

Smithfield and Premium Standard Farms have Missouri operations.

Smithfield, the nation's largest hog producer, owns Farmland Foods Inc. in Kansas City, Mo., and Murphy-Brown LLC in Nevada. About 244 people work for Farmland Foods in Platte County and 32 for Murphy-Brown in Vernon County.

Premium Standard Farms Inc., the second largest pork producer, is headquartered in Kansas City and represents about 2,140 Missouri jobs. An estimated 40 people work in Kansas City with another 2,100 divided between facilities in Mercer and Sullivan counties.

Ford, GM Fleetingly Considered A Marriage (USAT)

By Sharon Silke Carty, Usa Today

USA Today, September 19, 2006

DETROIT — General Motors (GM) and Ford Motor (F) briefly explored the idea of an alliance this summer, but the talks stopped shortly after they began and likely won't turn into anything more, said a source at one of the automakers who was briefed on the discussions.

The source doesn't want to be named because the information is not being made public.

The discussions, first reported Monday in Automotive News, happened in July after news that investor Kirk Kerkorian was pressuring GM into exploring an alliance with Renault and Nissan, both headed by CEO Carlos Ghosn. Ghosn is widely regarded as an automotive turnaround expert.

A Ford spokesman declined to comment. GM spokesman Steve Harris said the company routinely talks with other automakers about possible strategic partnerships, but "as a policy, we don't comment on those discussions."

Both automakers, plagued with financial woes, are looking for ways out of their current problems. The idea of GM partnering with France's Renault and Japan's Nissan excited investors and led to speculation about what kinds of cost savings GM could gain from a deal.

GM CEO Rick Wagoner is heading a committee looking into possible benefits of teaming up with the two automakers. The automakers are about two-thirds of the way through a 90-day study.

Ghosn has said he would only undertake an alliance if the benefits were substantial.

David Cole of the Center for Automotive Research said the amount of talk among top automotive leaders is unusually high lately.

"What is interesting to me is that, by and large, industry leaders are talking with each other fairly regularly; it's just not in the public view," he said. "It's important not to read too much into these things. There's a lot of discussions going on between companies right now."

Elevated gas prices throughout much of 2006 have pushed sales of large SUVs and pickups, the big moneymakers for the domestic automakers, down nearly 10% through the end of August. That, coupled with high raw material, health care and labor costs, has caused financial problems for both Ford and GM. In the first half of the year, GM lost $2.9 billion and Ford $1.4 billion.

It's unclear what benefits either would gain from an alliance. "An outright merger would be almost impossible to fathom," said Lowell Peterson, a labor and bankruptcy attorney at Meyer Suozzi English & Klein. The automakers have different cultures, overlapping product lines and competing dealerships throughout the country.

"Even with diminished market shares, together Ford and GM have a large percentage of the U.S. market, which could raise antitrust issues," Peterson said.

Analysts: GM-Ford Talks Sign Of Times (AP)

By David N. Goodman, Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0065302

AP, September 19, 2006

Automakers constantly seek ways to collaborate even amid fierce competition. Both companies mum.

DETROIT — General Motors' talks with Renault and Nissan on a possible alliance and reports that Ford may be pursuing a big deal with one or more of the three are examples of how today's automakers constantly look for ways to collaborate even amid fierce industry competition.

GM and Ford declined comment Monday on an Automotive News article that their high-level executives discussed a merger or alliance. Ford Motor Co. also declined comment on last month's Wall Street Journal report that Ford proposed its own deal with Renault and Nissan.

In July, General Motors Corp., Renault SA of France and Nissan Motor Co. of Japan announced a 90-day review of a possible alliance among them.

Auto executives talk frequently about "what-if scenarios" and possible deals large and small, said David Cole, chairman of the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor.

These talks have yielded a growing number of joint efforts on everything from hybrid vehicles to better automatic transmissions, he said.

GM and Ford have been slashing their work forces and closing plants in efforts to reverse multibillion-dollar losses in the face of tough competition from Asia-based automakers.

Both companies declined comment on the Automotive News article that quoted several unidentified people who said senior GM and Ford executives had begun talks in July but that the talks are not taking place now.

Cole said an outright GM-Ford merger is unlikely and said that the companies carefully weigh antitrust issues during the lower-level cooperation that now takes place on such issues as hybrid vehicles.

Sessions Is House Point Man For Wright (FWST)

By Maria Recio

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — The ball is now in Pete Session's court.

As Wright Amendment legislative issues bounce between the Senate and House, Sessions, a five-term Republican congressman from Dallas, is now House point man for the bill that would repeal federal flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field after eight years.

"What we're trying to do is accomplish the deal," Sessions, 51, said in an interview. Sessions is Texas' only member of the House Rules Committee — a relatively obscure but extremely powerful panel that decides the terms under which the House will consider a bill, notably whether it will be subject to amendment.

In this case, the committee must decide which of two proposed versions of the bill will be the base legislation for a potential full House vote. The first version, approved by the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, incorporates the Love Field deal, reached in June by Fort Worth, Dallas, American Airlines, Southwest Airlines and Dallas/Fort Worth Airport. The House Judiciary Committee approved a competing version of the legislation, removing antitrust immunity.

With the rules committee poised to decide as soon as this week what to do with Wright, Sessions is in center court.

In a meeting Thursday, the power players trying to get the agreement into law — Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas; House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton, R-Arlington; Reps. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth, and Eddie Bernice Johnson, D-Dallas; and Sessions — decided that Sessions will take the lead in the House.

"The agreement is to let me work on it," said Sessions, who has served on the committee for eight years. "There are five or six ways of getting this done. I am low-keying this and looking for the best option."

Sessions said he anticipated knowing by Wednesday what course to take. He said he will talk to members about the best "vehicle," meaning legislation, the best "avenue," such as various routes through the rules committee or even under suspension of the rules, and the best "timing."

"I want to accomplish this as quickly as possible," Sessions said. But "I don't want to give any member the chance to say, 'Damn Texans think they run the place.' "

DOJ_NMG_0065303

Sessions is aware of the delicacy of coming across too strong, especially where House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., is concerned. The temperamental Sensenbrenner led the fight to strip the agreement of antitrust protection and could force a showdown on the House floor.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., has to balance the interests of competing chairmen: Sensenbrenner and Don Young, R-Alaska, of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee.

"We believe the speaker is favorable to moving the legislation," Sessions said. "We have to come to him with a final agreement."

Rep. Kenny Marchant, R-Coppell, said in an interview, "There's several ways for it to go. There's a lot of respect being given to Mr. Sensenbrenner."

Meanwhile, in the Senate, Hutchison continues to try to mediate the antitrust issue with Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the Judiciary Committee chairman, and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking member.

"The staffs have continued to talk through the weekend and today," said Marc Short, Hutchison spokesman. "The senator remains optimistic that we will find language that is amenable to the parties and Sen. Specter and Sen. Leahy."

If an agreement on language that satisfies antitrust advocates and the stakeholders is reached, it would become part of legislation in the Senate and House.

The agreement can be voided if Congress doesn't approve it by year's end.

The House and Senate have named a target adjournment date of Oct. 6; Senate leaders are aiming for Sept. 29. In any case, both houses are expected to return after elections for a "lame-duck" session. Why you should care

Congress is debating legislation that would lift the federal Wright Amendment, which today limits most scheduled passenger flights at Dallas Love Field to Texas and nearby states.

The legislation is based on an agreement reached by American Airlines, Southwest Airlines, Fort Worth, Dallas and D/FW Airport. It must be passed by Congress before it can take effect. It would repeal Wright after eight years but immediately allow connecting, one-stop and multistop flights to faraway cities, so long as the first leg of the trip ended within the current Wright zone. It would also cut Love's size to 20 gates from 32.

Proponents of the deal say it would increase competition in the North Texas air market and push airfares down. Critics say the proposed law is overrated and would preserve near-monopolies by American at D/FW and Southwest at Love.

Reynolds Merger Passes Antitrust Test (DAYTBIZ)

Dayton Business Journal, September 19, 2006

The federal government has approved Reynolds and Reynolds Co.'s merger into Universal Computer Systems Holding Inc. and the deal now only awaits shareholder votes.

The Federal Trade Commission has granted early termination to the waiting period imposed by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976.

Completion of the buyout also is subject to other closing conditions, Reynolds announced late Monday.

The special meeting for shareholders to vote on the proposal is scheduled for Oct. 23. The meeting will be at Reynolds' (NYSE: REY) Research Park headquarters in Kettering and definitive proxy material is scheduled to be sent around Sept. 22.

Reynolds agreed in August to be acquired and merged into privately held UCS in a deal valued at about $2.8 billion. Reynolds stockholders will receive $40 per share in the transaction.

Reynolds develops management software for the automotive retail industry, with more than 20,000 customers in North America. It has 1,700 local employees and 4,300 total workers globally.

Houston-based UCS is also a dealership technology company with about 2,600 employees.

Outdated Court Rulings Stymie Mergers Regulators, Says Former FTC Official (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, September 19, 2006

Courts are behind the times when it comes to reviewing merger cases, making it harder for regulators to block the ones that may harm competition, according to an antitrust lawyer who recently left a senior post at the Federal Trade Commission.

Speaking to a gathering of fellow antitrust attorneys on Wednesday, Susan Creighton, formerly the head of the FTC's Bureau of Competition and now a partner at Wilson, Sonsini, Goodrich & Rosati, said federal judges continue to base merger review decisions on court precedents established in the 1960s that emphasize the number of players remaining in a market post-merger.

That's a big problem today for antitrust enforcers at the FTC and the Department of Justice because they place primary focus on assessing the potential competitive harms of a merger, with much less importance put on the market's structure.

In typical merger reviews today, regulators analyze a range of economic data to assess whether the deal will likely cause prices to increase and only then focus on which other competitors exist and how they manage to constrain prices. That market structure data, she explained, is really secondary to the harm caused to consumers.

The disconnect between current regulatory techniques and the longstanding methods the courts use explains some of the most high-profile losses regulators suffered when they have tried to block mergers in the past few years.

When the Justice Department tried to stop the Oracle Corp.-PeopleSoft Inc. merger, U.S. District Court Judge Vaughn Walker began his ruling against the government with a careful analysis of the market structure, Creighton said, and "the analysis the judge did was completely backward." After 29 pages discussing the structure of the market for enterprise application software, he discussed competitive effects for "five pages at the end."

Walker's decision said that since there were other competitors, the government's arguments to block the merger weren't persuasive.

Creighton said the court's continuing focus on market structure can probably be attributed to a judge's need to base decisions on precedential merger cases and the dearth of recent Supreme Court merger rulings.

Existing precedents are decades old and tend to focus on the number of competitors in a market.

This prevailing judicial process was cast by a Supreme Court case decided in 1962, when the government tried to block Brown Shoe Co.'s 1955 purchase of G. R. Kinney Shoe Co. The analysis of Chief Justice Earl Warren began with a careful review of the market for shoes and ended up with the decision that the merger, which would have resulted in one company having less than 10 percent of the shoe sales in the country, would harm competition.

That antiquated process is not how today's enforcers evaluate mergers, according to Creighton. "My pervasive experience at the FTC is the first question is, 'Do we think it will be causing competitive effects?'"

Today, if there is evidence of uniform pricing, no price drop when new competitors enter a market or a price hike when other competition leaves the market, deal approval is likely without an intense review of market structure, Creighton said.

But if there is a high probability of price increases if a merger is completed, she suggested parties may have to head to court and hope for a judge who is willing to hear arguments about the range of competitors, including those who may be entering a market, and so on.

If you don't have a good story about why the merger is good, there may be some reasons to advise clients to quit negotiating for antitrust approval with agency attorneys and "go straight to court," if their arguments about competition in the market is better, she said.

Despite their outdatedness, most antitrust lawyers agree that Brown Shoe and cases like it are unlikely to be replaced as controlling precedent soon because merger cases rarely make it to the Supreme Court. Because few companies can afford to keep a deal on hold for the three years or so appeals take to reach the top court, most deals unwind if the government successfully blocks them at a lower court level. The merger between H. J. Heinz Co. and Beech-Nut Nutrition Corp. in 2001 was one of the few deals that made it even to the appeals court level. The FTC convinced the appeals panel to stop the deal.

Major Music Labels Negotiate With YouTube (AP)

By Rachel Konrad, AP Technology Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065305

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP) A revenue-sharing deal between video startup YouTube Inc. and Warner Music Group Corp. is likely to be the first of a spate of content distribution partnerships between Web sites and music companies, industry officials say.

Warner Music Group Corp., the country's third-largest recording company with annual revenue of $3.5 billion, announced Monday a deal to distribute and license its copyrighted songs and other material through YouTube. The agreement means that millions of YouTube users can legally watch music videos or include popular songs in their own homemade videos that they post on YouTube.

Universal Music Group spokesman Peter LoFrumento confirmed Monday that Universal the top record label in the world, representing artists such as Eminem, Melissa Etheridge, Snoop Dogg, Shania Twain, Stevie Wonder and Sting is also negotiating with YouTube to strike a distribution deal.

Last week, Universal Music Group CEO Doug Morris said that the company had to figure out some way to stop ``copyright infringers'' such as YouTube and News Corp.'s social networking site MySpace.com. Morris implied that, if YouTube negotiations fell through, Universal might resort to lawsuits or other measures.

Sony BMG Music Entertainment is also negotiating with YouTube, but a representative for New York-based Sony BMG said Monday that the company wouldn't comment on ongoing negotiations. Sony BMG labels include Arista Records, Columbia Records, Epic Records, Sony BMG Nashville and Sony Urban Music.

Negotiations between the 19-month-old startup YouTube and the biggest players in the recording industry mark a major change in the previously chilly relationship between Hollywood and Silicon Valley.

For years, music and movie companies were reluctant to use the Internet to disseminate content because of the threat of piracy and copyright infringement. But business experts say the phenomenon of YouTube and MySpace particularly among young consumers have forced the labels to venture online.

Simultaneously, startups seem increasingly willing to come up with revenue-sharing business models that compensate recording executives and their artists, said Phil Leigh, president of market reseach group Inside Digital Media.

``The Warner deal is one more piece of evidence that the record labels are comprehending the value of free music distribution,'' Leigh said. ``Instead of insisting on being paid every time, they're realizing they can use the Internet to popularize music and stimulate demand for both CD and digital downloads.''

The Warner-YouTube deal, announced Monday, means that Warner will transfer thousands of its music videos, artist interviews and other digital content to San Mateo, Calif.-based YouTube, a Web site launched 19 months ago by two 20-something buddies.

Industry analysts praised the deal. Instead of protesting free digital distribution by sending cease and desist orders or lawsuits, as record labels did several years ago with Napster and other emerging sites, Warner and YouTube can work together.

Consumers will likely have access to Warner music videos and songs by the end of the year, when YouTube rolls out an advanced content identification and royalty reporting system to help minimize copyright infringement.

``Warner has been the most aggressive in all things digital, whether downloads or ring tones and now video,'' said American Technology Research Senior Analyst P.J. McNealy. ``This is a natural progression and a pre-emptive strike to help eliminate potential copyright concerns.''

Besides the namesake label, Warner is releasing titles from the Atlantic, Asylum, Elektra and Rhino labels, which feature artists Led Zeppelin, the Doors and Ray Charles, as well recent hit makers Linkin Park, Green Day and Faith Hill.

YouTube and Warner will share revenue from advertising on both Warner videos and videos that YouTube users upload that include content from Warner's music video library. YouTube users view more than 100 million videos per day.

Pacific Crest Securities analyst Steve Lidberg expects the Warner deal to be the first of many in upcoming months.

``The labels still want to be paid each time. What's changed is that they've found new monetization models where they can get paid,'' Lidberg said. ``It's a new revenue source for Warner that they weren't getting paid from before. ... I'd expect this to be the foundation by which YouTube could have other discussions with the major labels in the marketplace.''

Warner stock closed at $24.40 Monday, down 10 cents from Friday on the Nasdaq Stock Exchange.

YouTube Model Is Compromise Over Copyrights (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney And Ethan Smith

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

Video-sharing site YouTube Inc., in a move that could defuse the threat of legal action against it, is racing to overhaul the way media and entertainment companies view unlicensed online use of their content.

YouTube is rolling out technology designed to automatically spot copyrighted material that users upload without the permission of media companies, and then to share ad revenue with those companies.

Consumers go to YouTube to watch videos ranging from music videos to footage of a napping cat more than 100 million times a day and submit more than 65,000 videos a day.

YouTube's new system, announced yesterday and set for release in the next few months, is an ambitious effort to give media companies more control over the video on the site and to address their fears that others will profit from consumers' piracy of their content. The first entertainment company to embrace the system is Warner Music Group. The two companies have agreed that Warner Music will post its catalog of music videos on YouTube and collect an unspecified percentage of the revenue from advertising appearing alongside them. The deal doesn't cover live performances captured on video cameras or other devices, because Warner doesn't own the copyrights to those recordings.

In addition, the new system will give YouTube users a legitimate way to create videos with soundtracks that use music from Warner artists. (Videos of amateurs' lip syncing or juggling to popular songs are among the most viewed on video-sharing sites.) YouTube's system will identify such videos and give Warner a share of the revenue for any ads that appear alongside these videos, if Warner opts for that rather than having the videos removed.

For YouTube, a closely held San Mateo, Calif., company, the new system offers the chance to bring revenue, users and a legitimacy to content that, in many cases, probably would otherwise infringe on copyrights. Consumers get free, legal use of Warner music for their videos -- although there wasn't much standing in their way before. Warner gets ad revenue it wasn't otherwise receiving.

YouTube and Warner declined to discuss specifics of their agreement. Alex Zubillaga, Warner's executive vice president for digital strategy and business development, said the terms are "comparable" to those of its other video-licensing deals. Existing video-licensing deals currently don't generate significant revenue for music companies. People who work in the industry estimate Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group, the world's largest recorded music company, earns around $15 million a year, or less than 0.5% of its annual revenue, from hundreds of online video licensees. But the money these deals generate is growing rapidly, these people add.

YouTube's new system is the latest attempt by an online startup to transition from disputed copyright practices to a less-controversial business model. TV and movie companies are just starting to come to grips with how to manage video-sharing technology. There are signs they could be interested in cutting deals: Several TV executives say they have been in talks with YouTube and other video sites about ways to make some content freely available. General Electric Co.'s NBC Universal signed an advertising and content deal with YouTube in June.

YouTube's agreement with Warner hinges on a digital system YouTube is developing to identify automatically copyrighted music or other audio, and related video its users upload. The system relies partly on what's known as "fingerprinting" -- comparing audio uploaded to the site to unique attributes of copyrighted content it already knows. YouTube's planned system is similar in some respects to one proposed last year by an online music startup, Snocap Inc., which was launched by Shawn Fanning, the founder of Napster. Snocap is seeking to help peer-to-peer music services and other online outlets become legitimate music distributors. YouTube said the audio-identification system could potentially be used to locate non-music content such as video clips from TV shows, and that it could eventually use video-identification technology as well.

While YouTube's services are focused on video, the most significant challenge could come from the music industry, which remains divided on how to protect its content online. EMI Group PLC has said it, too, is in talks with YouTube. A spokesman for the world's No. 2 music company, the joint venture Sony BMG, declined to comment.

Universal appears poised to put up a fight. Universal CEO Doug Morris last week told investors that YouTube violates copyright laws by allowing users to post music videos and other Universal content. He said YouTube and News Corp.'s MySpace social-networking site "owe us tens of millions of dollars." (Universal's Interscope Records is a partner in the MySpace Records label.) A Universal spokesman declined to comment.

"We've reached out to [Universal Music] to let them know we're willing to work with them," said Chad Hurley, chief executive of YouTube.

In announcing the system, YouTube could open itself up to a flood of requests by creators of videos looking for their own share of advertising revenue. Other sites such as Revver Inc. currently give amateur video creators a percentage of ad revenue. YouTube in the future will explore options for sharing online ad revenue with smaller, or amateur creators, Mr. Hurley said. But "right now we're building tools for record labels, TV networks and movie studios."

YouTube currently faces legal challenges. Robert Tur, the owner of Los Angeles News Service, named YouTube in a complaint filed in July in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles. He alleges copyright infringement in connection with several videos that were available through YouTube. YouTube has said Mr. Tur's suit is "without merit." A similar case, which an adult-entertainment company, Io Group Inc., brought against a video-sharing site, Veoh Networks Inc., in June in U.S. District Court for California's Northern District, makes a similar claim. A ruling against Veoh could potentially set a precedent affecting YouTube.

YouTube and other video sites currently follow a so-called safe-harbor process, enshrined in the Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998. Under that process, they have to comply with "takedown" notices that copyright holders may send when they become aware of content uploaded without their permission. Some entertainment companies have privately expressed frustration with the process, since it requires them to track down infringing works on a multitude of video-sharing sites.

Under YouTube's system, media companies will have a way to have their content removed without resorting to separately sending takedown letters: YouTube plans to provide them with tools to directly request either to remove or to share ad revenue for specific videos.

No Microsoft Vendetta, Says Kroes (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, September 19, 2006

The war of words between Microsoft and the European Commission over the software group's new flagship product has escalated, with Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, denouncing what she calls "a co-ordinated campaign" to discredit the regulator.

Ms Kroes, in a letter to the Financial Times, insists that the Commission is not conducting a "vendetta" against Microsoft. Brussels, she says, is simply trying to ensure that Vista, the operating system set to replace Microsoft Windows next year, complies with EU competition rules.

The Commission is concerned about Vista because it bundles a string of new programmes and functions into the operating system, for example an internet search engine and a fixed-document reader.

It fears that the product will undermine competition from software makers that sell similar products on a standalone basis.

Microsoft warned last week that the Commission's actions could delay the launch of Vista in Europe, and could even prevent the group from improving the security of the new operating system.

The group has also published a study claiming that Vista will create thousands of new jobs in Europe and boost other companies' revenues.

But Ms Kroes says in her letter: "I have seen it suggested that the Commission may seek to prevent Microsoft from improving the security of its operating system. This is categorically not the case. We do nevertheless seek to ensure that rival security software vendors . . . are able to compete on a level playing field."

She adds: "Similarly, I have noted attempts to link the ongoing Vista discussions to the purported creation of jobs in Europe that a Microsoft-sponsored study claims will result from Vista, It would be wrong to imagine such a link. If jobs are to be created as a result of Vista's release, any such job creation would only be enhanced with the release of a version of Vista which allowed others to compete on the merits of their products."

Ms Kroes also disputes complaints that the Commission failed to issue sufficient guidance showing how Microsoft could avoid new antitrust trouble on Vista.

Microsoft said yesterday: “We look forward to constructive discussions with the Commission that we hope will yield clarity on how we should proceed.”

The Commission’s concerns regarding Vista are based on its landmark ruling against Microsoft in March 2004, when it found the software group had abused its dominant market position and imposed a record €497m ($630m) fine.

Scania Rejects Bid From MAN (WSJ)

By Christoph Rauwald And Maria Akerhielm

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

STOCKHOLM -- Swedish truck maker Scania AB and its largest shareholders rejected MAN AG's takeover bid, putting pressure on the German company to sweeten its offer.

MAN, based in Munich, had offered €9.6 billion ($12.2 billion) in cash and shares yesterday in a widely expected move, seeking to form Europe's largest commercial-vehicle maker.

"Scania rejects the bid in its entirety," company spokeswoman Cecilia Edstroem said. She declined to comment on details of the offer.

German car maker Volkswagen AG, Scania's biggest shareholder with 34% of the voting rights, said that accepting MAN's offer wouldn't be in the strategic and industrial interests of the company. Scania's board, which unanimously rejected the bid, is headed by Volkswagen Chairman Bernd Pischetsrieder.

The second-largest shareholder, Investor AB, the main investment vehicle of Sweden's powerful Wallenberg family, said the offer doesn't "reflect the fair value and potential of Scania." Through Investor and family foundations, the Wallenbergs control about 29% of the votes in Scania.

Despite the rejections, MAN Chief Executive Hakan Samuelsson said he expects a deal to be closed in the first half of next year at the latest. He said that further down the line, he has even larger ambitions for a combined MAN-Scania, and that he is open either to acquisitions or deeper pacts with truck makers in North America and Asia. "We want to be one of the global leaders. We are open to all possibilities," Mr. Samuelsson said.

MAN had offered €38.35 ($48.56) cash and 0.151 of its own shares for both the Class A and Class B shares of Scania. On the Stockholm Stock Exchange yesterday, Scania A and B shares both closed at 449.50 kronor ($62), up 5.3% and 5.9%, respectively. Scania's A and B shares are identical apart from voting rights, with the A shares having 10 times the votes of the B shares.

Shares of MAN dropped 4.6% to €61.10 in Frankfurt.

MAN said that combined with Scania, it would be the world's third-largest truck maker by market share, behind Volvo AB of Sweden and DaimlerChrysler AG of Germany. Mr. Samuelsson said the new company would be "a European champion and a global player positioned to achieve profitable growth in existing and new markets."

MAN said it would reap at least €500 million a year in synergies within three years if it succeeded in the deal, with integration costs of €150 million.

MAN said French car maker Renault SA has agreed to sell the company its 5.6 million Scania A shares, which represent 2.9% of the share capital and 5.2% of the votes.

The company said no sites would be closed if the deal went through and management would be shared between executives from the two companies, with Scania executives joining the combined group's management board. It said the transaction would be accretive to MAN earnings in the first year.

In a statement, Mr. Samuelsson said: "The enlarged group will be able to increase its competitiveness, whilst also securing jobs in Germany and Sweden. The combination of two successful companies will be positioned to grow faster from a position of strength."

Sales of new trucks soared this year, but analysts expect demand to slow next year in top markets such as North America and Western Europe because the industry's cycle is passing its peak, raising the pressure for consolidation.

Tainted Spinach Strikes In 20th State (LAT)

By Deborah Schoch, Rong-gong Lin li And Howard Blume

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

Illinois today became the 20th state to report an illness associated with eating spinach.

In a press release posted on its website, the Illinois Department of Public Health said an elderly woman from north-central Illinois was the first state resident whose illness was associated with the outbreak that has sickened at least 109 people in 19 other states.

The woman, who was not identified, was hospitalized in August with a form of kidney failure associated with E. coli O157:H7, believed to be responsible for the current outbreak. The woman has a history of consumption of fresh spinach, the department said.

According to the federal Food and Drug Administration, half of the E. coli victims were hospitalized; one person died in Wisconsin.

Dates of the illness ranged from Aug. 2 to Sept. 9.

The states that have reported cases are: California (1 case), Connecticut (2), Idaho (4), Indiana (8), Kentucky (4), Maine (2), Michigan (6), Minnesota (1), New Mexico (5), Nevada (1), New York (7), Ohio (10), Oregon (5), Pennsylvania (3), Utah (14), Virginia (1), Washington (2), Wisconsin (32), and Wyoming (1).

Meanwhile, another packager recalled three brands of its fresh spinach products Sunday.

Salinas-based River Ranch Fresh Foods, one of the nation's top five produce processors, was recalling three of its spring mix salad brands Sunday that include spinach: Farmers Market, Hy Vee, and Fresh and Easy, Acheson said in a conference call.

Robert Jenkins, president and chief executive of River Ranch, said Sunday evening he was confident that the source of the contamination will be found.

"We are not aware of any illnesses that have been linked to the consumption of spring mix," he said. "We're obviously very supportive of the work the FDA is doing."

The River Ranch products were distributed to customers in Iowa, Texas and New Mexico.

"I'm confident we're going to figure this one out. There's just too much talent, too many people, not to figure this out and regain the confidence of consumers," Jenkins said.

The company buys in bulk from Natural Selection Foods, one of the nation's largest producers of organic produce.

Since last week, Natural Selection has been the primary focus of the investigation into the source of the outbreak, because many of those sickened apparently ate its packaged spinach. However, E. coli has not been found in the company's bags of spinach, and health officials have said others could be implicated. Natural Selection issued its own recall of 31 brand names.

The recalls come as the FDA has warned consumers not to eat any fresh spinach or products containing it until further notice. Erring on the side of caution, officials did not recommend cooking the fresh greens. Canned and frozen spinach are not included in the warning.

The dangerous E. coli strain is O157:H7. It can cause bloody diarrhea and cramps and can trigger a rare complication leading to kidney failure.

The bacteria can be found in the manure of cattle and some other grazing animals, which can harmlessly carry the strain in their intestines. It can be passed to humans when they ingest the bacteria in contaminated produce.

Over the weekend, federal and state investigators continued to pore over records at Natural Selection headquarters in San Juan Bautista, Calif., hoping to trace the outbreak to its source.

Across the Salinas Valley, the heart of spinach country, farmers are increasingly anxious. California produces nearly three-quarters of the nation's spinach.

DOJ_NMG_0065310

Dale Huss, vice president of production at Ocean Mist, which does not grow for Natural Selection, was among the few spinach growers willing to speak openly about his plight.

At an Ocean Mist field in Castroville on Sunday, Huss pulled up a fistful of spinach leaves and took a bite.

"Nothing wrong with it," he said, chewing slowly. "Gorgeous, really. It's good."

Huss expects that in the next few days, he will dig up this 20-acre expanse, an $80,000 investment.

"We can't wait. We'll essentially have to put a disk in this," Huss said, referring to a machine that will chop the spinach and turn it back into the soil. "We can't hold on."

Huss may wait a few days, hoping against hope that the scare will pass, but time is against him. Within a week, the spinach will get long and dog-eared, and then start to yellow.

"We're running up against Mother Nature," Huss said.

He doubts he could sell his crop for freezing, since that market probably is inundated, he said.

Huss recalled how the phone began ringing before 6 a.m. Friday as clients began canceling spinach orders less than 24 hours after the initial warning. By 9 a.m., he sent about 100 workers home.

"No sense in putting spinach in a box if no one's going to buy."

At the consumer end of the food chain, spinach was hard to find.

"We just pulled all our spinach because customers aren't going to buy it now anyway," said Cathy Dominguez, a seller at the Sunday farmers market in Hollywood. "Everybody's pretty scared and nervous. So it's easier for us just not to bring it."

On Saturday, she lost about $420 in sales at the Pasadena farmers market.

Her customers Sunday included Fred Eric, the chef/owner of Tiara Cafe in Los Angeles. He's been fielding e-mails from customers who want to know two things: "Where are you getting your spinach from? And what are you going to do?"

For one thing, he's replaced the spinach in his $3.50-quiche slices with arugula. And spinach has been thrown out of the Ty Cobb Freshwich, a sub-like concoction in a rice noodle roll.

Half a block away, Allyson McBayne was doing brisk business because of her spin on spinach: It's hydroponic — grown in water behind a home in Reseda, which was enough to reassure customers. Only one shopper, she said, made a point of shunning her spinach.

Despite the warnings, Arturo Reyes of McGrath Farms set out his normal complement of spinach, though he judged business a little slow.

Brett Gathrid and Jennifer Yandell of Hancock Park approached the spinach with confusion. Yandell, a recent arrival from Nashville, paused then reached for the greens before Gathrid stopped her.

"Our confusion is that they haven't said exactly what and where the problem is," Gathrid explained.

"I was going to buy it," complained Yandell. "I wouldn't let her buy it," Gathrid said.

Angela Gygi of Beachwood Canyon had no such qualms: "I'm not terribly concerned because I buy my produce from farmers, and I think they take good care of it."

And chef Sandy Gendel, on a $2,000 shopping spree for Pace, in Laurel Canyon, took a reporter's query as a reminder to buy the otherwise shunned produce. "I almost forgot. Arturo, where's your spinach?"

Although the FDA has not placed restrictions on selling spinach, it was nowhere to be found at a Vons near Los Feliz.

The tag marking it as a sale item was still in place below an empty shelf. Like other markets, Vons was refunding money for all spinach, no questions asked.

Trader Joe's in Silver Lake also was a spinach-free zone. One manager ruefully noted the benefits of all the vitamins in spinach: "That's why I only buy spinach."

Across the street, at Gelson's Market, assistant manager Manny Vong had accepted three packages of returned spinach on his shift.

Some customers have been returning half-finished bags.

Santi Reng, of the produce department, said one of his customers had just finished eating a raw spinach concoction with dinner guests when they saw the alert on television.

The customer is saving the empty bag as evidence, just in case. deborah, schoch@latimes.com

Search For E. Coli Source Broadens (WP)

By Annys Shin And Michael Rosenwald

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

State health officials in Ohio are investigating whether a second death is the result of a deadly outbreak of E. coli linked to fresh spinach, as federal regulators expanded their search for the source of the contamination.

The Food and Drug Administration and California state officials yesterday dispatched additional inspectors to farms in the state to examine irrigation, soil, and machinery, said David W. Acheson, the head of the FDA Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition.

The contaminated spinach was initially connected to Natural Selection Foods LLC, a producer in San Juan Bautista, Calif., that sells spinach and salads containing spinach under many brands, including Dole and Earthbound Farm. But the FDA is not limiting its probe to Natural Selection.

So far, 114 people in 21 states have become ill, including 18 who have experienced kidney failure. The first death was reported in Wisconsin, which has had 32 Escherichia coli cases, the highest number reported of any state. Seventy-five percent of the victims are women, Acheson said.

Virginia has one confirmed case, but state health department officials declined to provide further details, citing privacy concerns.

Of the 114 cases, FDA officials have detailed information about what 73 of the victims ate -- 66 ate spinach, including about 40 who ate bagged spinach, Acheson said.

"We don't know everything comes from Natural Selections. All the information we have says the implicated brands were grown in California. That could change," Acheson said. "We are still not ruling out the possibility that other spinach from other states may be implicated."

Natural Selection Foods said yesterday in a statement on its Web site that "based on its work" with California and FDA officials, its organic spinach has not been confirmed as the source of the E. coli outbreak.

But FDA officials refused to clear organic spinach and stressed that consumers should avoid all fresh spinach, organic and conventional, bagged and loose.

"We recognize a need to get our arms around this . . . and begin to focus on which spinach was not involved in this outbreak," Acheson said.

The FDA can recommend a recall of produce but cannot mandate one. While the Agriculture Department inspects meat processing facilities daily, the FDA does not inspect and test produce as frequently before it reaches grocery stores.

"Getting on a farm and testing things ahead of time is not a good use of resources," Acheson said.

Last November, the FDA sent a letter to the lettuce-growing industry urging it to improve produce safety. The letter came a month after Dole recalled several types of bagged salad mix as a result of an E. coli outbreak that sickened 11 people in Minnesota.

In April, lettuce growers drafted a set of best practices for farmers to prevent E. coli contamination. Last month, as part of "The Lettuce Safety Initiative" that was later expanded to include spinach, the FDA and California officials began inspecting farms for compliance with the best practices.

"The FDA is not saying this is the result of a few bad actors but truly an issue of 'we don't understand where this is coming from and we want to work collaboratively together,' " said Tim Chelling, a spokesman for United Fresh Produce Association, a trade group representing growers, shippers, retailers and processors.

Consumer advocates contend that self-regulation is not enough to protect consumers from contaminated produce.

DOJ_NMG_0065312

"No agency has authority on the farm until an outbreak occurs," said Caroline Smith DeWaal, food safety director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest. "The FDA is responsible for everything other than meat and poultry . . . the FDA doesn't have the tools in place."

Enforcing a food recall relies on the efforts of grocery stores, restaurants and other food retailers, and it can be a significant expense for them. Ted Keany, a vice president of Keany Produce Co. of Landover, said he may be stuck with spinach and salad losses of up to $90,000 a week.

"We are legally bound to pay for it, even though we can't sell it," Keany said. "No one wants it."

In a survey of grocery stores in the Rockville-Bethesda area, a Washington Post reporter found two brands of Giant packaged salads containing baby spinach at the grocer's store on Old Georgetown Road. A manager of the store was alerted and, along with a produce staffer, immediately removed about a dozen bagged salads.

Giant spokesman Jamie Miller said "it should have been located" by the store's staff, but said scanners at the cash register would have rejected the purchase.

Safeway pulled O brand organic bagged spinach from its shelves and was holding it, spokesman Greg TenEyck said. Food Lion is destroying its stock of spinach, said food safety director James Ball. So is Whole Foods Market, said mid-Atlantic spokeswoman Sarah Kenney.

At organic Restaurant Nora, owner Nora Pouillon originally did not pull menu items with spinach. She orders most of her spinach from a co-op of 30 organic farmers in Pennsylvania and said there was no chance it came from California.

After numerous questions from customers, however, she decided to take spinach items off of the menu.

Killer Bacteria Hunted In Fields Of California (USAT)

By Dan Vergano And Judy Keen

USA Today, September 19, 2006

Elizabeth Rhodes, a 22-year-old senior at Morehead State University in Kentucky, loves spinach. “I put it in everything,” she says.

When she became violently ill in the early morning of Aug. 31, she didn't suspect the spinach she'd had a couple of nights earlier. “I noticed that the spinach tasted different, but I thought it was just the dressing,” she says.

A friend insisted on taking her to the emergency room. “But it was more scary once the nurses were like, ‘This is the worst we've seen; she's really bad off,' ” Rhodes says. “And this was after they had given me morphine and I was still in such pain.”

Rhodes was one of 114 people in 21 states who have been sickened since Aug. 23 in a deadly outbreak of E. coli that claimed the life of a Wisconsin woman. Federal officials are inspecting farms in California's Salinas Valley, nicknamed “America's Salad Bowl,” in an urgent search to find the source of a deadly bacteria.

The cases include 18 cases of hemolytic uremic syndrome, which causes kidney failure, and 60 hospitalizations, the FDA announced Monday night.

There's no evidence that bags of spinach believed to have carried the deadly E. coli 0157:H7 bacteria were tampered with, says Susan Bro of the Food and Drug Administration. The FDA is advising people not to eat fresh spinach “until further notice.”

The single confirmed fatality was Marion Graff, 77, of Manitowoc, Wis., who died of kidney failure Sept. 7 at a hospital in Green Bay. The FDA's David Acheson said cases may continue to appear for three weeks, because E. coli can take a week to infect patients and two weeks more to confirm.

The Wisconsin Department of Health and Family Services says the state has 33 confirmed cases now, more than any other state. Twenty-six of the Wisconsin victims are women. Federal officials have said 75% of the victims nationwide are women, who surveys show eat more bagged produce than men.

Officials in Ohio are investigating whether the death of a 23-month-old girl is tied to the outbreak, says Jen Fannin, spokeswoman for the Cambridge-Guernsey County Health Department. Four children from the same family tested positive for E. coli, but the exact cause of the youngest child's death Aug. 22 and a link to spinach have not been established, Fannin says.

DOJ_NMG_0065313

Investigators explored Salinas Valley spinach farms Monday, sampling irrigation water and soils, as well as examining harvesting and processing equipment. It will take at least a week for the findings to come back, Acheson says.

But investigations of earlier E. coli outbreaks involving Salinas-grown produce have proven inconclusive.

Suspicion has centered on packaged spinach sold by Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, Calif. The company has recalled all of its spinach packaged in bags, either alone or blended with other salad greens, with "best if used by" dates from Aug. 17 to Oct. 1.

A second company, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., which investigators found had bought mixed greens from Natural Selection, issued a recall of three packaged salad mixes, Acheson says. The "spring mix" brands containing spinach are: Farmers Market, Hy-Vee and Fresh and Easy.

Barry Eisenberg of River Ranch says none of those brands has been linked to the outbreak, "but we would rather play things safe."

In California, which has one confirmed case of E. coli, state health department investigators are "looking at all possible points from the field to the plate" where contamination could have occurred, says Patti Roberts, spokeswoman for the California Department of Health Services.

Today, investigators fan out into fields. Their tasks include evaluating day-to-day practices, looking for obvious sources of potential contamination sources, reviewing the farm's history of flooding and noting whether livestock are kept close to the spinach field.

"It's a complex investigation," Roberts says. "There's no smoking gun because there isn't a bag of spinach we're able to test. This product's shelf life is too short. It's like investigating a car crash two weeks later when both cars are gone."

Because E. coli illnesses are not uncommon, public health officials don't sound alarms until there are more cases than they expect to see. Those bells began to sound on Sept. 8 when Wisconsin officials alerted the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) that it had a cluster.

A few days earlier, Wisconsin officials had learned of a cluster of five E. coli cases, but they were not overly concerned because four of the infected had attended the Manitowoc County Fair and had all visited livestock barns. (Ultimately, only one case from that cluster turned out to be spinach-based.)

But when reports started coming in from other counties, says Jason Helgerson, spokesman for the Wisconsin Department of Health and Family Services, "staff mobilized to take a very close look at a potentially very significant event."

At the CDC headquarters in Atlanta, officials turned to the PulseNet database. Created after an 1993 E. coli outbreak in undercooked hamburger meat sickened hundreds and killed four people in Western states, the database allows federal and state public health officials to quickly compare the genetic fingerprint of E. coli. If the bug's DNA is the same in different patients, they know they have a link.

When the bug is the same, officials look for similarities in food consumption to pinpoint the culinary culprit. As Wisconsin officials searched the memories of their victims about what they had eaten in the past week, they were developing a hunch about spinach.

By Sept. 13, an Oregon health official who did not yet know about the Wisconsin cases called the CDC to report five illnesses caused by E. coli with the same DNA fingerprint. The next day, state epidemiologists shared information on a conference call with the CDC and FDA, and spinach became more than just a hunch. Before 7 a.m. the following day, Sept. 14, the FDA issued its warning to consumers.

The earliest case appears to have cropped up Aug. 2 and the most recent one on Sept. 9, Acheson said Monday.

Coincidentally, experts from the FDA and California agriculture and health officials met in Salinas on Aug. 24 with the Western Growers Association and the California Lettuce Research Board to discuss ways to reverse a rising trend in potentially deadly E. coli outbreaks.

Jerry Gillespie, director of Western Institute for Food Safety and Security at the University of California, Davis, says the institute is offering $300,000 for research into preventing outbreaks in vegetables.

DOJ_NMG_0065314

Contamination of Salinas-grown spinach and lettuce was blamed for three E. coli outbreaks between July 2002 and October 2003, but investigators never found the bacteria's source. Those outbreaks killed an elderly woman and sickened 114 others.

The Salinas Californian obtained health department reports through the state's public records act and reported that investigators inspected harvesting methods and processing and packaging plants but couldn't determine whether the produce was contaminated before or after it was shipped.

Even so, the state recommended that growers clean and sanitize harvesting tools, make sure water used in fields is suitable and test compost that contains manure. Growers told the Californian that they were following those steps.

An investigation of an E. coli outbreak in October 2005 after 11 people became ill in Minnesota was traced to bagged salad products from the Salinas Valley, but it was also inconclusive.

Although the FDA linked those illnesses to the salad, tests of a partial bag recovered from a store customer came up negative. Typically lettuce and spinach go through three washes during processing, including two that have chlorine designed to kill bacteria.

Food-borne illnesses kill about 5,000 people nationwide every year and sicken an estimated 76 million, the CDC says. During her hospitalization, Rhodes says, she was so sick that "at points I was ready to just be gone." She's back in classes now but still experiences cramping. Doctors have told her it will be a month before she's back to full strength.

Experts say the very young, the elderly and people with weakened immune systems are most at risk. "The numbers for food-borne illnesses in this country are way too high," says food safety expert Douglas Powell of Kansas State University in Manhattan, Kan.

Most often, a series of errors lead to contamination, Powell says. First, a field is contaminated through manure used as fertilizer or through dirty irrigation water. Then a processor uses weakly chlorinated or non-chlorinated wash water to clean the produce. And last, the processor doesn't control temperatures in the packing facility, creating a hothouse for bacteria.

Michael Doyle, director of food safety at the University of Georgia and an authority on E. coli 0157:H7, says outbreaks are increasing in number in part because of the way big farms handle produce —for example, some are bagging and cutting the spinach right in the field — which increases the chance for contamination.

State officials have mobilized. But some cases may pass under the states' radar. In Pennsylvania, where there are four confirmed cases, the Department of Health's Richard McGarvey notes that if infected people "don't get a test done or don't go to a doctor or hospital, we don't find out about them. Those people wouldn't even know themselves."

Lawsuits are already being filed.

Drew Falkenstein of Marler Clark LLP in Seattle is representing 15 to 20 victims of the outbreak. The suits, against Dole and Natural Selection Foods, include filings by Anna and Paul Zientek of Milwaukee, whose two children were hospitalized after eating spinach; and Gwyn Wellborn, a Salem, Ore., woman who became sick after eating Dole brand baby spinach. She was hospitalized and received multiple transfusions, the suit says.

Net Loss Inside The Failure Of $8 Billion Effort To Save Prized Fish (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

For more than a quarter of a century, a federal agency in the Pacific Northwest has been running the world's most expensive wildlife restoration program, designed to save 13 species of endangered salmon and steelhead.

The Bonneville Power Administration, responding to concern about dwindling fish populations, has spent more than $8 billion helping salmon travel from the mountain streams of their birth to the Pacific Ocean and back again, where they lay eggs for the next generation. Impeding their journey are several hydroelectric dams.

The agency has little to show for its efforts. In any given year, only 1% to 3.5% of the fish complete the 1,800-mile round-trip fish trek, which begins 20 miles northeast of Lewiston, Idaho, and continues down the Snake and Columbia rivers. Fish scientists say the success rate should be at least double that.

DOJ_NMG_0065315

With the help of elaborate handling and tracking equipment, Bonneville is beginning to figure out what has gone wrong. Previously overlooked dangers abound. Some of the perils, including federally protected birds and sea lions -- as well as Canadian fishermen -- are beyond the agency's control.

Others, it turns out, include Bonneville's own efforts. In one well-intended move, the agency transports some salmon around the dams on special barges. After being deposited clear of the whirring turbines, the disoriented fish are easy pickings for predators.

The outlook remains gloomy next year, says Michael Ford, who directs the conservation biology division at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's fishery science center in Seattle. Because of shifting currents, he says, the ocean is expected to be warmer, which is worse for the fish; warm waters carry less food. "We can't be confident that these populations are viable in the long term," he says.

The population of salmon and other fish has been declining here for more than a hundred years, caused initially by overfishing in the early 20th century. Critics say the dams accelerated the trend. The annual catch of salmon and steelhead in the Columbia River has dropped to less than five million today from a high of 50 million pounds in 1911. Meanwhile, this year's count of salmon running through the dams is below the 10-year average.

Congress established the Bonneville Power Administration in 1937 as a self-financing agency to provide power to the region. It supplies about 40% of the electricity in the Pacific Northwest through 31 hydroelectric dams, including eight on the Columbia and Snake rivers built from the 1930s through 1970.

In 1980, federal lawmakers, worried about the decline of the salmon, ordered Bonneville to "protect, mitigate, and enhance fish and wildlife" affected by the dams. Bonneville spends so much to that end that it is affectionately called "Aunt Bonnie" by the small army of scientists and others working to save the salmon. The effort includes four states, four federal agencies, the Bush Administration, Canada, several federal judges and an assortment of Indian tribes.

Most of the salmon spawned in Idaho, Montana, eastern Washington and Oregon navigate Bonneville's dams twice during their lives. Their first journey takes them downstream to the Pacific, where they spend one to three years growing into adults. Then they return, leaping up steps built next to the dams known as fish ladders, a stream of water flowing over stairs that somewhat mimic the unencumbered rapids their ancestors knew. Once home, they lay and fertilize their eggs.

To further help the fish, Bonneville this year will spend almost $700 million. That includes the cost of spilling water over dams to create a cooler, more rapid-flowing stream, which is supposed to help salmon reach the sea. The water otherwise would be used to produce $356 million of electricity. Other fish-friendly improvements include special chutes for young fish and electronic transponders to track their journey.

"There are light years of difference between the way the fish were handled in the 1970s and the way they are now," says John W. Ferguson, a top fish biologist for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

The price tag -- which adds 30% to the electric bills of some Northwest consumers -- upsets lawmakers on both sides of the aisle. They are pushing legislation to require the power authority to list the cost separately on electric bills. In a recent survey, consumers said they thought the fish-saving effort added 5%, at most, to their tabs.

"Lately this has been used as a kind of unlimited fund," fumes Republican Sen. Larry Craig of Idaho. "If I had to go before Congress every year to get $700 million to provide for habitat and other improvements for salmon, I wouldn't get anywhere near that amount of money."

Stephen J. Wright, Bonneville's administrator, says the new accounting proposal "makes sense," but adds that he would prefer to show the cost as a percentage of Bonneville's $3 billion annual budget.

Bonneville defenders say Congress has complicated efforts to save the salmon. Under the Endangered Species Act, for example, Indian and commercial fishermen are allowed to catch and sell wild salmon scooped up accidentally during the harvesting of hatchery fish. Legal battles between various interest groups dating back decades haven't made matters easier.

First Major Obstacle

For many salmon, the first major obstacle on their swim to the Pacific starts at Lower Granite, a 3,200-foot dam jutting across the Snake River about 70 miles south of Spokane. Until the mid-1980s, the baby salmon, four to six inches long, had to survive a churning, pressurized plunge through whirling turbines. An early attempt to provide an alternative sent the fish zooming through fast-moving spillways where they bounced off the cement walls. As many as 10% of the fish were killed at each dam.

Today, fish that arrive at the top of this dam are sucked into a "juvenile bypass system," a series of pipes and chutes where the water moves more slowly to minimize bruising. Many are steered into a special fish-handling room, knocked out by a bath of mild anesthetic and injected with tiny transponders about the size of a grain of rice. Bonneville buys two million a year at $2 a piece, enabling scientists to track the salmon's journey.

After the transponders are inserted, some fish are gently returned to the river to navigate the other seven dams, which are equipped with similar bypasses. The majority are pumped into the tanks of one of eight specially designed barges that deposit them in the Columbia River estuary beyond the last dam. In the tranquil, 36-hour cruise, 98% of the salmon survive, according to Bonneville.

The barges were supposed to be a temporary fix to give the salmon population a chance to recuperate. New data from the transponders show that a quarter of the salmon are dying in the estuary. "That has been an eye-opener," Dr. Ferguson says.

Scientists are hotly debating the cause. Some blame an unusual concentration of predatory birds at the mouth of the river, including Caspian terns, which are protected as an endangered species, and double-crested cormorants, which come under another federal law protecting migratory birds. These birds hit the young salmon like feathery dive-bombers and may cause as many as 4% of the estuary deaths, NOAA says. Thousands of transponders are being recovered from piles of bird dung.

Ed Bowles, chief of fisheries for the state of Oregon, says Bonneville -- not the birds -- is to blame. He says many of the fish left to navigate the dams alone are too stressed and weakened to survive the rigors of the estuary. The barges, he says, just make things worse. "Collection and handling causes a lot of stress," he says. The barged fish become disoriented and aren't skilled at avoiding predators. Studies suggest they are dying at twice the rate of other fish, Mr. Bowles says.

To settle the controversy, NOAA persuaded Bonneville to buy "acoustic tags." The devices, which are inserted into the salmon as they leave the last dam, are larger than the transponders, which can be detected only when the fish swim through narrow tunnels in the dams. The bigger devices give off a distinctive ping that can be picked up by underwater microphones, enabling scientists, for the first time, to track the fish in the estuary via computers. So far, Bonneville has implanted 14,000 tags at a cost of $270 each.

When, at a year old, the salmon leave the estuary -- heading into the Pacific Ocean and then north into Canadian waters -- they face other threats. Canada changes the times and locations where fishing is allowed to protect endangered Canadian salmon species during their peak migration periods. That move pushes Canadian fishermen to catch more American salmon, say critics in Congress. According to some U.S. fishing groups, 40% of the Canadian commercial salmon catch consists of U.S. endangered species.

Terry Beacham, a research scientist for Fisheries and Oceans Canada, a government agency, admits it is "a possibility" that Canadian fishermen are catching more U.S. salmon, although that is "not the intent of the [fishery] managers." The government's goal, he says, is "to reduce the exploitation of fishing stocks that are of concern in Canada."

Salmon remain as long as three years in the ocean, where they mature and take on weight. Some are caught by Japanese and Russian fishing trawlers. Ocean conditions are the single biggest factor that determines whether the fish return to spawn or die at sea, according to NOAA. Food-filled cold currents are good for the fish, warm currents bad.

Salmon that make it through Canadian waters and start their trip homeward have to run a gauntlet of new perils. On the return journey, the dams are a less of a concern, since all are equipped with fish ladders. Instead a population of voracious male sea lions waits to ambush the salmon below the first dam. The sea lions tear off and eat the egg sacs of returning females. The fattening fish oil in the eggs makes them more attractive to female sea lions during summer mating season.

Commercial fishermen used to shoot the sea lions but that is now banned by the 1972 Marine Mammal Protection Act. As their population increases, some sea lions have learned to climb the fish ladder of the first dam. Crews hired by Bonneville have tried rubber bullets, rubber-tipped arrows, fireworks and special cages. The sea lions, which destroyed 3.4% of the returning spring Chinook last year, have ignored the fireworks and are learning to get through the special cages.

Above the Bonneville Dam -- 140 miles into the salmon's return journey -- the human threat looms large. There, Indian tribes and other fishermen are permitted to fish for salmon under not only the Endangered Species Act but also under various treaties and state laws. Indians have had the right to fish for salmon for more than a century in return for turning over their land to the federal government.

Legal Loophole

The result of this legal loophole: The tastiest of the salmon species, the spring Chinook, is served up at Seattle restaurants that pay as much as $26 a pound. Having an endangered-species law that allows people to catch and eat salmon, an endangered species, "seems curiously out of synch," James L. Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, said in a speech this year.

Indian salmon hatcheries and fish-preservation programs are financed, in part, by salmon sales. "We must have salmon to save salmon," Billy Frank, the spokesman for 20 fishing tribes, explained to a congressional panel last year.

State laws, meanwhile, allow fishermen to take as much as 50% of the returning fish in any given season. That right is defended fiercely by powerful groups, including the Northwest Sportfishing Industry Association, which says it represents business interests such as boat and tackle makers with total annual sales of $3.5 billion. The group would like to see four of the eight Bonneville dams torn down to restore the wild river. It helped persuade a federal judge to order Bonneville to spill more water over the dams to increase water flow.

Northwest River Partners, a group that represents local utilities, farm groups and others that use the river for transportation, would rather not spend any more money to help the salmon. They also maintain that water spills don't help.

Over the years, head-butting between sportsmen and local businesses has stymied government policy by making a comprehensive solution harder to achieve. There are currently 22 separate cases asking judges to intervene in various parts of the salmon problem. One dates to 1969.

At Lower Granite, the salmon face one last man-made diversion before getting to their spawning grounds. A computerized piping system shunts some into a room where they are anesthetized in a bath of sweet-smelling clove oil. There, biologists examine them for marks that tell more about their adventures.

Some have "golden arches," crescent-shaped scars on their bellies left by seal teeth. Others have red lines around their gills, showing where they wriggled out of nets that would otherwise have suffocated them.

"If they weren't as flexible as they are, these species would have been gone a long time ago," says Dr. Ferguson, the NOAA biologist.

Talks Continue, But No Breakthrough On Drilling Bill (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, September 19, 2006

Business groups last week voiced support for a Senate bill that would open fewer areas offshore to oil and gas drilling than its House companion, in hopes of breaking a legislative impasse before lawmakers return to the campaign trail.

Groups such as the American Chemistry Council, American Gas Association and National Association of Manufacturers, which collectively have formed the Consumer Alliance for Energy Security, favor the House bill because it allows drilling along the East and West Coasts.

The business groups say the federal moratorium on drilling over most of the Outer Continental Shelf has helped to drive up fuel prices by restricting domestic production.

But in a letter sent last week the groups said the Senate measure, which continues to limit offshore drilling to the Gulf, is good enough for now.

“We have come too far to go away empty handed,” the letter states.

“We think it is important to get something done this session,” said Jack Gerard, president and CEO of the American Chemistry Council. That group has argued high natural gas prices have forced its members to outsource thousands of jobs to areas with lower natural gas costs.

“The House has done yeoman’s work, but both bills produce gas,” Gerard said.

DOJ_NMG_0065318

The basic difference is that the House would allow oil companies to drill 100 miles off the coast. States could also allow drilling closer to the shore. States would get a share of royalties paid on both new and existing oil leases, under the House bill.

During his trip to Capitol Hill last week, President Bush urged members to pass an OCS bill, congressional sources said.

The Senate measure, meanwhile, expands drilling in the Gulf, principally in an area known as Lease 181.

It would also allow Gulf states to share royalty revenue, but only on new leases. It also creates a 125-mile buffer along Florida's coasts where drilling would not be allowed and extends the moratorium there until 2022.

Senate leaders have said that their bill is the only pro-production measure that could pass that body. But while business leaders are ready to accept the less ambitious Senate measure, House negotiators apparently continue to hold out for expansion beyond Gulf waters.

"We are not going to support a weak bill to score some political points," said Chris Tucker, a spokesman for Rep. John Peterson, the Pennsylvania Republican who has taken a lead in pushing for drilling expansion.

Conferees have yet to be named but congressional sources said discussions have continued behind the scenes.

Gulf Coast senators met last week to discuss strategy. Later, Sen. Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican, met with House Resources Chairman Richard Pombo (R-Calif.) to discuss the measure.

One House aide said a compromise that has been discussed would limit the states that can opt-out of the federal moratorium to Georgia and Virginia, which are thought to possess significant gas reserves offshore.

A Senate aide, however, said lawmakers from border states that could be affected by an oil spill have objected to that compromise.

The Senate bill is already a "carefully crafted compromise," said the source.

Another House strategy, according to the Senate source, is to accept the Senate version and then try to open drilling along the East and West Coasts on another "must pass" measure,

But a House aide said that proposal has also been rejected.

Gore Calls For Action On Global Warming (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, September 19, 2006

Former Vice President Al Gore on Monday called for immediate action to stop global warming, calling the phenomenon a "climate crisis" that demands attention from American leaders.

Gore, a Democrat who narrowly lost the 2000 presidential race to George W. Bush, decried the lack of action on global warming by politicians across the ideological spectrum.

"When we make big mistakes in America, it is usually because the people have not been given an honest accounting of the choices before us," Gore said in an hour-long speech at New York University Law School. "It also is often because too many members of both parties who knew better did not have the courage to do better."

But he implicitly criticized the Bush administration, which has been accused of editing official scientific studies to downplay the impact of global warming and asking scientists at federal agencies to refrain from speaking out on the phenomenon.

Future generations, Gore said, "deserve better than the spectacle of censorship of the best scientific evidence about the truth of our situation and harassment of honest scientists who are trying to warn us about the looming catastrophe."

"Each passing day brings yet more evidence that we are now facing a planetary emergency, a climate crisis that demands immediate attention," Gore said.

While the administration has acknowledged the effects of global warming on the environment, President Bush has rejected mandatory controls on carbon dioxide, the chief gas blamed for the phenomenon. He also has kept the country out of the Kyoto treaty, which called for mandatory reductions of greenhouse gases among the signing nations. He has said the pact would harm the U.S. economy.

Gore has brought considerable attention to the global warming phenomenon since last spring, when his documentary film, "An Inconvenient Truth," was released to wide critical praise. The movie has become one of the highest-grossing documentaries, while a companion book on the topic has become a best-seller.

The resulting wave of publicity has raised questions about whether Gore intends to run for president again in 2008. While he has said he doesn't intend to be a candidate, he hasn't ruled out a run.

In his speech, Gore framed the pursuit of renewable energy as an economic and national security issue for the United States, besides being an environmental imperative. But he also said the challenge of global climate change offered opportunities for innovation and investment.

"We can change this by inventing and manufacturing new solutions to stop global warming right here in America," he said, adding that venture capitalists are eager to put money behind effective technologies to cut greenhouse gases.

Gore Calls For Immediate Freeze On Heat-Trapping Gas Emissions (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

Former Vice President Al Gore called yesterday for a popular movement in the United States to seek an "immediate freeze" in heat-trapping smokestack and tailpipe gases linked by most scientists to global warming.

Speaking at the New York University law school, Mr. Gore said that rising temperatures posed an enormous threat and that only a movement akin to the nuclear freeze campaign for arms control a generation ago, which he said he opposed at the time, would push elected officials out of longstanding deadlock on the issue.

"Merely engaging in high-minded debates about theoretical future reductions while continuing to steadily increase emissions represents a self-delusional and reckless approach," Mr. Gore said. "In some ways, that approach is worse than doing nothing at all, because it lulls the gullible into thinking that something is actually being done, when in fact it is not."

President Bush has opposed requiring cuts in heat-trapping gases like carbon dioxide, saying a better payoff will come from a long-term effort to find or improve technologies that provide energy without emissions. The White House last night defended that approach.

"This administration is not just talking about climate change," said Kristen A. Hellmer, a White House spokeswoman. "There are more than 60 programs in place aimed at reducing greenhouse gas emissions that do not hurt the economy or move jobs overseas."

Senator James M. Inhofe, Republican of Oklahoma and chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, said the Gore proposals would create "economic calamity."

Several representatives of industry groups said yesterday that the White House had been consulting with industry officials to consider a new energy initiative.

In his speech, Mr. Gore also renewed a longstanding proposal to replace all payroll taxes with taxes on pollution, including carbon dioxide. And he said the United States should rejoin the Kyoto Protocol, the climate treaty, rejected by President Bush that requires industrialized countries to cut emissions.

Mr. Gore has ridden a wave of attention since spring over "An Inconvenient Truth," the popular film and best-selling book built around an illustrated talk on what he calls a "planetary emergency."

His speech in Manhattan came ahead of a burst of planned discourse on global warming this week, including five Congressional hearings and three days of workshops at the Clinton Global Initiative, which are intended to solve the biggest problems hampering international development.

Philip E. Clapp, the president of the National Environmental Trust, a Washington group pressing for limits on heat-trapping gases, said he welcomed Mr. Gore's speech.

"There is no excuse anymore to continue to increase our emissions," Mr. Clapp said.

Gore Unveils Global-Warming Plan (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

NEW YORK, Sept. 18 -- Former vice president Al Gore laid out his prescription for an ailing and overheated planet Monday, urging a series of steps from freezing carbon dioxide emissions to revamping the auto industry, factories and farms.

DOJ_NMG_0065320

Gore proposed a Carbon Neutral Mortgage Association ("Connie Mae," to echo the familiar Fannie Mae) devoted to helping homeowners retrofit and build energy-efficient homes. He urged creation of an "electranet," which would let homeowners and business owners buy and sell surplus electricity.

"This is not a political issue. This is a moral issue -- it affects the survival of human civilization," Gore said in an hour-long speech at the New York University School of Law. "Put simply, it is wrong to destroy the habitability of our planet and ruin the prospects of every generation that follows ours."

Gore was one of the first U.S. politicians to raise an alarm about the dangers of global warming. He produced a critically well-received documentary movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," that chronicles his warnings that Earth is hurtling toward a vastly warmer future. Gore's speech was in part an effort to move beyond jeremiads and put the emphasis on remedies.

He took a veiled shot at the Bush administration: "The debate over solutions has been slow to begin in earnest . . . because some of our leaders still find it more convenient to deny the reality of the crisis." But he saluted a Republican, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, for helping to push through sharp reductions in carbon emissions.

Gore noted that few politicians of any party are willing to step into the "no politician zone" of tough steps needed to address global warming.

Gore cautioned against looking for a "silver bullet" policy reform that would address global warming, a view many scientists share.

"There are things that you can do today and in the midterm, and things to tend to in the long term," said Gavin A. Schmidt, a climate scientist at the NASA Goddard Institute for Space Studies. "You have to think on all the scales at once, and even that will only help you avoid the worst scenarios."

A spokeswoman for the President's Council on Environmental Quality said Monday that the Bush administration has committed $29 billion to climate research and programs and has reduced greenhouse gas intensity. That is not, however, the same matter as reducing total carbon emissions, which continue to rise.

Gore touched on nuclear power as a palliative for global warming but made it clear that this is at best a partial solution. Nuclear power inevitably raises questions of nuclear arms proliferation, he said.

And he warned against thinking that the recent drop in oil prices offers much help: "Our current ridiculous dependence on oil endangers not only our national security, but also our economic security."

Arellano Felix Brother Pleads Not Guilty To Cocaine Charges (AP)

By Allison Hoffman

AP, September 19, 2006

SAN DIEGO - An accused leader of the Arellano Felix drug cartel pleaded not guilty to cocaine charges Monday, a month after the U.S. Coast Guard arrested his younger brother in international waters off the Mexican coast.

Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix, one of seven brothers allegedly behind the Tijuana-based gang, is accused of selling about a half-pound of cocaine to an undercover police officer in a San Diego motel in 1980.

Arellano Felix, a trim, balding man, said nothing during a brief hearing in San Diego federal court. A federal defender entered not guilty pleas on his behalf to one count of distributing cocaine and one count of conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

Each of the two counts carries a maximum sentence of 15 years in prison, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Duffy.

The government would consider dropping charges against Arellano Felix if he cooperates with authorities in other cases linked to the cartel, Duffy told reporters.

Arellano Felix, 56, arrived in San Diego on Saturday night aboard a commercial flight, escorted by two federal marshals, making him the first key Mexican cartel figure extradited to the United States.

The U.S. ambassador to Mexico, Tony Garza, and other U.S. officials hailed the development.

Arellano Felix fled San Diego before facing trial on the cocaine charges. He was arrested in December 1993 in Tijuana and served a 10-year prison sentence in Mexico for violating that country's tough weapons laws.

DOJ_NMG_0065321

U.S. authorities requested his extradition in 2003, and a Mexican judge approved it in 2004. He was remanded to U.S. custody in Brownsville, Texas, on Saturday.

The extradition comes one month after Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, 36, was captured by the Coast Guard aboard a sport-fishing yacht in international waters off La Paz, Mexico, and taken to San Diego to face drug charges.

The younger Arellano Felix has pleaded not guilty to drug trafficking, money laundering and conspiracy charges.

Four other men captured with him, including a suspected senior figure in the cartel, are being held in a federal jail in San Diego as material witnesses. A fifth man taken into custody aboard the boat was charged Friday with making false statement to federal authorities.

U.S. authorities have requested the extradition of Benjamin Arellano Felix, reputedly the planning chief of the gang, who was arrested in 2002 in Puebla, east of Mexico City. He is being held in a Mexican jail.

Another brother, Ramon Arellano Felix, was shot to death that same year in the Pacific tourist port of Mazatlan. Authorities say he had been the group's feared enforcer, in charge of killing to settle scores.

Eldest Arellano Felix Brother Arraigned In S.D. (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 18, 2006

SAN DIEGO – The oldest brother of the man authorities say is the leader of one of the largest drug cartels in Mexico pleaded not guilty in San Diego federal court Monday to drug charges two days after being turned over to U.S. officials.

Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix is charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine and cocaine distribution under a 1980 grand jury indictment issued here. He faces up to 30 years in prison. U.S. Magistrate Judge Anthony Battaglia scheduled a bail hearing for Thursday. Arellano is currently being held in a location that prosecutors would not reveal.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Duffy told the judge that Arellano poses a flight risk and that bail should be denied.

Arellano was represented by a federal public defender, who did not comment during the brief court hearing.

Duffy said after the hearing that under the terms of an extradition agreement between Mexico and the United States, Arellano cannot face any additional charges.

Arellano, 56, was extradited by the Mexican government to the United States and arrived in San Diego on Sept. 16 after being handed over to authorities in Brownsville, Texas.

He was arrested in 1980 on suspicion of trying to sell nine ounces of cocaine to an undercover officer at a motel on Midway Drive in San Diego but he fled the country after posting bail.

He was charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine and distribution of cocaine as well as jumping bail.

Arellano fled to Mexico, where he ran a nightclub in the resort town of Mazatlan until he was arrested in 1993 in a police raid in Tijuana. He was sentenced to 10 years in prison on weapons and bribery charges. The U.S. has been trying to extradite him for two years and asked that he be sent here after he finished his term at a maximum-security prison outside Mexico City.

Although the order was approved by a Mexican federal judge in 2004, it took two years for Mexico's Foreign Ministry to sign off on it.

U.S. authorities were informed just last week that Arellano was being sent back to the U.S. While Drug Enforcement Administration officials acknowledge that Arellano did not play a key role in running the Arellano Felix drug cartel they said he is still a “player” and that his extradition is a major victory in the ongoing negotiations between the U.S. and Mexico on the extradition of drug traffickers.

Rafael Arellano is the oldest of four brothers suspected in having roles within the cartel.

Benjamin Arellano Felix, the suspected leader of the organization, has been in prison in Mexico since 2002, fighting drug charges.

Francisco Javier Arellano Felix was arrested in August while on a fishing boat off the Mexican coast and is being held in federal prison in San Diego. He has already pleaded not guilty to racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering charges.

Ramon Arellano Felix was killed in a shootout with Mexican police in 2002.

The fourth brother, Eduardo Arellano Felix, is considered to be one of the top leaders of the organization. His whereabouts are unknown. The DEA has offered a $5 million reward for information leading to his arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0065322

The DEA says the Arellano Felix cartel has been smuggling tons of cocaine and other drugs into the U.S. for decades and is responsible for bribing public officials as well as murdering people on both sides of the border.

Possible U.S.-Mexico Drug Tunnel DiscoveredTunnel Connects Calexico To Mexicali (AP)

AP, September 18, 2006

EL CENTRO, Calif. -- A man accused of receiving more than a half-ton of marijuana smuggled into the United States from Mexico in a secret cross-border tunnel pleaded not guilty Monday to drug charges.

A criminal complaint in El Centro federal court charges that Jesus Bernardo Aguila Agundez loaded drugs into his truck at a house in Calexico, about 120 miles east of San Diego.

The tunnel allegedly runs 400 feet from a the Calexico house to another house across the border in Mexicali, Mexico. It is about 20 feet underground and is equipped with lighting and supported by wooden beams, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Aguila was charged with one count of possessing marijuana with intent to distribute. He was arrested Friday after DEA agents followed his truck from the Calexico house to a nearby swap meet. According to the complaint, agents found 100 packages of marijuana weighing 1,143 pounds concealed under a tarp in the bed of Aguila's blue pickup truck.

The name of Aguila's attorney was not immediately known.

Authorities have discovered about 40 secret tunnels on the U.S.-Mexico border since Sept. 11, 2001, the vast majority in and around San Diego and Nogales, Ariz.

Cross-border Tunnel Found By Federal Authorities (AP)

AP, September 18, 2006

A 400-foot tunnel has been discovered along the U.S.-Mexico border that was likely used to funnel drugs between the two countries, authorities said Monday.

The secret passage connected a home in Calexico, Calif. to another house 400 feet away in Mexicali, Mexico, federal officials said. The tunnel was about 20 feet underground and was equipped with lighting and supported by wooden beams.

"Today's discovery is yet more evidence of the desperation that drug traffickers are feeling as law enforcement efforts continue to impede the flow of drugs into the U.S.," said John Fernandes, a special agent in charge with the Drug Enforcement Administration.

It wasn't immediately known whether anyone was arrested or who was responsible for the tunnel.

"This is clearly not the effort of one person," Fernandes said.

Authorities have discovered at least 39 secret tunnels on the U.S.-Mexico border since Sept. 11, 2001, the vast majority in and around San Diego and Nogales, Ariz., according to U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein's office.

Cross-border Drug Tunnel Found (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents in San Diego yesterday announced the discovery of a cross-border drug-smuggling tunnel beneath a private residence in Calexico, Calif., that extended nearly 400 feet to a house in Mexicali, Mexico.

The tunnel, which ran 20 feet underground and was accessible by a ladder, was equipped with lighting and supported by wooden beams every few feet, said John S. Fernandes, DEA special agent in charge.

"Today's discovery is yet more evidence of the desperation that drug traffickers are feeling as law enforcement efforts continue to impede the flow of drugs into the U.S.," Mr. Fernandes said.

The tunnel was the focus of an investigation by DEA agents, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents, the U.S. Border Patrol and the Calexico Police Department.

A Border Patrol special-response team entered the Calexico residence and also secured the tunnel.

DOJ_NMG_0065323

While the agency said it would continue to work as a team with DEA and ICE to "bring down anyone involved in using tunnels to smuggle terrorists and their weapons of mass destruction," there was no indication the tunnel had been used for anything but drugs.

"Whether they are designed to smuggle drugs, people, weapons or other contraband, these tunnels pose a threat to our nation's security," said Miguel Unzueta, special agent in charge for ICE investigations in San Diego.

DEA spokesman Garrison K. Courtney said it wasn't clear who was responsible for this tunnel, although the agency said it obviouslywas not the effort of one person.

"A tunnel is an enormous undertaking, and those responsible are now on notice. We have found the hole, and the DEA is now looking for you," Mr. Fernandes said.

At least 39 tunnels along the U.S.-Mexico border have been discovered by authorities since the September 11 attacks, the vast majority in and around San Diego and Nogales, Ariz.

A bipartisan group of U.S. senators has asked the Mexican government to enact legislation to criminalize the construction or financing of border tunnels between the United States and Mexico. Led by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, the lawmakers urged the Mexican officials to enact legislation to crack down on those involved.

In March, Mrs. Feinstein introduced a bill to prohibit the unauthorized construction or financing of, or permitting on one's land the construction or use of, a tunnel or subterranean passageway between the United States and another country. It has since been referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The senators said they were concerned tunnels could also be used to smuggle weapons and terrorists into the United States.

The January discovery of the largest and most sophisticated illegal cross-border underpass Mexican and U.S. authorities said they had ever found prompted the request to Mexican authorities.

Equipped with a pulley and ventilation system, the tunnel was 6 feet wide and 12 feet high. It had a cement floor and lights.

Arrest Made In Connection With Calexico Border Tunnel (KPBS)

KPBS, September 18, 2006

SAN DIEGO (2006-09-18) Drug Enforcement Agents have made an arrest in connection with a 400-foot long tunnel discovered under the U.S. Mexico border in Calexico. KPBS Reporter Amy Isackson has details.

The tunnel runs from a back bedroom in a Calexico house under the border and pops up in the bedroom of a house in Mexicali. The passageway is about 20 feet underground. It has cement floors and wood paneled walls. The tunnel is equipped with lighting and ventilation systems, and the ceiling is supported by wood beams.

Drug Enforcement Administration spokesman Dan Simmons says his agency has not yet linked the tunnel to a drug cartel.

But obviously, a tunnel is a tremendous undertaking. And the very nature of a tunnel speaks to the fact that there must be some sort of organization behind it.

The DEA has arrested Jesus Aguila Agundez in connection with the tunnel. A federal complaint says DEA agents believe Aguila loaded more than one thousand pounds of marijuana into his pickup truck at the Calexico house. Amy Isackson, KPBS News.

Officials Search For Clues After Discovery Of Drug Smuggling Tunnel (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, September 18, 2006

Drug enforcement and immigration officials are on the hunt tonight, searching for the people responsible for building an underground tunnel that stretched from a home in California to another home in Mexico. Investigators believe it may have been used to smuggle drugs into the U.S.

The tunnel was found when investigators entered the house located at 932 East Second street in Calexico last week.

Both agencies were tight-lipped about what they've found and why they targeted that home. They say the investigation is on-going and they can't reveal too much while suspects remain at large. A neighbor says he's noticed strange things at the house for months.

DOJ_NMG_0065324

Jose Adaverto Gonzalez has lived at his home on second street for 15 years and for the past six months, he says he's noticed strange behavior from the people living across the street. Last Friday, Gonzalez noticed border agents at his neighbor's house setting up crime-scene tape.

But it wasn't until he went to Mexicali for the weekend that he got an idea of what was going on. While there, Gonzalez saw another house with the same crime-scene tape.

He put two and two together and ealized the homes were connected.

A 400 foot-long tunnel dug 20 feet underground connected the two homes on opposite sides of the border. And the tunnel had some work put into it--there were lights and wooden support beams.It is large enough to walk through hunched over.

The question is, how may people used it...and what for?

"We don't know what's coming through the tunnels exactly, because we haven't spoken to anyone who built the tunnels. So we don't know and that's always a safety issue."

The DEA did say that there were no drugs found and no arrests made. The house was mostly barren except for a few couches and a TV.

Though the tunnel's exact use is unknown, investigators are confident it was for illegal purposes.

Special Agent John Fernandes of the DEA says the tunnel was an enormous undertaking. And those responsible are now on notice. He says the DEA is looking for them.

Our View Tainted Drugs Led To Creative Approach In U.S. Attorney's Charges (NEWSJ)

The News Journal, September 19, 2006

The message that U.S. Attorney Colm Connolly sent on Thursday to dealers of deadly fentanyl-laced heroin was needed.

They face mandatory federal jail time -- from 20 years to as much as life in prison -- when their tainted batches of dope kill or seriously harm buyers.

This is the first time in Delaware that prosecutors have invoked a federal law with no regard for a criminal's intent. It's a tough call needed for tough times in drug enforcement.

Across the country, at least 300 deaths, and hundreds more non-fatal overdoses, have been blamed on fentanyl-laced heroin just this year.

Since April, more than 30 heroin overdoses have been reported in Delaware, including nine known deaths.

A Dover man was among those deaths. He allegedly purchased the tainted heroin from Joseph Bentley, a suspected New Castle-area drug dealer.

Three days after the user's death, wiretaps of phone conversations between Bentley and his father, a Delaware Correctional Center inmate, recorded the son learning that his batches were tainted. He also said a second person died, but gave no name.

But even this news did not stop Joseph Bentley from selling his bad batches; that is until his May 5 arrest, police say.

Mr. Connolly's use of this law is meant to address this kind of egregious disregard for life.

Tainted drugs are not likely to go away. A criminally minded genius keeps them fueling the illegal drug trade around the world. Consequently, law enforcement authorities must be equally imaginative and creative within the bounds of the law.

Critics worried about the de-emphasis on dealers' intent should weigh that concern against the consequences of a dealer's lack of regard for their victims' lives.

U.S. Uploads Anti-Drug Videos To YouTube (AP)

Bush administration distributes anti-drug, public service announcements over YouTube

(AP) The Bush administration is taking its fight against illegal drugs to YouTube, the trendy Internet video service that already features clips of wacky, drug-induced behavior and step-by-step instructions for growing marijuana plants.

DOJ_NMG_0065325

The decision to distribute anti-drug, public service announcements and other videos over YouTube represents the first concerted effort by the U.S. government to influence customers of the popular service, which shows more than 100 million videos per day.

The administration was expected to announce the decision formally on Tuesday. It said it was not paying any money to load its previously produced videos onto YouTube's service, so the program is effectively free.

"If just one teen sees this and decides illegal drug use is not the path for them, it will be a success," said Rafael Lemaitre, a spokesman for the drug office.

The government's YouTube videos include a previously televised, 30-second ad of a teenager running from a snarling dog and bemoaning pressure from his friends to smoke marijuana.

"Then today, they said I should try to out run Tic Tic, the lumber-yard dog," the teen says. "And I don't think I can. I'm an idiot."

YouTube, a San Mateo, Calif.-based startup, has become one of the Internet's hottest properties since two 20-something friends started the company 19 months ago. The free service allows users to share and view videos, most of which are amateurishly produced and include clips of young people singing and dancing _ usually badly.

The government's short public service announcements _ all of which were produced previously for television _ are highly polished. They will compete for viewership against hundreds of existing, drug-related videos that include shaky footage of college-age kids smoking marijuana and girls dancing wildly after purportedly using cocaine. Other YouTube videos describe how to grow marijuana and how to cook with it.

"Welcome to the great experiment," said Lee Rainie, director of the Pew Internet & American Life Project. He predicted computer-savvy critics of U.S. drug policies will quickly edit the government's videos to produce parodies and distribute those on YouTube. "This seems pretty new and pretty adventurous."

The government linked its videos with the terms "war on drugs," "peer-pressure," "marijuana," "weed," "ONDCP" and "420," so anyone searching for those words on YouTube could find its anti-drug messages. All the videos were associated with a YouTube account named "ONDCPstaff" and identified as an 18-year-old living in Washington. The term 420 is a popular reference for marijuana.

Michael Bugeja, who studies how different groups use the Internet, said the White House plan is misdirected because online video services don't afford serious consideration to weighty topics.

"It's the wrong forum and the wrong target," said Bugeja, an author and director of the journalism school at Iowa State University.

U.S. Raps Venezuela, Myanmar Over Drugs (XINHUA)

Xinhua News Agency, September 19, 2006

The United States accused Venezuela and Myanmar of doing too little to fight the drug trade and expressed deep concerns about failings in Afghanistan and Bolivia.

In its annual report on the global drug trade, the Bush administration identified Afghanistan, The Bahamas, Bolivia, Brazil, Myanmar, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Jamaica, Laos, Mexico, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, and Venezuela as major drug-transit or major illicit drug-producing countries.

"The president (Bush) has determined that two countries -- Burma (Myanmar) and Venezuela -- failed demonstrably during the previous 12 months to make substantial efforts to adhere to their obligations," Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs Christy McCampbell said at a news briefing here.

Venezuela, the world's fifth largest oil exporter, has been given a waiver to possible sanctions under U.S. law because support for the programs to aid Venezuela's democratic institutions and community development projects is vital to the national interests of the United States, McCampbell said.

U.S.-Venezuelan relations have been fraught with tension with President Hugo Chavez saying that the United States is planning an invasion of his country, while the United States says Chavez is destabilizing the region.

DOJ_NMG_0065326

Referring to Myanmar, McCampbell said the country has not taken decisive action against drug gangs, and it is actions against methamphetamine are unsatisfactory.

Burma's performances also lack luster in the areas of demand reduction, interdiction, anti-money laundering and combating corruption, she said.

U.S. Faults Bolivia Anti - Drug Efforts (AP)

AP, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Bush administration said Monday it sees disturbing trends in Bolivia's dealings with efforts to combat illicit drugs.

Concerns about contributions to the illegal drug trade by the South American nation came as the White House released the U.S. government's annual list of major drug-transit or drug-producing countries.

The list remained unchanged from a year ago, with 20 nations cited: Afghanistan, the Bahamas, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Jamaica, Laos, Mexico, Myanmar, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru and Venezuela.

President Bush sent a report to Congress that also noted that Myanmar and Venezuela, for the second year in a row, were determined to have "failed demonstrably" to meet their obligations under international counternarcotics requirements.

The report singled out Bolivia, the world's third-largest producer of cocaine, for particular emphasis.

"Despite increased drug interdiction, Bolivia has undertaken policies that have allowed the expansion of coca cultivation and have significantly curtailed eradication," White House press secretary Tony Snow.

The Bolivian government has focused almost solely on interdiction, without a focus on eradication and the development of alternative crops, the report said.

Snow said the U.S. government will establish benchmarks by which to further judge Bolivia, such as eradicating minimum acreages, including in the Chapare region, making changes to Bolivian law and tightly controlling the legitimate sale of the coca leaf for traditional use. An interim assessment of any progress will come in March, he said.

Bolivian Vice President Alvaro Garcia Linera met with senior administration officials last week to discuss narcotics issues.

Christy McCampbell, of the State Department's counterdrug office, said Monday that the meeting yielded little headway.

"We expressed our concerns; he listened to it. And there was not any kind of meeting of the minds at this meeting," she said.

On Afghanistan, Snow credited President Hamid Karzai's strong stance against the country's huge opium poppy cultivation but said the Afghan government must do more to deter the problem, including a crackdown on traffickers.

Snow also credited Ecuador with making considerable progress in combatting narcotics trafficking destined for the United States. But, the report said, there has been a dramatic increase in U.S.-bound cocaine sent by Ecuadorian-registered ships.

Snow also offered harsh criticism of Venezuela's counternarcotics record. "Venezuela's importance as a transshipment point for drugs bound for the United States and Europe has continued to increase in the past 12 months, a situation both enabled and exploited by corrupt Venezuelan officials," he said.

Bush waived provisions of U.S. law that could have subjected Venezuela to a cutoff of U.S. assistance because of the designation. The president said he would maintain U.S. programs that aid Venezuela's democratic institutions, establish community development projects and strengthen Venezuela's political party system.

The administration also decided not to cut these programs last year because they promote democracy in Venezuela, a key U.S. goal in a country where, officials say, the commitment to democratic norms has been eroding under President Hugo Chavez.

Associated Press writer George Gedda contributed to this report.

Senate To Consider Border Fence Bill (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa

AP, September 19, 2006

The Senate will consider a bill calling for erecting 700 miles of fencing on the U.S-Mexican border, a proposal that has been approved twice by the House.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., used a legislative maneuver to get the bill to the floor as early as Wednesday, when the Senate could decide whether to move forward on the legislation.

"Border security is the essential first step of any effort to enact immigration reform. Only when we have convinced the American people of our commitment to securing our borders will we be able reach a consensus on comprehensive immigration reform," Frist said in a statement.

Democrats are likely to try to block the bill. They may try to attach the comprehensive immigration bill the Senate passed in May as an amendment and push debate into next week. A delay could be a problem as Congress tries to wrestle with legislation addressing treatment of terrorism suspects.

"This smacks of desperation and a clear repudiation of President Bush's support for comprehensive immigration reform. It's obviously designed to play to the base. Sen. Frist was for comprehensive immigration reform before he was against it," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

House Republicans, trying to keep the illegal immigration issue before voters, passed the fence bill last week by a vote of 283-138. The House had approved the same amount of fencing last December as part of a broader bill that would have made being in the country illegally a felony. That bill is stalled.

The nearly 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexican border now has about 75 miles of fencing.

The Senate's immigration bill calls for 370 miles of triple-layer fencing along the Mexican border. The Senate approved $1.8 billion in a defense spending bill for the construction. The House has not provided funding for the fence it approved.

The House and Senate passed far different immigration bills. Republican leaders in the House have resisted compromise. Heading into elections, they chose instead to take out parts of their bill and pass them separately to keep the focus on border security, which plays well with conservative voters.

The fence bill to be considered in the Senate is HR 6061

Senate Set To Consider Fence Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

The Senate, which has been the major obstacle to strict border-security legislation this year, will take up a bill this week that calls for constructing 700 more miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

"It's time to secure the border with Mexico," Majority Leader Bill Frist said last night before filing the parliamentary motions to force the House-passed bill onto the Senate floor in a final effort to get a major immigration bill on the president's desk before the elections.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Minority Leader Harry Reid, said the move "smacks of desperation" and was a "clear repudiation of President Bush's call for comprehensive legislation."

The Secure Fence Act of 2006, which was easily approved by the House last week, contains none of the "comprehensive" measures that President Bush, Democrats and some Senate Republicans have demanded. Those include provisions to grant citizenship rights to about 10 million illegal aliens living in the country and a guest-worker program that would usher hundreds of thousands more foreign laborers into the U.S.

"Mr. Frist was for comprehensive reform before he was against it," Mr. Manley said.

On the Senate floor last night, Mr. Frist said he still supports comprehensive immigration reform legislation. But, he said, because no consensus can now be reached on other issues, Congress should move ahead with border security. It's not "enforcement only," he said, but "enforcement first."

DOJ_NMG_0065328

"Border security is the essential first step of any effort to enact immigration reform," Mr. Frist said. "Only when we have convinced the American people of our commitment to securing our borders will we be able to reach a consensus on comprehensive immigration reform."

The last time the Senate considered a border-security-only bill, the measure failed, with all but two Democrats and 20 Republicans refusing even to debate it. Since then, several Republicans bent on comprehensive reform have told The Washington Times that they would now consider legislation that dealt only with stopping the flow of illegal aliens into the country.

Among the most adamant supporters of comprehensive reform have been Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who helped form a coalition earlier this year to derail any legislation that failed to grant broad citizenship rights to illegals and create a guest-worker program. The group of Republican defectors also included Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia.

Mr. McCain, Mr. Warner and Mr. Graham also have bolted party leadership by opposing Mr. Bush's proposed legislation for handling the terror suspects held at Guantanamo Bay. The specter of a showdown this week over both the Guantanamo detainees and immigration had some Republican staffers on Capitol Hill wondering whether the trio could wage a two-front battle against their own party during an election season in which control of both chambers is in question.

By filing last night a cloture motion that will limit debate and let the Senate vote on the bill, Mr. Frist hopes to get the measure to the floor by week's end. If Democrats stall, they could push the debate well into next week. And if, as is expected, Mr. Frist introduces the bill so that amendments cannot be offered, the battle in the Senate likely will take even longer and could end in yet another stalemate.

But the House's approval of the bill suggests that Mr. Frist might see some converts on both sides of the aisle in favor of a bill that deals only with border security.

When the House last year approved its border-security legislation, it included almost exactly the same fencing provisions. The fence came to symbolize what many Democrats said was an unforgiving bill. They said the fence proved that Republicans harbored a hostility toward immigrants.

But last week, the stand-alone fence bill was approved 283-138, with support from more than 20 Democrats and a handful of Republicans who dropped opposition to the earlier fence proposal.

Still, most Democrats are adamantly opposed to the fence bill, calling it a new "Berlin Wall" and an election-year "gimmick" intended to portray them as weak on security measures. In addition, internal Republican polling has found that immigration is as powerful a motivator for voters as any issue with which Congress is grappling.

"They're obviously done with legislating for the year," Mr. Manley said. "Now, they're just playing to their base."

If approved by the Senate before month's end, the bill would reach President Bush's desk before the November elections.

In addition to building double-layered fences along 700 miles of the southern border, the Secure Fence Act also calls for changing Border Patrol policy to allow agents to forcibly disable fleeing vehicles along the border. The measure also would deploy cameras, ground sensors and unmanned aerial vehicles to monitor the border.

"This border-security package, coupled with the increased appropriations for border security, will have a real impact on our homeland security and is a vital step forward toward fixing the problem of illegal immigration," Majority Whip Mitch McConnell said yesterday.

"We've added thousands of new Border Patrol agents and nearly 10,000 new detention beds and hundreds of miles of fencing along the border. But this legislation will take us much closer to the operational control of our border that our homeland security requires and provide law enforcement with the tools they need to get the job done," the Kentucky Republican said.

Immigration's Lost Year (NYT)

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

Congressional leaders and President Bush insisted for months that they were serious about fixing the immigration system. They weren't, and the more talk you hear about border security, about building walls and getting tough this time, the clearer it will be that hopes for effective immigration reform this year are past saving, pinned down by strong arms in the Republican-controlled House and kicked until dead.

DOJ_NMG_0065329

The latest proposals are the product of a Republicans-only "forum" last week that distilled the bilge water of a summer's worth of immigration "hearings," which were actually badly disguised campaign events. The hearings — with titles like "How Does Illegal Immigration Impact American Taxpayers and Will the Reid-Kennedy Amnesty Worsen the Blow?" — were show trials put on to destroy comprehensive reform by any means necessary. "What I wanted was witnesses who agree with me, not disagree with me," said Representative Charlie Norwood of Georgia, putting it perfectly.

The "Reid-Kennedy Amnesty," by the way, refers to the now-defunct Senate immigration bill, which passed that Republican-controlled body with the support of stalwarts like Arlen Specter, John McCain, Mel Martinez, Bill Frist, Chuck Hagel and the most prominent Republican of all, Mr. Bush. One of the many signs of the hysteria accompanying this election season is the way their moderate approach to immigration has been tarred as wholesale "amnesty" for lawbreakers.

Like the summer hearings, the latest G.O.P. legislation is an empty vessel, a sham product aimed at the November elections that sells the test-marketed concept of "security" with little to back it up. By decreeing that a 700-mile fence should be the nation's top immigration priority while rabidly opposing a path to legal status for illegal immigrants, the House Republicans are hotly pursing a failed strategy. What satisfies the talk-radio appetite for justice — wall 'em out and deport the rest — is not just needlessly cruel. It also won't work.

If the House Republicans have their way and enforcement-only becomes our national policy, illegal immigrants will keep their heads down and keep working, cowed into accepting low pay and abuse, dragging down working conditions for everybody else. Lawlessness among the employers who hire them will be encouraged. If you like this world of illegality, anonymity and under-the-table cash, then the House Republican approach is the one for you.

Real immigration security means separating the harmful from the hard-working. It means imposing the rule of law on the ad-hoc immigrant economy. It means freeing up resources so that overburdened law-enforcement agencies can restore order at the border and in the workplace. It means holding employers, not just workers, responsible for obeying the law. And it means tapping the energy of vast numbers of immigrants who dream of becoming citizens and who can make the country stronger.

These are huge tasks, and the anti-immigrant forces have nothing to contribute. They are out of ideas, except about getting re-elected. Their calculated inaction and half-measures mock Americans' support for comprehensive reform, which has been repeatedly confirmed in opinion polls.

We will see whether the November elections will make the travesty worth it for the immigrant-bashers, but for the nation it has become a lost year.

As US Nears Milestone, A Rising Mix Of Immigrants (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker And Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 19, 2006

What keeps America's population clock ticking are people like Dominic Paz.

On a busy day running Alpha Taxi in Lawrenceville, Ga., he flips through a wad of $10s and $20s as he chats in both English and Spanish on two cellphones while dispatching cabs from a croaking CB radio. An immigrant from Honduras, Mr. Paz points to the blur of cars passing his home base - a bench at a strip mall that caters to Hispanics. "Two, three years ago, it was nothing like this, nothing."

Lawrenceville has grown 27 percent in five years, and a big reason is immigration. In all of Gwinnett County, the number of foreign-born residents has nearly doubled in that time. "It's 80 percent Hispanic," Paz says. "There's a brown face everywhere you look."

While growth is slowing almost everywhere in the developed world, three factors are powering the US population toward the 300 million mark. Couples are having enough babies to replace themselves. People are living longer. And the biggest reason: Immigration to the US has sharply increased in recent decades.

Immigration is not only boosting America's numbers, it's changing the face of the country. That 300 millionth new person, expected in a few weeks, is just as likely to fly in from China (or wade across the Rio Grande from Mexico) as he or she is to be born here. To put it another way: Every 31 seconds another person from abroad is added to the US population roll.

The rise in newcomers - nearly quadruple the number in 1970 - has fueled a widespread backlash against illegal immigrants. That's half the story. The less familiar but also important trend is the influx of highly skilled workers and highly motivated entrepreneurs who have helped the US economy grow. Some immigrants have high-end jobs

While 23 percent of the nation's cooks and 20 percent of its janitors were immigrants in 2000, 27 percent of new computer-software engineers were also immigrants, according to a recent Migration Policy Institute study.

Indeed, the more technically educated the group, the more likely immigrants are to be overrepresented in it. While the foreign born make up 15 percent of the overall workforce, according to the 2000 census, they constitute approximately 17 percent of those with a bachelor's degree in science and engineering occupations, 29 percent of those with a master's degree, and 39 percent of those with a doctoral degree.

Already, 1 in 5 US doctors is foreign born, as are 2 in 5 medical scientists, 1 in 5 computer specialists, 1 in 6 people in engineering or science occupations, 1 in 4 astronomers, physicists, chemical, and material scientists, and 1 in 6 biological scientists, according to another Migration Policy Institute study.

"Plainly, high-skilled immigrants are a critical resource for the knowledge-driven economy and play an important role in the country's global dominance in science and engineering and its leadership in technology," write the study's authors, Columbia University economist Neeraj Kaushal and Migration Policy Institute vice president Michael Fix.

In some ways, the nation's big population milestones - America at 100 million, 200 million, and 300 million - bookend the ebb and flow of immigrants.

In 1910, at the height of the last immigration boom and just five years shy of reaching the 100 million mark, nearly 15 percent of Americans were foreign born. For the next 60 years, that percentage dropped steadily, down to less than 5 percent.

But in 1970, not long after the US population reached 200 million, the figure began to climb again. Today, it's back up to over 12 percent.

The result: a smaller share of immigrants than in 1910, but a far greater number. Estimates put the total near 35 million (legal and illegal). That's 2-1/2 times as many immigrants as there were in 1910. Hispanics take the lead

There's another difference: Whereas the early 1900s saw thousands of Europeans arriving through Ellis Island, then filling up New York's tenement buildings or pushing on to become factory workers, farmers, and shopkeepers in the Midwest, most immigrants today come from Latin America or Asia. As of 2000, 52 percent were from Latin America, 26 percent from Asia, and only 19 percent from Europe.

Immigrants are also spreading out, changing the complexion of corners of the country unaccustomed to waves of foreign-speaking newcomers.

The South, in particular, has seen rapid change: Eastern European dealers at casinos in Mobile, Ala.; Korean shopkeepers in Atlanta; Mexican Christmas tree harvesters on North Carolina's Appalachian slopes.

Some of the states with the fastest- growing immigrant populations lie in the South. Some parts of the region have seen up to 300 percent growth in immigrant populations since 1990.

Such growth is evident in Lawrenceville, the seat of Gwinnett County. Planners see a vibrant future. The county school system has set up a special language center to test new students. There are enough new immigrant children here each year to fill a new school, as they make up about 1,500 of the 7,000 additional students flowing into the school district each year. Ban on taco stands

But there's another side. County commissioners earlier this year banned mobile taco stands for being too trashy looking. This year, the Georgia legislature passed the Security and Immigration Compliance Act, one of the nation's toughest bills to curb illegal immigration.

The law caused a ripple of fear, says Paz in Lawrenceville. As he talks to one Mexican woman grabbing a ride, she says she'll go to Canada when the law takes effect next summer. "People are afraid," says Paz.

So are many American workers, who fear that immigrants will take their jobs. The data are inconclusive.

The Pew Hispanic Center recently used US census information to compare increases in the foreign-born population with employment opportunities at the state level. It looked at two periods in particular: the boom years of the 1990s and the downturn and recovery since 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0065331

The bottom line, according to Pew associate research director Rakesh Kochhar: "The size of the foreign-born workforce in a state appears to have no relationship to the employment prospects for native-born workers."

In general, other experts agree.

"While the number of immigrants is very large, the impact on the overall economy is very small," says Steven Camarota, director of research for the Center for Immigration Studies.

But, he added in recent testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, "While the impact on the economy as a whole may be tiny, the effect on some Americans, particularly workers at the bottom of the labor market, may be quite large."

That's a major concern for those who want to see the federal government change what they see as too-liberal immigration policies and not enough border security.

"It certainly has resulted in the importation of labor substitutes for a wide variety of American workers, with the result that we're widening the wage gap for less skilled workers who've seen real wages declining," says Dan Stein, executive director of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR) in Washington. "Substitutes erode bargaining leverage and decrease offered wages. Supply and demand works here as everywhere else." Illegals: 11 million or 20 million?

Even the number of illegal immigrants is in dispute. About 30 percent of immigrants - an estimated 11 million - are here illegally, according to most government and private sources. That figure is believed to be growing by some 500,000 a year, according to the US Citizenship and Immigration Services (formerly the Immigration and Naturalization Service).

But one research team posited last year that as many as 20 million illegal immigrants may be living in the US today. Robert Justich and Betty Ng of Bear Stearns, a global investment banking, securities trading, and brokerage firm, based their conclusion on a study of public school enrollment, language-proficiency programs, building permits, and the significant amount of money being sent home by undocumented workers.

One of their conclusions: "Four [million] to six million jobs have shifted to the underground market as small businesses take advantage of the vulnerability of illegal residents."

There's another kind of vulnerability as well. In an investigative report this month, the Chicago Tribune found that illegal immigrants face disproportionate injuries and fatalities - often unreported - doing hazardous jobs like meat-cutting and dry-cleaning.

About half the total US population increase these days is Hispanic, according to the US Census Bureau, making Hispanics the largest and fastest-growing racial or ethnic minority. Part of that rise is children born to Hispanics already in the country. The rest comes from immigration. Fifty-seven percent of those newcomers are from Mexico, and another 24 percent are from other Latin American countries, according to the Pew Hispanic Center, a nonpartisan research group in Washington. Influx helps Social Security

On average, Hispanics in the US are considerably younger than the population as a whole: Their median age is about 27 compared with about 36 for the country generally. That means that as older non-Hispanics retire, there will be relatively more workers to pay into Social Security. It also means more Hispanics in the future. About one-third of them are under 18 - just entering the years when they'll have children of their own.

"People come for a place to raise their kids, where there's a future," says Marcel Cueva, a Lawrenceville cab driver who came from the Dominican Republic 18 years ago and recently became a US citizen.

"Other places like New York have become too expensive," says Mr. Cueva, who has four children and soon may be joined here by his father. "You can make money, but the money is gone. Here you can keep some of it."

The fact that the US has recently become home to an extraordinary number of immigrants also may indicate a new direction for the country as it moves on toward 400 million people, probably sometime in the middle of the century.

"It says that we're going to be a country that is more outwardly reaching to the rest of the world, that we'll be more multicultural than we've been in the recent past," says William Frey, a demographer at the University of Michigan and the Brookings Institution think tank in Washington.

Out Town -- Or Is It Theirs? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

WILLIAMS, Calif. — There has been discord enough in the shady streets of this rice-growing city north of San Francisco, where the population has shifted from three-quarters white to nearly three-quarters Latino in just two decades.

Anyone wanting some heated conversation need only mention the time six years ago when the board of education extended the Christmas break to three weeks to give Mexican families more time to go home for the holidays.

The realignment of the calendar maximized classroom time, resulting in lower truancy and improved test scores. But it also set off a cultural debate that continues to this day.

"The Caucasian community didn't want the change," which meant trimming the treasured summer vacation by a week, said Colusa County Supervisor Mark Marshall. "It was very controversial."

Now, if this were a story about Hazleton, Pa., or San Bernardino, places where federal immigration battles ring as loudly through City Hall as they have at recent congressional hearings, it might have culminated in angry denunciations, protests and television cameras capturing them-against-us conflict.

But in Williams, a place that demographer Hans Johnson describes as "the most ethnically transformed city in California," the story is not that simple.

Williams "serves as an almost natural experiment about what these changes mean for all of us," said Johnson, of the Public Policy Institute of California, who estimates that as much as 20% of the city's population could be undocumented.

This city of 5,087 (and rising fast) is the closest thing to a "Petri dish" for observing the effects of immigration in their most concentrated form, said Roberto Suro, director of the Pew Hispanic Center.

The experiment has not always had predictable results. Practical people, for the most part, residents of this agricultural outpost are slowly — sometimes reluctantly — coming to terms with the dramatic changes wrought by immigration.

"All of the families like mine and my husband's, who grew up here all their lives, have had problems with the change in culture," said Kara Alvernaz, who works for the local fire district. But the last thing she'd do is give up on the schools — calendar change or no. "I chose to keep my kids here. They've gotten a good education."

It was Monica Ordaz, a business owner of Mexican descent, who issued her daughter's teacher an ultimatum last year, when bilingual Nicole hit kindergarten: "If my daughter was ever used as a translator, taken away from her time to learn to teach someone else, I'd take her out of the school," she recalled saying.

"I just don't think it's fair for the kids," said Ordaz, who with her husband runs El Campesino, the combination general store, tax service and translation center that largely caters to farmworkers.

As immigration touches nearly every facet of life here, it's been a slow march of two steps forward and one step back, of honest effort meeting harsh reality.

The police and fire departments now have healthy percentages of bilingual members, but elected boards lag far behind in representing the Latino supermajority. An expensive subdivision largely for commuters has been welcomed; expanded housing for farmworkers has not.

At the Church of the Annunciation, Spanish Masses outnumber English 2 to 1. But when a shortage of priests drove Father Francisco Hernandez Gomez to trim one poorly attended English Mass a month, white parishioners revolted. "They thought I was favoring the Hispanics," he recounted, "and that I was kicking out the whites from their own church."

Hernandez Gomez, who has reinstated the English Mass, said the prejudice he sometimes senses in Williams is mostly passive and, perhaps, rooted in feelings of fear and loss.

"Yes, after being the majority just a few years ago, now they are just a few people among a big new community," he said. "The whites could feel they are losing their town, their church, their school, their stores, their language."

Small enough to be featured in a guidebook called "Wide Places in the California Roads," Williams has been a farm town since its early history. Today, it is part of the No. 1 rice-growing county in California.

But rice's dominance is slipping in the region — and therein lies one key to the city's metamorphosis.

Rice is a relatively low-labor crop, with increasingly slim returns. So farmers have been planting other things. Agriculture Commissioner Harry Krug predicts that, for the first time, almond revenues will surpass rice in Colusa County this year.

DOJ_NMG_0065333

"The almond orchards have increased dramatically," said Krug. "Tomatoes came in. We grow a lot of seed crops … They needed more labor. That's where the influx came from."

Changing immigration law also has boosted Williams' population. The federal amnesty program in 1986 paved the way for thousands of illegal immigrants to become legal residents. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, those who used to regularly travel back and forth from Mexico have been more likely to stay put, fearful of being caught at the border.

Most of the city's new small businesses cater to Latinos: Toro Loco Mercado; Pita's Restaurant; Roberta's Taqueria, which sells lengua (tongue) and cabeza (head) tacos hard by the Burger King.

Even longtime grocery stores like Shop n' Save stock pork skins in vinegar, mango lollipops, bottled cactus and cones of dark sugar called piloncillo, along with Campbell's soups and People magazine.

Members of Alicia Zamudio's family have trekked to Williams since the 1940s — three generations of campesinos from the central Mexican state of Guanajuato, all in search of work.

Her parents were the first to come. Zamudio, 49, her husband and children started coming each summer in 1990. Today, two of her children, grown and married, have settled in Williams. She would stay too if housing weren't so dear.

"There are many more Latinos here," said Zamudio, who works in the fields six days a week tending tomatoes and vine crops grown for seed. "I see a lot less Anglos now. Maybe because the work here in Williams is farm work and not a lot of Anglos want to be in the field hoeing and picking tomatoes."

When Linda Granzella describes the Williams High School homecoming game of 1993, her words come out in an emotional rush. She is sitting in the office of her family's combination restaurant, motel and olive packing company, barely looking up as the tale bursts forth.

Granzella was in the bleachers, waiting for the Yellowjackets to take the field, when the high school band struck up the national anthem. The loudspeaker's disembodied voice asked everyone to stand.

What happened next "put me over the edge," she said. "Eighty percent of the stadium wouldn't stand. They were Hispanic children, and they didn't stand for the national anthem … I asked them why. They said, 'This is not our country.' "

The indignant mother's response was visceral: She took her daughter out of Williams Elementary School and sent her 10 miles east to a public school in the county seat of Colusa.

"I didn't want her to be in a school where she was a minority in her own country, and they didn't have respect," Granzella said.

Families like Granzella's began transferring their children to nearby districts with fewer Latino students a decade or so before the school board began debating a change in the academic calendar. Tiny Maxwell, 10 miles north on Interstate 5, has been a popular destination, with its plush athletic fields and a high school that's more than twice as white as school enrollment countywide.

"The calendar was a good excuse," said Williams Elementary School Principal Cyndee Engrahm, to explain what for years has been "white flight, pure and simple."

Changing the calendar took a year of acrimonious debate and laid bare the chasm between white and Latino work lives. To some, it also became an argument over whose time was worth more.

"The Anglos wanted more time during the summer. They thought that their time was more important during summer than winter break," said Carlos Velazquez, a real estate agent and chairman of the Williams planning commission.

Three weeks was actually a hard-won compromise. "We'd like a month," Velazquez said. "Most of us are off during the winter, at least three months."

Rice farmer Bob Freed, a school board member at the time, said the final result rankled nearly everyone.

"I had people call me on it: 'You're giving in to the Hispanic population,' " he recounted. "That's not true. Basically it was the answer to the problem."

The moment was not lost on new Police Chief Jim Saso. As he walked into his department's small offices one steamy July day, a resident was conducting a bit of routine business. Two police officers, the records clerk and the city's code enforcement officer were all chiming in — in Spanish.

"I realized we've come a long way," Saso said.

DOJ_NMG_0065334

When Saso joined the Williams Police Department as a sergeant in 2001, there was one bilingual police officer. Today the department is more than 50% bilingual, a change Saso credits to recently retired Chief Dick Waugh, who Saso said recognized "that the demographics are changing."

Similarly, the volunteer Fire Department, which once was nearly all white and open to candidates by invitation only, just promoted Jaime Davalos to captain. He is the first Latino to hold the post.

Twelve of Williams' 42 volunteer firefighters are Latino, seven joining up in the last six months alone. Most of the new recruits, drawn by word of mouth, are people who have lived in the agricultural city for many years. To Chief Jeff Gilbert, who has headed the department since 2003, it's a sign that the Latino community is changing: "We're getting into a new generation. They care about the community."

The Latino majority remains largely outside the political arena, however.

Mayor Virginia Frias was appointed in 2004 to fill a vacant seat on the City Council; if she wins this November, she would be the first Latino elected to that body. The school board is entirely white, as is the Colusa County Board of Supervisors.

Some here fault discrimination, "cultural differences" or long hours in the fields for the discrepancy between population and representation. Others cite language ability and citizenship — or the lack thereof. Almost half of the Latino immigrants in Williams had arrived in the last decade, according to the 2000 census, and only 6% were naturalized.

Velazquez, 38, is someone whose name comes up regularly in conversations about possible Latino candidates. Born near Guadalajara, he is the son of farmworkers and has lived in the area since he was 12.

He wavers on whether he'd ever run, but either way, he believes the city's politics need someday to mirror its population. Part of the problem for Latinos, he said, is lingering mistrust arising from experiences in their home countries.

"I think a lot of us don't want to make waves," Velazquez said. But "we've got to be able to represent our population…. We've got to get over our fear of government."

A lot is at stake. Consider housing policies.

The city has embraced an earth-tone development where single-family houses fetch $400,000, while balking at a proposal to build 50 units of what some consider desperately needed dwellings for year-round farmworkers.

Officials say the project's biggest hurdle is the city's outdated sewer system. Some project supporters see darker motives.

"The city put every roadblock in our way," said Agriculture Commissioner Krug, who runs the seasonal housing complex for migrant workers and wants to see it grow.

"The one thing I've been telling my manager: Get these people to run for office. Get them on the City Council and the school board. They need some representation."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

CIA Reviewing Use Of Contractors (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, September 19, 2006

CIA Director Michael Hayden is reviewing his agency's use of private contractors and the number of people who are resigning to fill the often lucrative positions.

"I am going to investigate to see how much of an issue it is, and then we will take some action," Hayden said during a telephone interview with The Associated Press on Monday, after he spoke to CIA personnel about his vision for the agency.

He is in his fourth month as chief.

Current and former government officials have expressed concern about a so-called "brain drain" to the private sector, which is impossible to quantify publicly because the contracts and personnel figures at spy agencies are secret.

CIA employees generally can retire with full benefits after a career of at least two decades, and some return as contractors. But Hayden said he's more concerned about another issue: the early resignation of employees who get CIA training, leave their jobs and return in higher paying, private-sector contracting positions.

If resignations are higher than historic norms, "you begin to look like the farm system for contractors around here," Hayden said.

In its Sunday editions, the Los Angeles Times provided new evidence about the trend among spy agencies to hire contractors for roles once filled by U.S. government personnel. The work is particularly bountiful given the war on terror and the extended conflict in Iraq.

Jim Pavitt, who headed the CIA's clandestine service from 1999 to 2004, said the CIA has to rely on contractors because its mission expanded rapidly after the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and budget cuts in the 1990s meant the CIA hadn't hired enough people.

"It was on the 12th of September, when just about anything I asked for — dollars or more people — everyone was willing to give me," he said.

Hayden did not speak to the CIA work force Monday about contractors specifically, but he did tell the thousands gathered in person and on closed-circuit television about the need to focus on developing new leaders.

As part of the massive boost in national security spending following 9/11, the agency's ranks have grown by about 17 percent, with a roughly 6 percent increase last year, according to CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield.

Some of that growth stems from President Bush's November 2004 order to boost the number of CIA operatives and analysts by 50 percent. Yet intelligence veterans say the challenge is to get quality with the quantity.

"We need a lot of coaching and mentoring," Hayden said in the interview.

He also said the CIA needs to be able to support its personnel — with everything from office space to better technology. He noted that the power went out in June for several hours at the agency's suburban Virginia headquarters, calling attention to the need for an uninterruptible power supply.

While essential work continued thanks to backup power generation, Hayden said, "you had a lot of people sitting around, looking at computers that now became bookends."

Speaking to the work force, Hayden also said he wants to focus on relationships with allied intelligence services, send more U.S.-based intelligence analysts overseas to get them on-the-ground experience and put an even greater emphasis on the clandestine work that's done around the globe.

He only briefly touched on the issue of detainees, which has dominated headlines since Bush announced that the CIA's last 14 high-value detainees had been transferred to military custody.

With the move, the administration also asked Congress for legislation that would clarify in law that the CIA's program is appropriate and legal, allowing it to continue in the future. "All I want to say on that subject is that this agency will continue to reflect the conscience of the republic in everything we do," Hayden said.

New Chief Is Critical Of Barriers Within CIA (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

The CIA's new director, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, told agency employees yesterday that their intelligence activities are too segmented, saying that operations officers who collect intelligence need to work more closely with the analysts who interpret what it means.

Four months after taking over, Hayden presented his strategic vision to a CIA workforce that has been battered by years of investigations into the failures of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and prewar intelligence about Iraq's weapons programs, as well as a reorganization that lowered the agency's status with the creation of a director of national intelligence.

"The collectors are over here and the analysts over there. We are too segmented, and thinking has been driven by focusing on their own piece of the action," Hayden said in an interview, in which he expanded on the remarks to his staff.

He said he has created a new "board of directors" inside the agency that will begin breaking down walls that have separated the Directorate of Operations, which is the clandestine service, and the Directorate of Intelligence, which is the analytic arm, and even the science and technology group, which comes up with new ideas. One result will be to limit much of the independence each directorate had in the past and centralize more authority with Hayden.

In the past, the CIA director was partially diverted from details of agency operations because, as director of central intelligence, he had to spend time as leader of the 16 agencies that make up the intelligence community. John D. Negroponte, as national intelligence director, now plays that role.

As part of his integration planning, Hayden wants to have new employees, no matter which career path they follow, spend more than the current day-and-a-half orientation period together learning about the agency.

"There could be a basic training period of up to two weeks," he said, before those destined for clandestine service head down to "the Farm" for six months' training at Camp Peary near Williamsburg, while analysts remain in the Washington area for courses in analytic tradecraft termed in the past "CIA 101" and "CIA 201."

Human intelligence expansion is another goal of Hayden's, as it has been for his two predecessors since the Sept. 11 attacks showed a lack of on-the-ground intelligence sources in the world of terrorism.

One facet of intelligence reorganization that works in the CIA's favor is that the agency now oversees the National Clandestine Service, coordinating all overseas spying activities whether carried on by the CIA, the Pentagon or the FBI.

Hayden said Clandestine Service leadership has begun setting uniform standards for human intelligence training so that case officers for all U.S. overseas spying efforts follow the same standards for vetting potential agents, writing reports and sharing information when appropriate.

For the analysts, Hayden said he plans to put more emphasis on "expertise and time on target and experience," along with "pushing analysts overseas." This continues efforts to reform past practices, in which promotions went to analysts who had served in different types of jobs instead of to those who developed deep expertise in one area. "That reward now could go to someone who has been looking at Iran for 14 years," Hayden said.

He also promised there will be a study of the trend of contracting out intelligence jobs with private firms. "We don't want to be a farm system for these new firms," Hayden said, noting that private companies sometimes lure away young officers and analysts once they have their security clearances and have completed a few years with the agency.

Proposal On Military Chaplains And Prayer Holds Up Bill (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 18 — A bill that sets the Pentagon's spending levels is being held up by controversy over a provision that would allow military chaplains to offer sectarian prayers at nondenominational military events.

The provision, which is being pushed by Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, says "chaplains in each of the military services would have the prerogative to pray according to the dictates of their own conscience." The Senate version of the spending bill, the National Defense Authorization Act, has no such language.

Chaplains can pray according to the traditions of their faith at worship services, where attendance is voluntary. But they are also called upon to offer prayers at mandatory functions, like changes of command, banquets and speeches.

The provision's backers, among them Representative Walter B. Jones, Republican of North Carolina, contend that Christian chaplains in such cases have long invoked Christ.

"What is happening is a move toward more political correctness, towards more secularism in the military," Mr. Jones said. "I cannot believe that the majority of Americans would be offended that a person prayed to his God."

Opponents of the provision and other chaplains dispute Mr. Jones's version of chaplaincy tradition. They say that at mandatory events, the longstanding custom has been to offer a nonsectarian prayer, for example, citing God, rather than Christ.

The Defense Department, the main military chaplains association and a variety of ecumenical groups have spoken against the provision, saying that sectarian prayer would create division within the military.

"This provision could marginalize chaplains who, in exercising their conscience, generate discomfort at mandatory formations," the Pentagon said in a written statement. "Such erosion of unit cohesion is avoided by the military's present insistence on inclusive prayer at interfaith gatherings — something that the House legislation would operate against."

DOJ_NMG_0065337

The provision is passionately supported, however, by many House Republicans and evangelical Christian groups, like Focus on the Family, who say that refusing chaplains, especially evangelicals, the chance to pray in Jesus' name infringes on their religious liberty.

"What was a celebration of diversity is now a celebration of exclusion, because they don't want people to be offended except evangelical Christians, when our ordination vows call for us to pray a certain way," said Billy Baugham, a retired Army chaplain and executive director of the International Conference of Evangelical Chaplain Endorsers, a consortium of nine denominations that sponsor members of the clergy in military chaplaincy.

Staff members of the Senate and House Armed Services Committees have been trying to reconcile the differences between their versions of the bill for two weeks. A vote on the bill is scheduled for Tuesday, though that might be scuttled because of disagreements over the chaplain provision, Congressional staff members said.

In the last two years, the military has faced several disputes over religion. In 2004, some staff members, alumni and cadets at the Air Force Academy accused evangelical Christians in leadership posts of aggressive proselytizing and discrimination. A group of evangelical chaplains have filed a class-action suit against the Navy saying they were dismissed or denied promotions. Last week, the Navy court-martialed an evangelical chaplain, Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, for disobeying an order and wearing his uniform to a March protest before the White House.

Those disputes and now the fight over the provision stem in large part from changes in the composition of the armed forces and the chaplain corps that have tested religious tolerance, said the Rev. Herman Keizer Jr., chairman of the National Conference on Ministry to the Armed Forces, the largest chaplaincy organization and an opponent of the legislation.

More atheists and people from minority religions serve in the military now, compared with the Vietnam era, and more evangelical Christians do, too. Similarly, more evangelicals are in the chaplaincy than a generation ago, in part because the military lost favor with many mainline Christians during the Vietnam War, said Mr. Keizer, who served in Vietnam and retired in 2002 after 40 years in the Army.

Supporters and opponents of the provision do not think the Defense Authorization Act will founder on the dispute over the chaplaincy. But a compromise has not emerged.

Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia and chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the issue was so significant that perhaps it should be addressed in legislation separate from the Defense Authorization Act.

"Somehow chaplains have managed these issues and managed them very well over the years," Mr. Warner said. "I'm concerned about Congress darting in to select one or two sentences without hearing the full spectrum of views on this."

Representative Steve Israel, Democrat of New York, had asked that the wording of the provision remain, but that a clause be added that chaplains behave "with sensitivity, respect and tolerance" to service members of all faiths. That clause was voted down by the House Rules Committee along party lines, Mr. Israel said.

He said he had called for such language because of his concerns about discrimination and coercion by evangelical Christians. Mr. Jones and other supporters of the provision said such language was unnecessary.

"Sensitivity is only a word," Mr. Jones said. "You don't have to tell people of faith to be sensitive."

U.S. Has A Duty To End Illiteracy, Bush Says (NYSun)

By Matthew Chayes

The New York Sun, September 19, 2006

Part of America's duty in its effort to spread freedom around the world and make terrorism less attractive is to stamp out illiteracy, President Bush told a gathering of first ladies — including his wife — and education ministers at New York Public Library yesterday.

"One reason radicals are able to recruit young men, for example, to become suicide bombers, is because of hopelessness. One way to defeat hopelessness is through literacy, is to giving people the fantastic hope that comes by being able to read and realize dreams," the president said.

The Bush administration has persistently argued that the decision to invade Iraq and depose dictator Saddam Hussein in 2003 rested upon a desire to democratize the Middle East and stabilize the region. In their defense of the war, Mr. Bush and his political allies have often said that all people in the world have a right to freedom and democracy. The right to be able to read and write is a prerequisite to achieving the freedom enjoyed by Americans, the president said.

"We believe here in America in the universality of freedom. We don't believe freedom belongs only to the United States of America," Mr. Bush said, adding that, as literacy spreads, so will prosperity and harmony. "We also believe strongly that, as the world becomes more free, we'll see peace."

The president's comments came just hours after first lady Laura Bush, a former librarian and schoolteacher, announced a $1 million contribution by America to a United Nations project to promote literacy. She called on other countries similarly to invest in reading and writing education.

The audience included the president's mother, Barbara Bush, another prominent advocate of reading.

Opening the White House Conference on Global Literacy at the library, the first lady drew attention to her longtime aim of educating some of the estimated 771 million — 18% of the world's population — who can't read and write. Mrs. Bush noted that most of the world's illiterate are women. The first lady said that higher literacy rates will mean less poverty and more economic self-sufficiency. "We can help building a healthier, more prosperous and more hopeful world," she said.

Secretary of State Rice, who attended the conference with Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings, introduced Mrs. Bush. Ms. Rice, who was the provost of Stanford University before she became one of the president's top advisers, spoke from personal experience when she said that literacy had meant freedom for her own family.

"It is our hope to build societies where all individuals can achieve the full extent of their liberty," she said, explaining how her family's devotion to education and book learning transformed her family's life in Jim Crow, Ala.

Ney Resigns From 2 Committee Posts (AP-Y)

By David Hammer

AP, September 19, 2006

Rep. Bob Ney, who has agreed to plead guilty to federal corruption charges, stepped down from two House committee positions Monday but did not say whether he would leave Congress.

The Ohio Republican said in two letters to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., that he would immediately give up his positions as chairman of the Housing and Community Opportunity subcommittee, which oversees the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, and as head of the Franking Commission, which governs lawmakers' use of public money to express opinions in mailings.

Ohio Republican Party Chairman Bob Bennett called on Ney to resign Friday, soon after it was announced that Ney would plead guilty to making false statements and conspiracy to commit fraud, make other false statements and violate U.S. lobbying restrictions. The congressman is expected to plead guilty Oct. 13.

Ney has not participated in House floor votes since Sept. 12, House records show. The House returns to session Tuesday.

When asked if Ney was working Monday, his chief of staff, David Popp, said he could not comment on whether Ney would return to his elected duties before his term expires in January. Ney earlier dropped his re-election bid.

Ney's lawyer William Lawler declined to comment on the committee resignations or if the congressman had made any decisions about keeping or leaving his House seat. Last week, Lawler said Ney wasn't ready to resign and was seeking treatment for alcohol abuse.

Hastert was in Russia on Monday and not available for comment on whether he wants Ney to resign, spokesman Ron Bonjean said.

Ohio Lawmaker Who Took Illegal Gifts Rebuffs Calls To Resign (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 18 — Representative Bob Ney of Ohio, who agreed last week to plead guilty to federal corruption charges, has rebuffed demands that he resign, creating a dilemma for Republican strategists who want him off the public stage before he does any more harm to the party ahead of the November elections.

DOJ_NMG_0065339

In letters to the House Republican leadership on Monday, Mr. Ney, who has admitted accepting tens of thousands of dollars' worth of illegal gifts from lobbyists, said he would immediately step down from two House committees. But he made no mention of leaving Congress altogether.

Congressional rules do not require the expulsion of a member of the House or the Senate convicted on criminal charges, which means that unless his colleagues act to oust him or he resigns, Mr. Ney could continue to draw his $165,200-a-year-salary until his term ends next January.

Calls for his resignation have come from fellow Republicans, including the chairman of the Ohio state party, Robert T. Bennett, who said in a statement last week that Mr. Ney had "disgraced his office" and "should resign immediately and begin paying the price for his arrogance and greed."

Mr. Bennett suggested that if Mr. Ney refused to step down, it would play into the hands of Democrats who would offer "their predictable hue and cry about the culture of corruption in politics while they ignore the wrongdoers in their own party."

The Republican nominated to replace Mr. Ney in the House, State Senator Joy Padgett, has also urged him to step down. She was quoted by the Associated Press on Monday as saying, "I truly thought he would resign" last week and "I'm pretty sad that he didn't do the right thing."

Congressional officials said House Republican leaders were also urging Mr. Ney to resign, although they had not done so publicly — yet.

Democrats have seized on Mr. Ney's plea bargain, the result of a larger criminal investigation of Jack Abramoff, the former Republican lobbyist, in urging voters to end Republican control of Congress in the November elections.

Bill Burton, communications director for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said the guilty plea "shows how widespread the corruption is in Washington — it's time for new leadership and a new direction."

Asked whether Mr. Ney would resign in the wake of his plea agreement, one of his criminal defense lawyers, William E. Lawler, declined to comment on Monday. Mr. Lawler would also not comment on the whereabouts of Mr. Ney, who was reported by friends to have checked into an alcoholism-treatment center last week. He is scheduled to formally enter his guilty plea at a court hearing on Oct. 13.

In the meantime, Mr. Ney's office in Washington and his four district offices in Ohio remained open and staffed on Monday.

Mr. Ney's official House Web site, ney.house.gov, remained up and made no mention of his legal troubles, its home page focusing instead on his visit to the United States-Mexico border last month and his praise for border agents "enforcing our laws."

Mr. Ney would not be the first member of Congress to try to hold on to his seat after admitting to, or being convicted of, criminal charges. In 2002, it took the House four months to expel another Ohioan, James Traficant Jr., a Democrat, after his conviction in federal court in Cleveland of 10 counts of bribery, racketeering and other corruption; he was sentenced to eight years in prison.

In his plea agreement, Mr. Ney admitted that he had essentially sold his office to Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation and to a Cyprus-based businessman in exchange for a series of lavish gifts.

The gifts included overseas trips, the use of skyboxes at Washington-area sports arenas, meals, concert tickets and thousands of dollars' worth of gambling chips from London casinos; through winnings at the casinos in two visits to London in 2003, Mr. Ney brought home an estimated $50,000.

In a statement last week, he suggested that his crimes might be explained in part by his alcoholism.

Republican Congressional aides, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the politically awkward situation created by his guilty plea, speculated that Mr. Ney, 52, wanted to hold on to his House seat because he needed the paycheck. His recent financial disclosure statements suggest that Mr. Ney does not have a substantial portfolio of investments or other assets.

Despite his acknowledgment of corruption, Mr. Ney may still be able to look forward to a Congressional pension. As a result of the uproar over the lobbying scandals focused on Mr. Abramoff, House leaders proposed new rules this year to block pension benefits for former members convicted of a crime. But the new rules were never approved.

Ney Gives Up His Gavel (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor And Jackie Kucinich

DOJ_NMG_0065340

The Hill, September 19, 2006

Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) resigned his subcommittee chairmanship yesterday, days after agreeing to plead guilty to federal corruption charges, but the Ohio Republican has not stepped down from Congress despite admitting that he performed legislative favors in exchange for trips, meals and other lavish gifts.

Ney sent a letter to House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) yesterday announcing his resignation as chairman of the Financial Services' Subcommittee on Housing and Community Opportunity.

In addition, Ney, who chaired the House Administration Committee before Hastert asked him to step aside earlier this year, sent the Speaker a separate letter informing him that he would relinquish his position on that panel, which monitors the official mail members send from their congressional offices.

Ney does not address how long he will remain in Congress in either letter, nor does he voluntarily remove himself from either committee.

On Friday, the Justice Department announced that Ney had agreed to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy, which included a violation of the one-year lobbying ban on former staff, and one count of making false statements for, among other things, failing to properly document casino winnings during a 2003 trip to London.

Ney is the first lawmaker to plead guilty in the ongoing corruption probe of admitted felon Jack Abramoff, the once powerful lobbyist who maintained close ties to a number of prominent Republicans.

The Ohio Republican, who was known as the mayor of Capitol Hill for his work as chairman of the panel that oversees the Capitol complex's buildings, maintenance and operations, was once considered an up-and-comer. He had strong ties to former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), who was forced to resign his seat earlier this year amid the Abramoff scandal. Two former DeLay staffers and one former Ney aide have pleaded guilty to charges in the case.

The announcement of his plea agreement comes during the final stretch of what has been a difficult election cycle for Republicans in the House stemming, in part, from this illegal behavior.

Ney sent copies of both letters to Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and to the chairmen and ranking members of the Administration and Financial Services committees. In each letter, he thanked the chairmen and staff of both committees.

Hastert could not comment on either letter yesterday because he was returning from the G-8 Summit in St. Petersburg, Russia, his spokesman said. His chief of staff, Scott Palmer, and his chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, the Speaker's two top advisers on procedural matters, were traveling with him.

It was unclear who would assume the Financial Services subcommittee chairmanship Ney is leaving behind. Republicans may be forced to reach deep within the panel for a successor. Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) is the vice chairman of the panel, but the California lawmaker has been scrutinized for his own close ties to a land developer.

Neither Ney nor his lawyers have said whether the six-term lawmaker would resign officially from the House before his scheduled appearance in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia on Oct. 13 before Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle, who has presided over other pleas in this investigation.

William Lawler, an attorney for Vinson & Elkins LLP who is representing Ney, said it was up to the congressman to decide whether he would resign beforehand. On Sunday, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), who earlier this year convinced Ney to withdraw his bid for reelection, made similar remarks to an interviewer on Fox News.

The announcement comes as congressional Republicans try to finish their regular session on a high note with a series of votes to beef up funding for security along the southern border with Mexico and controversial bills to create a legal framework to try suspected terrorists and to monitor their phone calls abroad.

Congressional Democrats remained largely silent over the weekend about Ney's plea.

Joy Padgett, the Republican running to replace him, yesterday called on Ney to resign immediately from Congress, and Republican Reps. Rick Renzi (Ariz.) and Heather Wilson (N.M.) immediately announced that they would donate campaign contributions they received from Ney to charity.

"I am deeply disappointed by today's revelations surrounding Mr. Ney and will donate any contributions I received from him to charity," Renzi said on Friday.

The New Mexico Democratic Party used the occasion of Wilson's donation to condemn her connections to GOP leaders.

"Heather Wilson seems forced to disavow a lot of corrupt Republican contributions lately," said John Wertheim, the state's party chairman.

A lobbying-law overhaul that would strip Ney of his pension remains stalled in negotiations between the House and Senate. In a press release from May, Ney actually trumpeted his own efforts to keep that provision in the broad reform bill.

Official House rules dictate that a "member, delegate or resident commissioner" who has been convicted of a crime that has a sentence of two years or more in prison "should refrain from participation in the business of each committee which he is a member."

The rules further encourage those members not to vote before their committees or the whole House "unless or until judicial or executive proceedings results in reinstatement of the presumption of his innocence" or the member is reelected after a conviction.

If Ney does not resign from the House, members can vote to expel him with a two-thirds majority, but that process can be lengthy.

If a majority of the ethics committee votes to find the member in violation of House rules, any member can bring the question to the House floor for a full vote of the chamber.

New Pay System Doesn't Affect Performance But Hinders Morale, Survey Finds (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Federal executives find that a new pay-for-performance system has had little effect on their performance, but it has caused morale problems, according to a survey released yesterday.

The new pay system for the Senior Executive Service, a group of about 6,000 career professionals who serve as the government's top day-to-day managers, was put into place in January 2004 and has been touted as a possible model for the rest of the federal workforce. But the executives in the survey reported seeing little connection between their job ratings and their rewards.

Twenty percent of the executives who received a top job rating last year said they received no pay increase, and 82 percent said they had been given more responsibilities but had not received a raise.

"Something has been lost in translation as the system has been implemented," said Carol A. Bonosaro , president of the Senior Executives Association, which sponsored the survey.

In a statement, Linda M. Springer , director of the Office of Personnel Management, said that the OPM plans to study the survey results and will work "to address any problems that exist in the execution of the new system."

Congress set up the new pay system to address complaints that too many career executives were up against salary caps and to give job performance a greater role in determining executive compensation.

The previous pay system, which had six pay levels, was abolished, and agencies were given discretion to set executive salaries in broad ranges. Under the new system, federal executives may be paid up to $165,200 annually, but they are no longer guaranteed annual raises and are no longer entitled to receive locality pay adjustments that go to most other white-collar federal workers.

Parts of the survey showed that executives support the new system: Ninety-six percent of the respondents said they should be held accountable for helping their agency achieve its goals, and 69 percent think it is possible to establish measurable performance standards for their job.

But 53 percent said their agencies rated executives to meet a quota or to produce fewer high ratings. Asked if their ratings were fair and accurate, 17 percent said yes; 27 percent said yes, to a limited degree; and 33 percent said no.

Asked about the effectiveness of the new system, 86 percent said it had not affected their job performance, and 83 percent said they had not seen a change in the performance of their peers.

DOJ_NMG_0065342

As for morale, 47 percent reported a "negative change," 40 percent saw no change in morale, and 13 percent said morale had improved because of the new pay system. Sixteen percent said the new system has led them to accelerate their plans to retire.

The survey was conducted on a voluntary basis over the Internet between April 28 and July 3 and received 849 completed responses. Avue Technologies Corp., a human resource consulting and technology firm, helped the association administer the survey.

Bonosaro and Linda Brooks Rix , co-chief executive of Avue, said the survey respondents were mostly representative of the federal executive corps, though they were a little older and had served longer. About half the respondents were not members of the Senior Executives Association, which was founded in 1980 to represent the interests of top career executives in government. The survey included a safeguard against participation by non-executives.

Bonosaro said she and other association officials plan to brief congressional aides and to work with the Bush administration on improving the pay system. The association's recommendations, she said, include adjusting executive pay according to local market conditions each year and allowing executives to count their bonuses toward retirement.New NARFE President

Margaret L. Baptiste of Mount Pleasant, S.C., has been elected president of the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association. She is the first woman and the first spouse of a federal retiree to hold the position.

Baptiste, who announced her candidacy last week at NARFE's 29th biennial convention in Albuquerque, won 52.2 percent of the vote. She defeated Dan C. Galvan of Texas and Charles W. Carter of Colorado. She succeeds Charles L. Fallis of Virginia and will take office Nov. 1.

Hang Those Earmarks Out in the Sunshine

Your Sept. 13 editorial "Earmark Showdown" correctly points out that Sen. Tom Coburn's (R., Okla.) bill requiring the dollar amounts and recipients of all grants and earmarked contracts be placed in a publicly accessible database is an important step toward transparency. It is indeed the least that Congress should do.

On Jan. 6, 2000, I wrote to President Bill Clinton and asked him to issue an Executive Order setting procedures for every agency of the federal government to place its contracts online.

On Feb. 8, 2000, President Clinton wrote back saying he had forwarded this request to OMB's Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs for review.

On Sept. 10, 2001, I wrote to Mitchell E. Daniels, Jr., then the director of the Office of Management and Budget, urging him to give taxpayers access to the full text of government contracts. On June 6, 2003, as a result of Mr. Daniels's drive on this issue, a Federal Register Notice was issued asking for public comments on a pilot project to put contracts online. His successors at OMB have not followed up.

We are moving in the right direction with Sen. Coburn's legislation, but as we all know the "devil is in the details." Requiring federal agencies and departments to post online the full text of all federal contracts, as well as task orders worth $1 million or more, would be a wonderful next step. The computer age should make it possible to efficiently allow for certain redactions related to legitimate concerns about business confidentiality and national security in contracts before they are posted online in a publicly available database managed by the General Services Administration.

Already, a large coalition from across the political spectrum has been pushing for increased transparency in government. Increased transparency regarding government contracting is good for a more competitive procurement process, the taxpayer and our democracy.

Contracting out what the federal government does and contracting to obtain what government needs is a large part of our economy. The former includes letting corporations perform more military and intelligence functions; while the latter has included buying supplies like fuel, paper, food, medicines and vehicles. Taken together, they amount to spending trillions of dollars over the past decade -- our tax dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0065343

Putting the full text of these contracts online will give taxpayers both savings and higher quality performances, let the media focus more incisively on this vast area of government disbursements to inform the wider public, encourage constructive comments and alarms from the citizenry, and stimulate legal and economic research by scholars interested in structural topics related to government procurement, transfers, subsidies and giveaways.

Needless Furor Harms Outstanding Psychiatrist

The furor arising from your article about the absence of a potential conflict of information statement in a scientific paper on vagal nerve stimulation therapy for depression ("Medical Journal Editor Nemeroff Steps Down Over Undisclosed Ties," Aug. 28) has potentially harmed the fields of medicine and psychiatry.

Dr. Nemeroff was the lead author of the article in question, and all of the required individual conflicts were submitted to the journal, of which he was the editor, but they weren't included due to a regrettable oversight at the level of administrative publication. Thus, the concern about this is much overdone, as Dr. Nemeroff has reported his collaboration with the maker of vagal nerve stimulators in numerous other publications, as well as public and academic presentations. Dr. Nemeroff's decision not to pursue another appointment as editor of Neuropsychopharmacology is highly unfortunate, as this journal is more focused on the biological mechanisms of psychiatric diseases and their treatments than any other, and Dr. Nemeroff is extremely well-qualified to lead it.

Due to Dr. Nemeroff's extremely productive and successful career as a leader in academic psychiatry, he and others like him are asked to be on the boards of many pharmaceutical firms specializing in central nervous system agents. Through such collaborations, the development and testing of novel treatments are greatly enhanced and the safety of research subjects strengthened. Yes, these companies must make profits, but they also share with researchers a desire to find scientific truth, which usually isn't as clear-cut as many believe. The overwhelming majority of academic researchers are proud of their independence and are dedicated to advancing their fields through quality research. At a time of diminishing funding, does it not make sense for industry-sponsored support to provide a viable alternative, especially if available in a no-strings-attached way with sufficient academic research oversight?

We are academic psychiatrists and researchers who are colleagues of Charles Nemeroff, and we have the utmost respect for his science and ethics. Some of us receive research support from pharmaceutical companies, some from federal agencies, some from both and some from neither. All of us want the best for the fields of science, medicine and psychiatry in their endeavors to better humanity.

Business Ethics Professor's Weak Grasp of Capitalism

As an alumnus of Notre Dame's MBA program, I am genuinely appalled by the Notre Dame business ethics professor's comments calling the dramatic increase in hotel rates during football weekends "an act of moral abdication," especially when he engages in precisely the same behavior with his own home ("Notre Dame Football Introduces Its Fans to Inflationary Spiral," page one, Sept. 7). After all, since he has a second home in Chicago, the marginal cost of letting others stay at his house in South Bend is extremely low relative to what he is charging them.

"An act of moral abdication" may possibly occur when a company temporarily increases its prices during a catastrophe, but the article is talking about a football game, hardly a calamity (unless Notre Dame loses, of course).

I wonder if the professor's notion of moral abdication also applies to hotels charging more on weekends than on weeknights in Las Vegas or more during the summer than during the winter at the New Jersey shore, or airline pricing.

The notion of moral abdication implies that companies should use some basis other than the fundamental, elementary law of supply and demand to set prices, which smacks of something other than free-market capitalism. Since they are expected to maximize a company's value, business executives would do well to disregard the professor's admonishment, especially in the case of Notre Dame football weekends.

Ivory Tower Residents Ignore Corporate Reality

Your article "Majoring in IBM: Dissatisfied With Graduates, Companies Design and Fund Curricula at Universities" (Personal Journal, Sept. 12) demonstrates the disconnect between higher education and the realities of job seekers. The concern, expressed by New America Foundation fellow Jennifer Washburn, that a corporate influence on education "is a breach of academic integrity" illustrates the problem.

As an MBA student at Purdue University I have seen the detachment between academia and the rest of the world. Most students don't aspire to be a professor. Rather, they attend universities to land corporate jobs. Universities shouldn't be ivory towers, isolated from the rest of society, producing students who are unprepared for the realities they are soon to face.

I applaud IBM and other corporations for taking the initiative. Corporate involvement in education is a must, and university administrators should take an example from Marketing 101 and look at the needs of their consumers, the students.

Transparently Inadequate (WP)

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

ONE AMAZING thing about the House passage of "earmark reform" last week was how much labor it took to bring forth this tiny mouse of change. A more amazing thing is that the Senate may not bestir itself to change its rules even that much -- though it has already voted to require such disclosure as part of the lobbying reform bill now mired in a separate disagreement with the House. All this in a year when challengers on the left and right campaign against the "bridge to nowhere" mentality of free-spending lawmakers; when lawmakers themselves acknowledge that the practice of setting aside money for pet projects is out of control; and when a congressman is serving time for taking bribes in exchange for earmarks.

How modest -- pathetic would be a more apt term -- is the House change? Henceforth, members will be required to disclose their sponsorship of certain earmarks, and by no means all of them. Beyond this limited disclosure: nothing. No provision for an up-or-down vote on such spending. No prohibition on earmarks to benefit lawmakers' relatives. No limitation on last-minute additions that offer no opportunity for scrutiny or debate.

Disclosure is useful but insufficient. Sponsors of some of the most egregious earmarks have been eager to have their names attached to the pork-barrel spending. Remember "Don Young's Way"? This $230 million earmark for a bridge in Anchorage was part of a transportation spending bill that the Alaska Republican, who chairs the House transportation committee, bragged was "stuffed like a turkey." Somehow, we doubt that forcing Mr. Young to disclose his sponsorship of Don Young's Way would have done much to persuade him to spend taxpayer dollars any more wisely.

This kind of transparency ought to be a no-brainer minimum requirement. But, in a reflection of the degree to which lawmakers have become addicted to earmarking, the change almost failed to win passage because Republican appropriators revolted against what they viewed, with justification, as unequal treatment: While earmarked funding would be covered, the sponsors of special-interest tax breaks would have to be listed only if the break was limited to a single beneficiary. Of course the definition should be broader than that.

But the fundamental points are these: First, no one should be fooled into thinking that the House's minor, loophole-ridden change is anywhere near enough. And no one should tolerate the Senate's failing to live up to even the low standard set by the other body.

Bush's Limited-time Engagement Yields Laughs (HILL)

By Emily Heil

The Hill, September 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065345

So last week, the president came to the Hill to convince lawmakers to approve his legislation allowing interrogation of detainees. Hilarity ensued.

We're sure there was plenty of serious policy talk. But anytime the seldom-seen-on-the-Hill president ventures into the Capitol, there's bound to be some funny encounters.

On the way to a meeting of Republican members, an entourage that included the president, the vice-president, Karl Rove, and other top West Wingers were walking through the Capitol basement, only to be joined by a very unexpected guest. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and her gang of staffers just happened to be entering the hallway behind the executive-branch types.

Pelosi seemed a bit surprised to find herself practically steps away from Rove, but took it all in stride.

"We're not part of this party," she joked to the gaggle of reporters staked out nearby.

Just in case they were confused on that point.

Then, during a closed-door meeting of Republicans, there were some cracks made about the Ohio State University's Buckeyes defeat of Bush's home-state Texas Longhorns the previous weekend. Republicans in the Ohio delegation presented Bush with an OSU flag, according to our spies. And when fellow Texan Rep. Louie Gohmert (R-Texas) stood up to ask Bush a question, he told the president that he didn't shed a tear when the Longhorns lost. Gohmert cheers for the Aggies as a graduate of Texas A&M, one of UT's biggest rivals.

Bush, to plenty of good-natured snickers from the audience, then asked the freshman Republican whether his remarks were on the record, since they might prevent the former judge from running statewide.

Yes, he just flew in from 1600 Pennsylvania, and boy, are his arms tired …

Spoiler alert: staffer from 'Hill' show weds

For those of you who like to read the last page of a book first, here's a spoiler. On the Sundance Channel's series "The Hill," which chronicles the everyday work lives of staffers for Rep. Robert Wexler (D-Fla.), Wexler's foreign policy adviser Haley Soifer ditches her Republican boyfriend for a Democratic one.

Though he's never identified by full name on screen, Hill hands will recognize the new, blue paramour as Andrew Kauders, the former executive director of the House Democratic Caucus and aide to Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) who is now a principal with government-relations firm PodestaMattoon.

The four of six filmed episodes that have aired so far have delved into Kauder and Soifer's debate over whether they should move in together.

Unlike so many other reality-TV couples (i.e., Whitney and Bobby, and nearly every couple from the Bachelor), the two are now blissfully married.

They tied the knot Aug. 19 in Lansing, Michigan.

Another update: Soifer has left Wexler's office to pursue a master's degree at Johns Hopkins in foreign policy with an emphasis in the Middle East. Soifer says she misses life on the Hill, particularly her old colleagues in Wexler's office. But now she's happily busy with subjects such as Arabic language and economics, which she says she wouldn't have been able to pick up on the job.

Still, Soifer says she'd like to come back to the Hill, work for a campaign, or maybe in the executive branch someday.

"There's something very addictive about the Hill," she says.

Haliburton film, hearings get cross-promotion

Robert Greenwald, the maker of scathing documentaries who has previously turned his yellow lens on favorite Democratic targets like Tom DeLay and Wal-Mart, has found another subject. And it's (drum roll, please) Halliburton!

Greenwald, whose credits include Wal-Mart: the High Cost of Low Price and The Big Buy: Tom DeLay's Stolen Congress, held a press conference on Monday in the Senate Dirksen building to promote his new film, Iraq for Sale: The War Profiteers. The film delves into the Pentagon's use of contractors in Iraq, and we're guessing the depiction isn't a flattering one.

Sen. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.), whose Democratic Policy Committee is coincidentally holding hearings on that very same topic (imagine that!) joined Greenwald at the press conference. And though the director hailed Dorgan as a hero for shedding light on contractor improprieties in Iraq, Dorgan himself emphasized he was not "promoting" the film but rather the idea that "there needs to be accountability" in Iraq. Dorgan called on GOP colleagues to convene hearings on the matter.

The American people "expect things to be done right," Dorgan said.

Ned Lamont's shifting "part"-isan politics

Connecticut Senate candidate Ned Lamont rode his liberal bona fides to a victory in the Democratic primary over Sen. Joe Leiberman. But now is Lamont moving to the right?

It seems, at least, that his hair is making a decidedly rightward march. Make that his part, specifically. The first pictures that pop up on Lamont' s campaign website show the telegenic candidate with a part that sits on the right side of his tousled 'do.

But when you look at other photos of Lamont posted on the site, it seems that he is and always has been a left parter. Part-switchers (not unlike party-switchers) particularly among men, are few and far between.

But a Lamont source says it's all a big misunderstanding. The pictures featuring the right-side part are just from flipped negatives, adjusted to get the proper angle for their spots on the website's front page.

Pun gives press release relief

We get mountains of press releases, some straightforward, others painfully full of exclamation points and purple prose. We're offering a special and occasional award for pun-iness that makes us laugh/groan to this missive sent from a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee.

"Panel to Eye Contact Lens Sale," the release is headlined.

To those who say puns are the lowest form of humor, we say, lighten up.

Frist and wife heart Romanian ambassador

Who knew? He's huge in Romanian circles. At Romanian Ambassador Sorin Ducaru's farewell fete last Wednesday, none other than Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and his wife Karyn became the life of the party.

Frist clearly did not want to steal the ambassador's thunder, but after a heartfelt speech wishing Ducaru well, he was surrounded by guests who wanted to shake his hand.

The Frists did not appear to be new to the Romanian Embassy circle. Mrs. Frist remarked that Romania has had some wonderful ambassadors. She was referring to Mircea Geoana, Ducaru's photogenic predecessor, and of course Ducaru himself, who was pivotal in promoting Romania during its ascension to NATO two years ago.

Loving Jenna (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, September 19, 2006

The co-writer and producer of the zany award-winning satire “The Miss Education of Jenna Bush” is just a tad obsessed with his character. His fantasy is to have the real first daughter fly to Los Angeles this week to see the one-woman play named for her before she settles into her new gig teaching English in Latin America.

“We want the real Jenna to see the fictionalized one and let us know how off-base we are or how off-target,” the producer, Winston Beigel, said. “That’s what’s driving us nuts: We really want someone to tap her on the shoulder, tell her to please get on Air Force One, come to Los Angeles and see this show about you.”

The “we” is Beigel and actress Melissa Rauch, who portrays Jenna as a down-to-earth but spoiled party girl transitioning into adulthood. The play, which won the Outstanding Solo Show award at last year’s New York International Fringe Festival, runs Sept. 27-30 in L.A.’s Cornet Theater.

Beigel and Rauch, ramping up the publicity, are trying to solicit help from their friends in the media to reach the first twins, who they’re certain would love them just as much as they love the twins they parody.

“Melissa and I really do feel very close to Jenna somehow,” Beigel told HOH. “Maybe that’s just what happens when you spend a lot of time with a fictionalized version of a real person, I’m not sure — but we’re convinced, if faced with the real thing — we’d all end up as friends. Can you imagine, grabbing some lobster and margaritas with Jenna and Babs in Kennebunkport, just ‘cause? Now that would be awesome!”

DOJ_NMG_0065348

And Beigel said he believes the real Jenna would like the show, which New York Magazine called "riotously funny" and the Dallas Morning News described as "a rather touching story about a young woman on the verge of the rest of her life."

Beigel says the play should be coming to a theater in Washington, D.C., sometime next year for Washingtonians' last chance to "savor Jenna."

Fore, Jack!!! Life's not all bad for Jack Abramoff. The corrupt former lobbyist, who is awaiting sentencing for his role in the lobbying scandal of the century, enjoyed playing golf Sunday at Woodmore Country Club, where he is a member.

No clue who he played with.

DeLay Papers. What were all those boxes marked "Tom DeLay" doing lining the wall in the subbasement of the Rayburn House Office Building on Monday? On their way to the archivist, perhaps?

A Roll Call photographer counted about 150 boxes, some of which were open, exposing lots of photographs, briefing books and official documents. Some boxes were marked "videos," which made us wonder whether, like the Nixon tapes, we'll one day find out more about this once-powerful and complex man known as the Hammer.

All-Star Game — Sort of. Tonight, the best of the House Softball League and the Senate Softball League will square off at 7:30 p.m. in a mano-a-mano fight for king-of-the-Hill bragging rights. But what we don't get is, how can you have a House-vs.-Senate showdown and not have teams that represent, well, the House and the Senate?

It appears that, at least for this season, the House wasn't strong enough to serve in its own league: House champion Potomac Fever represents The Washington Center for Internships and Academic Seminars.

At least the Senate winner, The RBIs of Texas, is made up of staffers from Texas Senate offices. Though the team also includes players from "Denny's Grand Slam," the team out of Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) office.

RBI's captain Bill Christian is trying to rally Texas Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R) and John Cornyn (R) to attend tonight's game — though even he admits it might be a long shot.

The Fever will be playing with a depleted roster. In the last inning of Saturday's House tournament, extra hitter Rob Stacy separated his shoulder sliding into home plate and was sent to the hospital. "His shoulder's back in place, they popped it back into the joint," Fever captain Robert Walter said. "He's a little groggy on morphine right now."

Even without Mr. Morphine Drip playing, Walker predicts, "We're going to give them a good fight, it's probably going to be a close game."

Get Real About Budgeting Before It's Too Late (RC)

By Rep. Jim Cooper

Roll Call, September 19, 2006

Budget debates on Capitol Hill will never be the same, now that we have proof that presidential budgets have failed us, not because of their spending priorities but because of bad accounting. The Bush administration keeps two sets of books but shows Congress only one of them.

Don't take my word for it. Read "The Financial Report of the United States," issued by the U.S. Treasury every year but suppressed by the White House. Never heard of it? You are in good company. David Broder of The Washington Post called it one of the most secretive documents in Washington, D.C. It is issued just before Christmas without a press release, and with a print run of 2,100 copies. That's why I persuaded a publisher to release the "Financial Report" in every bookstore in America, just in time for the fall campaigns.

If you use proper accounting, federal budget deficits are at least two, and probably 10, times larger than President Bush will admit. Remember President Bush's press conference last month claiming that his deficits are smaller than expected? He simply wasn't counting veterans' benefits, civil service retirement, Social Security or Medicare. We can't pretend that we care about those benefits if we don't count them.

How large is the deficit? Was the 2005 deficit $318 billion as the president admits, or $760 billion, or even $3.3 trillion? Is it 2.6 percent of gross domestic product, 6.2 percent or 26 percent? History will not be kind to governments that cannot put the decimal point in the right place.

DOJ_NMG_0065349

Congress is clueless on this issue. More Members were briefed on the ultra-secret National Security Agency wiretapping than on this report. The Budget committees ignore it. Most Members have no idea that Congress and the White House have been using old, outmoded bookkeeping while the White House keeps the real numbers hidden.

The president himself is in the dark. I recently asked the new director of the Office of Management and Budget, Rob Portman, to tell the president about the report. I told him that he couldn't be fired for delivering bad news on his first day on the job. But Director Portman apparently chickened out. The president has given no indication that he is aware of the Treasury Department numbers. As the first MBA president in history, Mr. Bush has a particular obligation to use modern accounting.

Congress also has ignored one of the most important news events of the summer. For the first time in history, the White House may be forced to tell the truth about Social Security and Medicare. The Federal Accounting Standards Advisory Board voted 6-4 to include Social Security and Medicare obligations as liabilities on our national balance sheet. Incredibly, we elected officials have been promising the benefits without bothering to budget for them. The FASAB vote will change that.

Fiscal problems such as these are literally destroying America's credit. Standard & Poor's, the nation's leading credit analyst, is projecting that the United States will lose its AAA bond rating by 2012 and fall to junk bond status by 2025. S&P obviously sees larger deficits than President Bush does.

Do you trust Standard & Poor's, or Bush and Cheney, on this issue?

How could Washington be so confused? Just the word "accounting" can make people's eyes glaze over, but, as they say in business, "If you can't measure it, you can't manage it." Today Congress cannot accurately measure its debts or manage its deficits. We cannot even monitor the use of the national credit card because our accounting methods are so primitive. No large business in America or nonprofit is allowed to rely on our method of accounting. We've literally made it illegal for everyone else.

The first plank of the Republican "Contract with America" demanded that Congress live by the laws it passed for the rest of the nation. Surprise! We've been exempting ourselves from the most important one of all: telling the truth about our own budget problems.

Meanwhile, the coming debt crisis is best described by Peter Fisher, a former Bush Treasury official: "Think of the federal government as a giant insurance company (with a sideline business in defense and homeland security) which only does its accounting on a cash basis. ... An insurance company with cash accounting is not an insurance company. It is an accident waiting to happen."

An accident waiting to happen! America deserves better than that.

Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.) wrote the foreword in "The Financial Report of the United States," published by Nelson Current.

Your Medical History, To Go (opinion) (NYT)

By David J. Brailer

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

IT is obvious to any patient that most of his health information is on paper. Hurricane Katrina evacuees learned this when they arrived in shelters where their medical histories had to be manually — and often incompletely — reconstructed. Paper histories might eventually get where they are needed, but too late to be useful.

As the government's first national coordinator for health information technology, I began our nation's effort to convert health care from paper charts to electronic health records. America's leading doctors and hospitals have been using electronic records to reduce deaths from mistakes, injuries from prescribing errors and waste from unnecessary treatments. Steps are now under way to bring these lifesaving tools to every hospital and doctor's office in the United States. And consumers are even exploring personal health records to view their own health information and shape treatments in ways they couldn't before.

But Congress is considering a bill that would make it harder to allow your information to follow you throughout your health care treatment.

The key to digital medicine is portability. Imagine arriving at an emergency room, swiping a security card and having your medical records appear instantly. Health information portability also allows dissatisfied consumers to more easily switch doctors, hospitals or health plans, intensifying the competition to provide good quality care.

DOJ_NMG_0065350

Moving from paper to digital medicine is costly — more than $100 billion for the nation by some estimates. Only the very largest doctors' practices can afford electronic health records. This is why the federal government recently published rules allowing hospitals and others to donate electronic health records to doctors. There is one critical requirement, however: the information must be standardized and portable. These rules help doctors improve care, and at the same time push health information portability into the mainstream.

None of us would want to be treated any place where health information is proprietary and shared only in order to advance business interests. Think what it would be like to be in an emergency room where a doctor can't make lifesaving decisions because your health information is at a competing hospital. Proprietary health information impairs delivery of good care and deepens barriers to switching doctors, hospitals or health plans. Compared to this, keeping your phone number when you switch cellular carriers is a vanity.

The House and the Senate have passed separate bills that seek to encourage electronic health records. They agree on many things, like codifying into statute the health information technology office that I started. They disagree on the most important issue, however: whether portability should be a condition for electronic health record donations. The Senate version links portability to donations, whereas the House version does not.

Opponents of the House bill argue that it is too early to set standards for portability, that portability will slow adoption of electronic health records or that electronic health record donations should be prohibited altogether. These points are valid and worth consideration, but they miss the fundamental and overarching issue that Congress must confront as it tries to reconcile the competing versions of the bill: opposition to portable health information is, by definition, support for proprietary health information. As the era of digital medicine begins, we have one chance to get it right, and that means making portable health information our priority.

Congress should pass a health information technology bill, but it should include the existing federal rules for portable health information technology donations. In no place else does medicine's principal adage "first do no harm" apply more than to the action that Congress is about to take.

U.S. Current-Account Gap Widens (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. reported that the deficit in its current account, the broadest measure of trade, widened further in the second quarter -- underscoring concerns about economic imbalances voiced by global finance ministers this past weekend.

Finance officials have long warned that the dimensions of U.S. borrowing from abroad -- reflected in the current-account figures -- threaten the stability of the world economy. The current account measures not just trade in goods and services, but also some financial flows; the deficit effectively amounts to how much the nation borrows abroad to finance U.S. consumers' appetite for imported goods and services.

Yesterday, the Commerce Department said that the U.S. current-account gap widened by $5.21 billion to $218.41 billion in the second quarter. The wider deficit was due in large measure to soaring global oil prices, which raised the U.S. bill for imported petroleum. The deficit remained 6.6% of the U.S. economy, the Commerce Department said, a large slice of the U.S. economy.

Critics say huge current-account deficits, which approached $800 billion last year, can't be sustained forever and warn there may be a heavy price to pay -- in the form of higher interest rates and falling stock values -- if foreign investors ever decide to pull back.

Speaking this weekend in Singapore, where finance ministers of leading industrialized nations were gathered, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson suggested that fixing broader global imbalances is a "shared responsibility" that will require reductions in the U.S. budget deficit and more growth by Europe and Japan, in addition to "currency flexibility" by China. Critics say Beijing has kept the yuan's value artificially low as part of a policy that helped China run a big trade surplus with the U.S. and amass a stockpile of U.S. financial assets.

Harvard University Professor Kenneth Rogoff suggested a big move by China to lift the value of the yuan would stimulate needed currency adjustments throughout Asia. That would trim the U.S. current account modestly, he said, but, more important, it would lessen the "the risk of a fast unwinding" of global imbalances over the long term.

For now, though, expectations are low that Mr. Paulson, who travels to Beijing this week, can win any changes in China policy. And after yesterday's report, analysts suggest there is no immediate current-account crisis on the horizon. Nouriel Roubini, chairman of Roubini Global Economics, which publishes the RGE Monitor, said China and other emerging economies will likely continue to be able to finance the U.S. current account "smoothly for another year," with only modest increases in global long-term interest rates and little depreciation in the dollar, among other things.

The U.S. current-account deficit in the April-to-June quarter was the second-highest on record, pushed up by increased imports of goods, especially oil and petroleum products, as well a $1.63 billion increase in the deficit on investment income, the Commerce Department said. It was the third consecutive quarter the U.S. reported a widening in the deficit on such income.

Notably, net foreign purchases of U.S. private securities totaled $121.56 billion for the second quarter, down from $186.01 billion in the previous quarter. At the same time, foreign direct investment in the U.S. -- which covers hard assets such as manufacturing plants -- increased $48.41 billion, compared with an increase of $45.27 billion in the first quarter.

Separately, the Treasury Department reported net foreign purchases of $32.9 billion in July, down from $75.1 billion in June. During the month, foreign investors purchased $54.5 billion in U.S. securities. Of that total, $31.8 billion in purchases were made by private investors, down from $82.4 billion the previous month. Meanwhile, U.S. investors spent $21.6 billion on securities issued abroad.

Prices At The Pump Keep Tumbling (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, September 19, 2006

Gasoline prices continue to tumble briskly, dropping Monday to a U.S. average of less than $2.50 a gallon for the first time since March.

Service stations even are beginning old-fashioned gas wars to avoid losing customers to price-cutting rivals.

“Traders were racing to see how high they could take it. Now, retailers are racing to see how low. It's crazy,” says Mike O'Connor, president of the Virginia Petroleum, Convenience and Grocery Association.

A Wawa station in Gainesville, just off Interstate 66 in Northern Virginia, dropped to $1.999 Sunday, prompting competing 7-Eleven stations to match. That triggered lines and drained at least one station's tanks.

“We never have been that busy on a Sunday. I was supposed to leave at 5, but I stayed until 8,” says Faisal Haq, assistant manager of a 7-Eleven about a quarter-mile from the Wawa. “We had about 600 customers. Other Sundays, maybe 300. We ran out of gas sometime after 7 p.m.,” he says.

In Virginia Beach, half a dozen stations in one area that sell more-profitable items inside were selling gas for $1.999 Monday, to “get people onto the lot to make money off cigarettes, coffee, sandwiches. We haven't seen this kind of marketing in a while,” says O'Connor.

Terrible's, a convenience store near Interstate 35 at Osceola, Iowa, was at $1.969 over the weekend to attract business to the affiliated casino next door. “Our intent is to be the cheapest fuel in our immediate area,” manager Di Boone says.

The U.S. Energy Information Administration reported Monday that the national average for regular grade is $2.497 a gallon, down 12.1 cents in a week. Travel organization AAA reported a U.S. average Monday of $2.495, down 1.6 cents overnight.

Last time gasoline was less than $2.50 was March 27 in EIA's survey, March 19 in AAA's.

A hefty 42% of Americans polled over the weekend said they think fuel prices are being manipulated by the Bush administration to help Republicans in an election year. The USA TODAY/Gallup Poll has a margin of error of 3 percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0065352

Petroleum analysts say the reasons are less Machiavellian: Supplies are above average, partly because summer's high prices attracted record imports. Hurricanes haven't knocked out Gulf of Mexico production. U.S. regulations permit a cheaper-to-make fuel blend in fall and winter.

"Without a shadow of a doubt, there is not any manipulation, and it has nothing to do with the approaching election," says Peter Beutel, head of energy-price consultant Cameron Hanover. The petroleum market is "too big a market to manipulate. The price just … could not sustain itself."

Gas Price Decline May Spur Inflation (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — The recent sharp decline in gasoline prices may help consumers. But it also may stoke inflationary fires, perhaps forcing the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates again later this year, some economists, such as those at Merrill Lynch and the Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi, say.

The argument: If consumers spend the cash in their wallets left over from filling their gas tanks, the economy may speed up and businesses will have greater power to raise prices. That could lead to higher inflation — not lower, as some may expect — and renewed action from the Fed.

"It's going to put a lot of money back into consumers' pockets, money they can spend in the shops and the malls," Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi chief financial economist Christopher Rupkey says. "The inflation pressures will intensify."

But Wachovia economist Jason Schenker says the drop in gasoline prices will have little impact on consumers because it is coming after the busy summer driving season. With winter approaching, heating costs are more important now, and the outlook for those are unclear, he says.

NO CHANGE LIKELY: Rates not expected to go up this week

Federal Reserve policymakers are widely expected to leave their target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs across the economy, unchanged when they meet Wednesday.

After raising rates 17 times from June 2004 to June 2006, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues last month voted to leave rates unchanged. Although inflation measures have been elevated recently, Bernanke and others have argued that slowing growth should relieve price pressures.

But an energy price decline may pump up the economy in the months ahead, warns Rupkey and others. Rupkey says the Fed may raise rates as early as October.

In large part because of a steep drop in oil costs, gasoline prices have fallen more than 15% in the last month.

"The Fed should take notice," Merrill Lynch chief investment strategist Richard Bernstein said in a recent research note to clients. "The rationale for pausing ... was that economic growth was weakening. The fall in energy prices and the equity markets' (positive) reactions suggest that rationale is now less appropriate."

Higher energy prices can lower economic growth by forcing consumers to spend less money in the broad economy because they are forced to pay more on energy. They can also lead to higher inflation if businesses pass along added costs to consumers.

While the higher prices seen earlier this year led to lower economic growth, it is still unclear how big of an impact they had on inflation.

Lehman Bros. senior economist Drew Matus says the energy price retreat should cut expectations that the Fed may soon cut rates.

"The market is expecting a Fed rate cut in early 2007. We think that's a little aggressive," he says.

Fresh Delay For BP Field Drives Oil Higher (FT)

By Sheila Mcnulty

Financial Times, September 19, 2006

BP was hit by yet another setback on Monday when the company was forced to announce that production at its showcase Thunder Horse oil and gas field will not start until mid-2008,18 months later than planned.

DOJ_NMG_0065353

News of the delay, caused by problems with the project's subsea infrastructure, caused oil prices to jump, ending the decline of recent weeks.

In New York, crude oil for October delivery rose 47 cents to $63.80 a barrel. BP shares closed 6p higher at 579p.

For BP, the delay is the latest in a succession of problems in its US operations, including the explosion at its Texas City refinery last year and the shutdown of its Prudhoe Bay field in Alaska following leaks from a corroded pipe. Analysts had said the start-up of Thunder Horse had been the only good news on the horizon for BP.

On Monday, some were questioning the returns the project will make. The company has touted the field will deliver 1.5bn barrels of oil, making it the biggest find yet in the Gulf of Mexico.

One BP employee said the UK oil and gas company was moving to revise down expectations from the field, with new estimates that it might contain just 600m barrels of oil.

One analyst said: "The field may now come on stream after the peak in the oil price."

BP discovered the Thunder Horse field in July 1999 and set January 2005 as a production target, with about 50 wells. BP has delayed the project several times.

The oil and gas platform, the world's largest of its type, was found to be listing badly after its evacuation during Hurricane Dennis in July last year.

On September 10, BP took a key manifold – the central structure of the platform – to a shipyard in Houston for hydro-testing, in which water is pumped in at high pressures to ensure the system is intact.

"In this case, it blew apart and didn't hold pressure,'' said a BP employee. "Things shot 60ft in the air. It is very clear there is a system-wide problem.''

Two other manifolds, in the northern section of the field, were also found to have cracked insulation, which was a precursor to the failure of the welding on the other manifold, he said.

BP said no parts came free and the welds it used were common elsewhere in the industry. It suspected problems on Thunder Horse resulted from the high pressure and high temperature on the oil reservoir, the highest under development in the Gulf.

One BP employee said project costs were rising significantly, with an additional $500,000 on the more than $1bn project being one estimate. BP said it was too early to estimate cost overruns.

The Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries and the International Energy Agency are expected to revise downward their oil supply forecasts because of the delay, which will probably reduce US supply growth to zero in 2007. An Opec official said: "This is amazing. Thunder Horse was absolutely key."

He said this would give Opec members more flexibility and might mean they would not have to reduce output next year to shore up prices.

BP Extends Gulf Of Mexico Delay As Tests Show Failing Equipment (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

BP PLC said it will further postpone the start-up of its long-delayed Thunder Horse oil field in the Gulf of Mexico, making its long-term production goals harder to achieve.

BP said it will replace much of the field's underwater equipment because of a failure during recent testing. The delay will push first production from the field to 2008, instead of 2007 as previously projected.

While BP said it was too early to determine the cost of the additional repairs, the move is an operational setback. The London company already is coping with a series of environmental, safety and compliance problems in the U.S.

The problems with Thunder Horse -- which is 75%-owned by BP and 25%-owned by Exxon Mobil Corp. -- demonstrate the risks involved in such deep-water projects, which are finding increasing appeal amid high oil prices and the scramble to secure new reserves. BP's announcement also contributed to a 47-cent rise in oil futures to $63.80 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Thunder Horse is expected to produce a maximum of about 250,000 barrels a day from wells about 6,000 feet deep. BP already is suffering significant lost crude output at an oil field in Alaska, which it partially shut down this summer because of corrosion. The Alaska field, which BP runs on behalf of a consortium of oil companies, is producing just over half of its typical output of some 400,000 barrels a day.

Thunder Horse's most recent estimated start date wasn't until next year, and today's high oil prices will help cushion some of the blow from the late start. But a delay in reaching its longer-term production estimates could further sour investor sentiment on BP, which has suffered since the Alaska shutdown and amid criminal and regulatory probes of its refineries, the Alaska oil field and its energy-trading desk.

BP's American depositary receipts initially fell but finished up 1%, or 69 cents, at $65.55 in New York Stock Exchange 4 p.m. composite trading. In recent weeks, the company's shares have underperformed those of its large, integrated oil-company peers Exxon Mobil and Royal Dutch Shell PLC.

BP had estimated annual production growth of 4% on average from 2005 to 2010, assuming an oil price of $40 a barrel. A BP spokeswoman said the company expects to be able to make up for any shortfall in later years. She said BP doesn't expect similar problems elsewhere because Thunder Horse is "a leading-edge project" using newer and less-tested technology. BP's production for the first half of the year totaled about four million barrels of oil equivalent a day.

As recently as early last year, BP said it still expected Thunder Horse to be pumping oil in 2005. That summer, however, the field's production platform was found listing heavily after Hurricane Dennis ripped through the Gulf of Mexico. The project suffered a series of delays after those repairs.

BP said yesterday that the project failed a series of tests. When water was pumped through a subsea manifold, or pipeline juncture, a weld failed.

The BP spokeswoman said the failure was related to an unexpected metallurgical reaction in the manifolds unique to the field's challenging geology.

The delay comes as BP scrambles to address other problems eating into its bottom line. The company's refinery in Texas City, Texas, is running at reduced capacity since BP closed it after last year's late-summer hurricanes and kept it shuttered to address equipment problems. The refinery was the site of a March 2005 explosion that killed 15 workers.

Wall Street Mixed As Oil Prices Climb (FT)

By John O'doherty

Financial Times, September 19, 2006

A morning rally on Wall Street fizzled out on Monday as oil prices climbed and investors became cautious ahead of the US Federal Reserve's meeting on interest rate policy on Wednesday.

Energy stocks ticked higher after BP announced production at its Thunder Horse rig in the Gulf of Mexico would be delayed until 2008, and Iran warned against sanctions over its nuclear programme. Schlumberger gained 4.6 per cent to $58.84, and ExxonMobil rose 2.2 per cent to $66.08.

Steelmaker Nucor added 4.3 per cent to $48.77, and copper miner Phelps Dodge rose 3 per cent to $86.21.

First Data, provider of electronic payment systems, sank 7.6 per cent to $41.25 after Standard & Poors cut its rating on the company's debt from A+ to A.

Freescale Semiconductor jumped 5.7 per cent to $39.26 on news that the chipmaker would be bought for $17.6bn by a private equity consortium led by the Blackstone Group.

Symbol Technologies, a maker of barcode scanners and mobile computers, soared 15.4 per cent to $14.67 on reports that it was putting itself up for sale.

Applied Materials, a manufacturer of chipmaking equipment, rose 3.4 per cent to a four-month high of $17.78 after it announced plans to buy back up to $5bn of its own stock over the next three years.

Not all technology stocks were as strong however. Ebay fell 3.6 per cent to $26.84, and Sun Microsystems shed 3 per cent to $5.12.

DOJ_NMG_0065355

At the close, the S&P 500 was up 0.1 per cent, or 1.31 points, at 1,321.18, while the Nasdaq Composite was flat, up 0.16 points, at 2,235.75. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 0.1 per cent, or 5.77 points, at 11,555.00.

The Federal Reserve's Open Market Committee meets on Wednesday and is widely expected to keep rates unchanged.

"Confidence seems to be growing that the Fed will pull off a soft landing," said Alfred Goldman, chief market strategist at AG Edwards.

Consumer cyclical stocks came under pressure. Home improvement retailer Home Depot sank 1.7 per cent to $36.58 after Credit Suisse cut its rating on the stock from "outperform" to "neutral", saying a weakening housing market could lead to earnings shortfalls.

Ford Motor continued to slump after it announced steep cost-cutting measures on Friday. The carmaker dropped 2.5 per cent to $7.82.

Intercontinental Exchange gained 2.4 per cent to $76.15, after it was upgraded from "neutral" to "buy" by Bank of America, which cited the exchange's recent announcement that it would buy the New York Board of Trade. Nasdaq also ticked higher, adding 5.2 per cent to $30.85.

Rail stocks pushed higher. Norfolk Southern gained 4.1 per cent to $44.80, and Burlington Northern Santa Fe added 1.9 per cent to $71.15.

Nasdaq Rises Seventh Session In A Row; Investors Await Wednesday's Fed Call (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

Fresh insights from home builders offered more evidence of economic weakness, confirming what many investors and Wall Street denizens already believed ahead of a meeting of Federal Reserve policy makers at midweek.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average slipped 5.77 points to 11555.00, nearly unchanged in percentage terms. The Dow is up nearly 8% so far this year, within shouting distance of its record set in January 2000.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1.31 points to 1321.18, up 5.8% on the year. The Nasdaq Composite Index inched up 0.16 point to 2235.75, up 1.4% on the year.

However humble that rise, it was the seventh straight day of gains for the technology-heavy indicator, the longest winning streak since the Nasdaq began 2006 with a weeklong surge.

Investors came into the week already focused on tomorrow's meeting of the Federal Reserve at which the central bank is expected to leave its key interest-rate target unchanged at 5.25%. But unlike the run-ups to past meetings, investors aren't anxiously parsing the economic tea leaves because they figure they already have a handle on the state of things.

"It's still clear the economy is softening at a pretty good pace," said Peter Hooper, chief U.S. economist at Deutsche Bank Securities.

Economy watchers pointed to a report yesterday from the National Association of Home Builders that showed an index of builder confidence falling for September. Among other data, America's current-account deficit, a measure of imports versus exports, grew in the second quarter to $218.4 billion, greater than Wall Street's expectation of a $214 billion gap.

Although the housing market may be topping out or even retreating, Wall Street is banking on consumers continuing to make other purchases that will keep the economy from going into full retreat.

Bulls are banking on a combination of moderate growth and no more rate increases from the central bank.

"There's a lot of room for large-cap growth stocks, in particular, to do well as the Fed moves from a neutral stance to easing rates, which will happen at some point down the line," said Duncan W. Richardson, chief stock-investment officer at Eaton Vance Management.

Today, the government will release the August reading of its producer-price index, which measures wholesale inflation. That report, preceded by a report last week on price pressures at the consumer level, could spur busier stock trading than was seen yesterday.

In major U.S. market action:

DOJ_NMG_0065356

Stocks were mixed. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.36 billion shares, as 1,631 issues rose and 1,670 declined.

Bond prices declined. The 10-year Treasury note slipped 4/32 point, or $1.25 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.812%. The 30-year bond slipped 6/32, pushing up the yield to 4.930%.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 117.88 yen, compared with 117.56 on Friday. The euro rose to $1.2704, compared with $1.2662.

Inflation Fears And Rising Oil Prices Bring Rally To A Halt (NYT/BLOOM)

The New York Times/Bloomberg, September 19, 2006

Stocks failed to extend last week's rally yesterday as oil rose the most this month and inflation concerns spurred investors to sell shares of retailers, the market's best performers in September.

Home Depot, the home improvement chain, led the Dow Jones industrial average lower after Credit Suisse cut its rating, citing potential earnings shortfalls because of a housing slowdown.

Ford Motor fell for a third day after J. P. Morgan Chase analysts said the company's 2006 losses might be larger than forecast.

"You're going to have two things working against these stocks," said Bart Barnett, head of equity trading at Morgan Keegan in Memphis. "First, that they've had a great run. Second, that obviously higher oil prices are inherently negative for the consumer."

Stocks swung between gains and losses throughout the day amid concern that a report on wholesale prices today would show that inflation remains a threat. The Federal Reserve makes its next decision on interest rates tomorrow after leaving them unchanged last month for the first time in two years.

The Dow fell 5.77 points, or 0.1 percent, to 11,555. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1.31 points, or 0.1 percent, to 1,321.18. Both benchmarks ended last week at their highest since May 10. The Nasdaq index added 0.16 points, to 2,235.75.

Signs of slowing inflation have pushed the S.& P. 500 within 0.3 percent of a five-year high and have reduced the chances the Fed will resume raising rates. The S.& P. 500 last week had its best week in a month after consumer prices increased in August by half the pace of the previous month and oil prices tumbled.

A measure of retailers fell 0.5 percent among two dozen industry groups in the S& P. 500. So far this month, retailers have gained 8.1 percent as a decline in oil prices has allayed concern that consumer spending will falter.

Crude oil for October delivery rose yesterday on concern that a dispute between Iran and the United States about Iran's nuclear program would intensify and jeopardize oil supplies. The contract closed up 0.7 percent at $63.80 a barrel, the biggest gain since Aug. 24.

Home Depot was the worst performer on the Dow, losing 64 cents, to $36.58. A Credit Suisse analyst, Gary Balter, cut the shares to neutral from outperform.

Ford tumbled 20 cents, to $7.82. Losses this year "are likely to be far wider than current expectations," a J. P. Morgan analyst, Himanshu Patel, wrote to clients.

Sharper Image, a seller of products like robotic vacuum cleaners, dropped 34 cents, to $9.35. The company said it would restate results for the three years that ended in January 2006 after reviewing its stock option practices. Sharper Image also said its loss for the second quarter, compared with a year ago, widened before an income tax benefit.

Applied Materials rose 58 cents, to $17.78, after saying it would buy back $5 billion in stock over three years.

Higher crude prices gave energy shares a lift. A measure of oil-related companies advanced 2.6 percent for the best performance among the 10 industry groups in the S.& P. 500.

Exxon Mobil added $1.65, to $66.30 for the Dow's best performance. Chevron rose $1.06, to $62.85. Even with yesterday's gain, energy shares are down 4 percent this month as oil prices have slumped 9.2 percent.

The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell 4/32, to 100 17/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rose to 4.80, from 4.79 on Friday.

Here are the results of yesterday's auction of three-month and six-month Treasury bills:

Judge Tells Strip Clubs To Abide By Crackdown (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

A federal judge has upheld Prince George's County's crackdown on strip clubs, but temporarily ruled against a measure requiring individual strippers to post licenses issued by the county.

U.S. District Court Judge Deborah K. Chasanow on Friday refused to issue a restraining order to block enforcement of the county's laws on adult entertainment, including a ban on nude dancers mingling with club patrons.

The Nico Banquet Hall in Camp Springs, Bazz and Crue in Forestville and the Showcase Theater in Beltsville filed a federal lawsuit against the county last month challenging the constitutionality of the laws.

"The clubs will have to comply" while the case moves ahead, said Tonia Belton-Gofreed, assistant state's attorney for Prince George's County.

The legislation, which an attorney for the clubs called "sweeping and devastating," include a provision that prohibits clubs from operating after 1 a.m. Among other new restrictions, dancers must be on stages that are at least 18 inches high and performances must take place at least six feet from customers.

Judge Chasanow denied the request for a restraining order on all of the measures except for a provision saying that dancers must post their licenses in a work area.

Under the new set of county laws, dancers will have to pay the county $200 a year for a license.

License applications must include proof of identification, age, home address and any stage names or nicknames they use during performances.

Luke Lirot, an attorney for the clubs, had argued that restrictions shouldn't be enforced until the court decides whether they are constitutional.

Mr. Lirot also argued that another measure banning patrons from giving tips to dancers would put many employees out of work.

"Without the tip income from the patrons, many, if not all, of the dancers that perform at these establishments would not do so," he wrote in a 44-page legal brief filed earlier this month.

Mr. Lirot also questioned a consulting study commissioned by county officials before they enacted the legislation.

The study by Pennsylvania-based Gentile-Meinert & Associates Inc. called for tightened regulation of strip clubs and cited "negative secondary effects," including crime and declining property values.

The regulations were enacted in the wake of a community effort to stop the relocation of a Hyattsville strip club to the outskirts of Laurel.

In legal filings, Miss Belton-Gofreed balked at claims by the strip clubs that the new rules were unconstitutional. She stated that the laws aren't overly restrictive because dancers, if clothed, still can mingle with patrons. In addition, strippers still can accept tips, though not directly. They must take tips from business operators or tip jars.

She also said tightened restrictions were justified because a county study found that 8.5 percent of the county's homicides were reported at adult entertainment establishments in 2003. The study also cited links between the establishments and prostitution and declining property values.

Miss Belton-Gofreed also said the enforcement of the rules probably will not begin until next month.

"The county is not banning nudity, dancing or nude dancing," Miss Belton-Gofreed argued in legal filings last week. "If ... patrons will accept no alternative to the experience of 'genitalia-touching lap dances,' frankly, salsa dancing -- or therapy -- would better serve."

Poll Finds Rebound In Bush Approval (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence And Susan Page

USA Today, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — Amid falling gas prices and a two-week drive to highlight his administration's efforts to fight terrorism, President Bush's approval rating has risen to 44% in a new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll. That's his highest rating in a year.

DOJ_NMG_0065358

The poll also showed likely voters evenly divided between Democratic and Republican candidates for Congress, 48%-48%. Among registered voters, Democrats had a 51%-42% advantage.

The results come seven weeks before closely contested elections for control of Congress. Republicans have struggled to overcome problems, including Bush's low ratings, continuing violence in Iraq and the bungled response to Hurricane Katrina.

They also come as terrorism is making headlines: an alleged plot to blow up planes headed from Britain to the USA, the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, and weeks of focus by Bush and other top Republicans on terrorism and whether Democrats can protect the country.

The new findings reflect "a consistent, persistent, tenacious effort to make … the Republican Party's ability to deal with terrorism the No. 1 issue in the campaign," said political scientist Richard Eichenberg of Tufts University, who has studied presidential job ratings during wartime. He called it "a carbon copy" of the successful 2004 playbook.

Bush's approval rating has edged up largely on the strength of Republicans coming back to the fold — 86% with him now compared with 70% in May.

Scott Reed, a Republican strategist who ran Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign, said GOP fortunes have turned since Labor Day: "This has been the best two weeks Republicans have had since Bush was re-elected."

Democratic pollster Geoffrey Garin said Bush's approval goes up and down with each poll, and the even division of likely voters has been constant for a month. "There's no momentum here," he said. "The story is Republicans at a standstill."

The new poll found likely voters more prone to vote for candidates who support Bush on terrorism, 45%-28%, and evenly divided on those who support and oppose Bush on Iraq. More than a quarter said Iraq is their top concern this fall. For the first time since December 2005, a majority of people did not say the war there was a mistake; the split was 49%-49%.

Bush's terror-fighting techniques drew mixed reviews. A 55%-42% majority supported his policy of wiretapping phone conversations between U.S. citizens here and suspected terrorists in other countries without getting a court order.

But by 48%-41%, people said it would be worse to convict defendants on evidence they are never shown, as Bush wants, than to let some suspected terrorists go free. And 57% said the United States should abide by the Geneva Conventions that bar humiliating and degrading treatment of prisoners; Bush wants to write U.S. standards that critics such as Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., say would weaken protections.

The Iraq war continues to be problematic for Bush. Six in 10 people said he does not have a clear plan for handling Iraq (two-thirds said the same for Democrats), and 56% said Congress is not doing enough to oversee U.S. policy there.

Three-quarters said Iraq is in a civil war, though the administration says that is not the case. And 58% said the U.S. goal in Iraq and the Middle East should be stable governments; 33% agreed with Bush's aim of democratic governments.

Democrats' Spending Gives Edge To GOP (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, September 19, 2006

The national Democratic Party has spent millions on raising money, consultants and building state parties, entering the weeks before Election Day with only about one-fifth as much as the Republicans for races that could decide control of Congress.

The Republican National Committee is prepared to spend $60 million over the next seven weeks on advertising and get-out-the-vote efforts to protect the GOP's narrow majorities in the House and Senate.

The Democratic National Committee plans to use about $12 million, all devoted to getting voters to the polls. Even in that effort, though, it has set aside only an average of $60,000 in each of the 40 most competitive congressional races in the country.

Under Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean, the DNC has delivered more resources than any other toward building the party at the state level. In doing so, the DNC as of July 31 had transferred nearly $17 million to state and local party committees across the country, with significantly more going to states with competitive races, according to party officials.

Between Jan. 1, 2005 and July 31 of this year, the party spent about $90.2 million, about a third of that on fundraising expenses, ranging from more than $8 million in direct mail to $10,500 for an event for donors at the five-star Greenbrier in White Sulphur Springs, W.Va.

The party has reported spending $2.9 million on political consulting and nearly $1 million on legal consulting fees, according to data compiled by Political Money Line, a data base for political spending. The political consulting figure includes money spent on summer interns, party officials said.

Both parties will rely heavily on their congressional campaign committees for advertising and voter outreach. But while the GOP is operating at a political disadvantage this election, its financial edge could be crucial for Republicans to retain political power.

Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman has developed a highly touted voter outreach operation that party operatives say he will blend with targeted television advertising. It is an operation that helped with a Republican victory in a special congressional election in California and with securing Sen. Lincoln Chafee's Republican primary win in Rhode Island.

"Republicans have unlimited resources," said Steve Rosenthal, a Democratic strategist and expert on voter mobilization. He predicted Republicans will "bloody the waters enough with negative ads and come in below that with a campaign that is mailings, phone calls, personal contact with voters they know they need to get out to win."

To be sure, Republicans have long been able to raise more money than Democrats. Dean, a prolific fundraiser, has been successful at bringing in more money by Democratic standards. But his decision to spend more on states has angered Washington-based party operatives who want to place the party's focus on winning control of Congress and set the stage to regain the White House in 2008.

One Democratic strategist, speaking on condition of anonymity so as not to inflame tensions with Dean, pointed out that the chairman has raised and spent a significant amount of money, arguing that winning this year is crucial to the party winning in 2008.

But Dean's strategy has vast support from state party officials who have been pleading for years for help from the Democratic national committee. State party officials say the money, in turn, will help Democrats in races up and down the ballot, from gubernatorial to congressional to state legislative contests.

"The investment in the state parties has made them stronger," said Mark Brewer, the chairman of the Michigan Democratic Party and president of the Association of State Democratic Chairs. "There are more door-to-door canvassers and they're working for the whole ticket. It's a different way of spending the same resources."

Ohio Democratic Chairman Chris Redfern said field operatives hired by the state party with help from the DNC will work together with staffers from the House and Senate campaign committees in mobilizing voters to help all candidates on the Ohio ballot. Ohio is one of the mot competitive states in the country, with close races for governor, Senate, and several House races.

Dean defenders said the party's two campaign committees — the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee — are focused exclusively on the upcoming race, while Dean needs to have a longer view that builds the party for the future.

"If you want to win the presidency you have to win Ohio," Redfern said.

But the DNC's money has been directed to all states, many of them solidly Republican where Democratic candidates for national office stand little or no chance. Still, DNC officials said the $12 million devoted to a national get-out-the-vote effort is greater than the DNC's commitment in past elections.

The party's campaign committees have taken the lead in supporting Democratic House and Senate candidates in competitive races. The congressional campaign committee is running its own voter mobilization effort with the help of Michael Whouley, a highly regarded party strategist.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill, the DCCC chairman who has quarreled with Dean over DNC spending, last week obtained a $2.4 million pledge from the DNC's get-out-the-vote money to specifically mobilize voters in 40 competitive House seats. Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat and chairman of the senatorial campaign committee, is still negotiating with the DNC for a sum to help Senate candidates.

Meanwhile, the RNC has already spent more than $300,000 in advertising against Rep. Harold Ford, the Democratic Senate candidate in Tennessee, and more than $1 million against Rep. Sherrod Brown, the Democratic Senate candidate in Ohio. The DNC plans to spend no money advertising, leaving that task to the party's campaign committees.

DOJ_NMG_0065360

Still, some Democratic strategists say their candidates have indeed benefited from Dean's decision to send much of the party's money to the states. Others say the party's decision to overhaul outdated voters files has provided an invaluable service.

"Our campaign would have had to spent our manpower and our resources if we had to build it from scratch," said Michael Malaise, the campaign manager for Nick Lampson, the Democrat seeking to fill the seat formerly held by House Republican Leader Tom DeLay.

Allen, Webb Again Spar Over War In Iraq (RTD)

By Peter Hardin

Richmond Times-Dispatch, September 19, 2006

McLEAN -- Republican Sen. George Allen branded Democratic challenger Jim Webb a single-issue candidate yesterday over Webb's opposition to the Iraq war and its central place in his Senate bid.

"This is the one issue that drives my op- ponent's campaign," contended Allen, forced to defend the divisive war again in a Senate debate, as was the case a day earlier when the candidates clashed on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Webb, a former secretary of the Navy, did not back off from the Iraq issue during the freewheeling debate sponsored by the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce.

Jim Webb explains his past position against women in the military... Polls show more than two-thirds of Americans believe the situation in Iraq is "headed in the wrong direction," Webb said, adding that he brings varied skills for fresh leadership on that and other issues.

"My view on Iraq is that we got in pre- cipitously. We need to get out carefully. But that does not mean that we should take a great deal of time in order to do that," Webb said.

The scrapping candidates also faced some different questions:

When a reporter pointed to speculation by "the Jewish press" and asked if Allen had Jewish forebears, some in the audience booed. A visibly irritated Allen teed off on the panelist, dismissing the question as irrelevant. But Allen also gave an answer. His mother is "French-Italian with a little Spanish blood in her," he said, and he was raised "as she was, as far as I know, raised as a Christian."

The Jewish Daily Forward published an article Aug. 25 about Allen's heritage after the controversy over his use of the term "macaca" to address a volunteer of Indian-American descent for the Webb campaign.

Webb called for a move toward a health-care system such as one in Massachusetts that requires all adults to have health insurance.

The candidates found something to agree about. Webb said he went along with Allen's effort to generally require states to recognize one another's permits for carrying concealed firearms.

"I have a permit to carry [a firearm]," Webb said. "I've had guns since I was 8 years old and was raised in a family where hunting and self-defense is part of the culture."

With control of the GOP-led Congress at issue in the upcoming midterm elections and polls showing a close contest in Virginia, the race has attracted national attention.

Webb is a newcomer to elective politics who is not nearly as well-known in Virginia as Allen, a former governor, state legislator and U.S. House member.

The challenger is an author, former Republican and decorated Marine veteran of Vietnam combat. For the second day, he appeared confident and pugnacious in debating, a marked contrast to the contest's first debate in July.

Allen again attacked Webb over writings critical of women in the military from a 1979 article for Washingtonian magazine.

"Women still today are dismayed that you continue to rationalize those words," Allen told his foe, who issued an apologetic statement last week.

"I guess this is my 'macaca' payback," Webb replied to an eruption of laughter in the audience. "Keep trying, George."

Allen has apologized repeatedly over calling the volunteer "macaca," saying it was a mistake and that he had made up the word without knowing what it meant. It means a genus of monkey. The Webb volunteer recorded the incident on videotape, which was circulated widely.

DOJ_NMG_0065361

Yesterday, a panelist said the word is used as a racial slur in French-influenced African nations and mentioned that Allen's mother is French-Tunisian. Was Allen sure he had never heard the word, the panelist asked. "I hope you're not trying to bring my mother into this matter," he shot back crossly at the questioner.

He never heard it from her or anyone else and did not intend to disparage Webb volunteer S.R. Sidarth, Allen replied.

He added an emotional note about his mother. Her father was incarcerated by the Nazis in World War II, Allen said, and he learned an important lesson from her.

"Of all people in my life who told me about tolerance and not judging people by their religious beliefs or their ethnicity or their race, it is my mother," he said.

Allen voted in 2002 to authorize use of military force in Iraq. He assailed Webb's suggesting that Iran and Syria might be drawn into talks over a diplomatic outcome.

"It doesn't make much sense to me to have a country like Iran, it's clearly a state sponsor of terrorism . . . to have them forming the future of Iraq," Allen said.

Webb retorted that "no great country should be afraid to talk to any other country" and accused Allen of feeling comfortable with the notion of a U.S. presence in Iraq for 20 to 30 years.

In reply to a question, Webb said he would not support it if there were a bid in Congress to cut off appropriations for the war.

Yesterday's debate was moderated by George Stephanopoulos of ABC News. A final debate, sponsored by the League of Women Voters, will be aired Oct. 9 on WTVR-Channel 6 in Richmond.

The Fairfax County meeting was broadcast by C-SPAN2 and is expected to be rebroadcast. Sunday's "Meet the Press" debate can be viewed on that show's Web site, where a transcript is also available.

Iraq, Stem Cell Research, Racial Comments Key Debate (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, September 19, 2006

Republican Sen. George Allen criticized his Democratic challenger, Jim Webb, in a debate Monday for suggesting that Iraq and Syria be part of a multinational settlement to end sectarian bloodshed in Iraq.

In Virginia's close race, Allen and Webb reflect deep national divisions over U.S. involvement in Iraq, an issue that polls indicate could shift Congress from GOP to Democratic control in the Nov. 7 election.

Allen attacked Webb for saying in Sunday morning's debate on NBC's "Meet The Press" that Iran and Syria needed to be part of a multinational discussion on Iraq.

"It doesn't make much sense to me to have a country like Iran, which is clearly a state sponsor of terror, ... to have them forming the future of Iraq," Allen said during the Fairfax Chamber of Commerce Debate.

Monday's debate was the second in as many days. An independent candidate, Gail Parker, sat wearing a white cowboy hat amid a luncheon crowd of 600 business executives.

Allen said the idea of involving adversaries in the region in a settlement is the only significant difference between himself and Webb.

But Webb, an outspoken opponent of 2003 Iraq invasion, said he and Allen differed profoundly about nearly every aspect of the war.

"We've been divided from Day One — whether we should have gone in, which I believe was a strategic error," said Webb, who left the Republican Party partly because of the invasion that Webb says destabilized the region and strengthened Iran's hand.

Webb said a ceasefire in Afghanistan was possible only because its neighbors, including Iran, were involved. "No great country ought to be afraid to talk to any other country," he said.

"The problem with this administration is it has blinders on on this issue," Webb said.

Both candidates, however, said they would not vote to cut off congressional funding for the war to end the lingering military entanglement.

On other issues, Allen said he opposes the use of human embryos for medical research that scientists say could result in cures for maladies such as cancer, diabetes and Alzheimer's disease.

DOJ_NMG_0065362

Federal funding for embryonic stem cell research has divided Republicans. President Bush used his veto for the first time this year to kill a bill that would have expanded the research with government money. The measure passed with the support of many Senate Republicans and the blessing of former First Lady Nancy Reagan, whose husband suffered from Alzheimer's. Allen voted against it.

Allen said there are alternatives to human embryos in stem cell experimentation.

George Stephanopoulos, the debate moderator and host of ABC's weekly political program "This Week With George Stephanopoulos," asked Allen if he also opposed in-vitro fertilization, in which unused embryos are destroyed.

"The distinction is I don't think human embryos should be created just to be destroyed," Allen said.

Webb said he supports federal spending for research on embryos, and that scientists should have access to unused in-vitro embryos.

"We all need to be respectful of human life, but my understanding of this in my reading of it is that these were embryos that were created (and) were not going to become human life as we know it," Webb said.

On the issue of granting the District of Columbia a seat in the U.S. House, Webb said he would support the measure while Allen said he would have to see the legislation first.

Allen proposed as an alternative keeping core national holdings within the district — the Capitol, White House, Supreme Court, monuments — and ceding the rest to Maryland, just as Arlington was once ceded back to Virginia.

The emotional apex of the debate, however, came near the beginning when a panelist asked Allen whether the word he applied to a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent, "Macaca," was learned from his mother.

At an Aug. 11 campaign appearance before a mostly white crowd, Allen singled out S.R. Sidarth, who was following and videotaping Allen's campaign, and used the word, considered a racial slur in some languages and cultures, including Tunisia. The questioner noted that his mother, Etty Allen, is French Tunisian.

Allen glared toward the panelist for an uncomfortable moment. "I hope you're not trying to bring my mother into this matter," he shot back.

He said he made up the word on the spot, intended no racial disparagement by it and apologized personally to Sidarth, a 20-year-old University of Virginia senior who was born in Fairfax.

"I have never heard that word before from my mother or from anyone else," Allen said.

"More than anyone else, it was my mother, whose father was incarcerated by the Nazis in World War II. Of all the people in my life who told me about tolerance and not judging other people by their religious beliefs or their ethnicity or their race, it is my mother," Allen said.

This Time, Focus Is Domestic Issues (WP)

By Tim Craig And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) and Democratic challenger James Webb turned to domestic issues yesterday as they sparred during a debate in Northern Virginia over health care, the economy, transportation and stem cell research.

At their second meeting in two days, Allen urged voters to return him to the Senate because he's a familiar face ("you know me") with a record of service. Webb, a former Marine and secretary of the Navy who has never run for office, countered that the country is "breaking apart" and needs fresh blood in Washington.

More than 600 people jammed a hotel ballroom in Tysons Corner for the hour-long debate, the only time Allen and Webb are scheduled to square off in Northern Virginia before the Nov. 7 election. The event, sponsored by the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce, was moderated by George Stephanopoulos of ABC News and televised by NewsChannel 8 and C-SPAN.

The debate -- as well as one Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press" -- brought a new intensity to the Virginia campaign, but political observers said neither event was likely to alter a close race.

"I don't think we saw any changed dynamics," Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said. "But seven weeks is an eternity in politics."

DOJ_NMG_0065363

At times the candidates' responses got heated. One of the journalists who asked questions forced Allen to defend his mother, while Webb again was dogged by charges that he is insensitive to women in the military. The candidates also argued over how best to fight the war in Iraq and whether the United States should involve Iran in Iraq's future.

Allen sought to convince the audience that the Iraq war is only part of the race. "My friends, this is not a one-issue campaign," said Allen, a former governor and state legislator. "There are many issues important for the security, safety and prosperity of this country."

Anger about the war has turned the race into one of the most closely watched in the nation. But yesterday's matchup also gave the candidates an opportunity to talk about local and domestic issues that are often deciding factors for voters.

"We are breaking apart in a way we have never had before," Webb said. "The people at the top of society have never had it so good. . . . The middle class, with the rising cost of health care and stagnation of income levels, is in great danger right now."

Allen discussed his plans for health savings accounts, support for small businesses and efforts to invest in technology. He often stressed the contrast in experience, portraying himself as "somebody [who] has the concrete, verifiable record for performance with actual plans on ideas that can actually, tangibly have an impact on people's lives."

Webb criticized Allen for voting against minimum-wage increases and said the Republican-controlled Congress has failed to provide health insurance to an estimated 46 million Americans.

Allen said he supports legislation that makes it easier for small businesses to band together to buy health care for their employees. Webb countered that Allen's solution is insufficient, saying the federal government should move toward a system in which health care is expanded to everyone.

Turning to stem cell research, Allen defended his vote this year to oppose federal funding for embryonic stem cell research, saying he can't support a procedure that destroys a human embryo. Webb said he supports federal funding because he doesn't believe an embryo is a human life.

Although many in the audience of business leaders support higher state taxes for transportation improvements, neither candidate was willing to wade into that thorny issue. The Virginia General Assembly will take up transportation spending next week.

Allen and Webb said the state should make it easier for private companies to build and maintain for-profit roads. But several audience members said they wished Allen and Webb had talked more about solutions to the region's traffic woes.

"That, to me, is the issue in Northern Virginia," said state Del. Thomas Davis Rust (R-Fairfax), who has proposed tax increases to pay for road and transit fixes.

Both candidates said they support federal legislation to allow gun owners to carry weapons between states. Webb, who is trying to reach out to Republican-leaning rural voters, noted that he has a permit to carry a concealed weapon.

The candidates had several sharp exchanges, such as on their ties to southwest Virginia, an area that sometimes has been key to Democratic wins.

"I've been coming to southwest Virginia since George Allen was a Californian," said Webb, who has relatives in that area. Allen shot back that he started his law career in the region. "For me, it's a place in my heart, not a place on a map."

Allen hammered Webb for saying Sunday that solving hostilities in the Middle East would require the help of neighboring countries, including Iran and Syria. Allen said involving Iran, which sponsors terrorism, in Iraq's future "wouldn't make Iraq more secure, nor would it make Americans more secure."

Webb responded by noting that the United States has a long history of talking to its enemies, including China and Russia during the Cold War.

Both candidates were forced to address character issues that have distracted their campaigns. Webb gave his most direct apology yet for a 1979 magazine article opposing women in combat that some women said was offensive.

Allen couldn't escape additional questions about his calling a young Webb aide of Indian descent "macaca," a slur in some cultures, including France. A panelist asked Allen, who says the word was made up, if he might have learned "macaca" from his mother, who is part French Tunisian. The panelist also asked whether his mother was Jewish.

"I hope you are not bringing my mother into this," Allen said.

Allen Calls Webb A One-note (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

Republican Sen. George Allen, in the second of back-to-back debates in the U.S. Senate race yesterday, tried to portray Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr. as a one-issue candidate who focuses on the war in Iraq.

The showdown in Tysons Corner also saw Mr. Webb, Navy secretary under President Reagan, argue that several issues divide the front-runners for one of the U.S. Senate seats in Virginia.

During the debate, both candidates spelled out their differences on the federal government's handling of the war in Iraq, embryonic stem-cell research and increasing health-insurance options. They also weighed in on the possibility of granting the District a vote in the U.S. House of Representatives.

"[The war in Iraq] is the one issue that drives my opponent's campaign," Mr. Allen, 54, said.

Mr. Allen said he does not share Mr. Webb's view that the U.S. immediately must work with the countries neighboring Iraq, including Iran and Syria, on a diplomatic plan that allows American troops to pull out without jeopardizing the region's stability.

"It doesn't make much sense to me to have a country like Iran, which is clearly a state sponsor of terror ... forming the future of Iraq," Mr. Allen said.

In response, Mr. Webb, 60, reminded Mr. Allen of the comments the senator made last year in which he said, "We should be talking to our enemies."

After the debate, Mr. Webb told reporters that Mr. Allen is like other Republicans who say Democrats lack a plan but then express their stance through vague slogans like "stay the course."

"Where is their plan?" Mr. Webb asked. "They are the ones running the war, and they are not even able to articulate what the endpoints should look like."

The debate was organized by the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce and moderated by George Stephanopoulos, host of ABC's "This Week."

About 600 business executives attended the event. Independent candidate Gail Parker, who did not participate in the debate, sat in the crowd, wearing a white cowboy hat.

On embryonic stem-cell research, Mr. Webb said he -- like former first lady Nancy Reagan -- supports federal funding for the research. Mr. Allen, like President Bush, said he opposes federal funding for such programs because advancements in science have allowed adult stem cells to fill a similar scientific role without destroying human embryos.

"This is an issue that has the weight of medical science with it," Mr. Webb said in support of using tax dollars for the research. "My understanding is these were embryos that were created ... [and are] not going to become human life as we know it."

When asked whether they support Rep. Thomas M. Davis III's bill that would grant the District a vote in the U.S. House, Mr. Allen said he would rather see the non-federal part of the District ceded to Maryland. Mr. Webb said he would vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. Allen said he supports giving small businesses the ability to band together to buy health-insurance coverage for their employees, making it more affordable by spreading risk among a bigger group.

Mr. Webb said he favors a system similar to a mandatory health insurance plan that Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney recently signed into law. That plan forces people to have health coverage and subsidizes uninsured residents who fall under income brackets of up to three times the federal poverty level.

The candidates once again had to explain past statements that have fueled questions about each candidate's character.

Mr. Allen apologized for calling a worker from Mr. Webb's campaign a "macaca" at a rally in Southwest Virginia last month. The word refers to a genus of monkey and is considered a racial slur in some cultures.

Mr. Allen said he made up the word and added that he recently received an endorsement from state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III, a Richmond Democrat who is black, because of his support of historically black colleges and universities in Virginia.

DOJ_NMG_0065365

Mr. Webb apologized for the tone of a magazine article he wrote in 1979 that questioned the role women should have in the military. The article recently drew the ire of some female graduates of the U.S. Naval Academy, who said it fed an atmosphere of sexual harassment during their time at the academy.

As Fall Approaches, Va. Race Gauges Influence Of Bush, Iraq (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

After a 24-hour Iraq-a-thon, Sen. George Allen was clearly hoping that yesterday's debate in front of the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce would offer up a different topic of conversation. So what does he get? A question about whether his mother taught him a racial slur and whether he's tried to cover up that his grandfather might have been a Jew.

It's been that kind of a month for the Republican once hailed as Virginia's sunniest politician. August's "listening tour" of the commonwealth, meant to display his great connection to the state he's served as governor and senator as well as voters' appreciation of that service, might as well have ground to a halt after his words to a dark-skinned volunteer for his opponent James Webb hit YouTube. Even conservative talk radio now defines an ill-fated blunder by a politician as a "macaca moment."

According to polls, his once double-digit lead over Webb has dwindled to the margin of error, and Virginians no longer think it a good idea that he run for president in 2008. Last summer, a Mason-Dixon poll said the commonwealth's voters would go for the notion of a President Allen 47 to 41 percent; the poll earlier this month showed it 52 to 39 the other way.

After Allen was grilled Sunday morning by NBC's Tim Russert on his stay-the-course approach to the war in Iraq, Webb and Allen were back at it yesterday before the chamber in a big ballroom in Tysons Corner. The questioning yesterday touched on other issues -- economic disparity, stem cell research, transportation -- but even Allen seemed to acknowledge that, in the end, it returned to the war.

"My friends, this is not a one-issue campaign," Allen pleaded.

Webb agreed, only to a point. He said voters want "to see strong, effective leadership on many issues, not one issue -- although that issue tends to dominate a lot of our minds every day, as well it should."

Despite Allen's protests, and his contention that he and Webb are not that different on what should happen next in Iraq, Virginia might be the most stark test in the country about whether the unpopularity of the war and the Bush administration could lead to an incumbent losing his job.

Allen is one of the president's most loyal friends in the Senate, although he no longer jokes, when Webb charges that he's supported President Bush 97 percent of the time, that he wishes he could persuade the president to do the right thing all the time. The Republican he has most mentioned recently is the state's more moderate senior senator, John Warner, whom Allen introduced to the crowd yesterday as his "teammate."

Still, Allen has remained steadfast. "Staying the course is meaning that we don't tuck tail and run, that we don't retreat, that we don't surrender," Allen said Sunday on "Meet the Press." "This is a central battlefront in the war on terror, and it's not just the president or the vice president or me saying that. That's what al-Qaeda says."

Webb said: "If we had the right people in the Senate, there would have been more questions asked and a better policy in place in order to defeat international terrorism. . . . We didn't go into Iraq because of terrorism; we have terrorists in Iraq because we went in there."

If it has been Democratic strategy to try to keep Senate races across the country focused on national issues, the Republican plan has been to localize the issues and to personalize the contest.

To that end, Webb has found himself this week answering questions -- and doing his own apologizing -- about the sharp-tongued piece decrying women in combat generally and at the Naval Academy specifically that he wrote for Washingtonian magazine 27 years ago. The Allen campaign engineered a news conference last week at which several women who were former midshipmen said the article had been used to humiliate them and led to harassment.

"I apologize to anyone who was offended by the tone of the article," said Webb, who again was forced to express regret about referring to the academy dorm as a "horny woman's dream."

DOJ_NMG_0065366

When Allen said that "women today are still dismayed" by the article, Webb replied: "I guess this is my macaca payback? Keep trying, George."

Of course, no Webb-Allen debate is complete without more macaca, and yesterday's came from WUSA-TV anchor Peggy Fox, who pointed out that one of the places the word is an insult is in Tunisia, where Allen's French-Tunisian mother was born.

"I hope you're not trying to bring my mother into this," Allen warned. He said again that he made up the word on the spot and never heard it from his mother. He said his mother taught him tolerance above all, especially because her father had been incarcerated by the Nazis.

Which led Fox to reference a Jewish Forward article that said Allen's grandfather might have been a Jew, and when did the family stop acknowledging that? Which led to lusty booing from the crowd and outrage from Allen. "I'd like to ask you, why is that relevant?"

In the end, Allen's smile returned when he said, for the record, that his mother is "French-Italian with a little bit of Spanish blood" and that, as far as he knows, she was raised a Christian.

It is a race with a little bit of everything, including two of the most different candidates ever thrown together. The taciturn Webb rarely asks for votes and yesterday said in his closing statement both that he would give "every ounce of my energy" to working on the nation's problems over the next six years and that "when I go to my grave, whether I was a United States senator or not is not going to be high on my agenda."

Not so Allen, who never fails to include his wife in the bargain. "I thank you all for allowing Susan and me to serve you, and I hope and I pray and I ask you most humbly that you all will continue to allow us to work for you and our shared values and our shared vision for Virginia's future."

The Senator's Gentile Rebuke (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

First came Sen. George Allen's Macaca Moment. Then we learned of challenger Jim Webb's thoughts on the "horny" women of the Naval Academy.

Now, just when you thought Virginia's U.S. Senate race couldn't get any weirder, the Jews of Tunis are making a cameo.

At a debate in Tysons Corner yesterday between Republican Allen and Democrat Webb, WUSA-TV's Peggy Fox asked Allen, the tobacco-chewing, cowboy-boot-wearing son of a pro football coach, if his Tunisian-born mother has Jewish blood.

"It has been reported," said Fox, that "your grandfather Felix, whom you were given your middle name for, was Jewish. Could you please tell us whether your forebears include Jews and, if so, at which point Jewish identity might have ended?"

Allen recoiled as if he had been struck. His supporters in the audience booed and hissed. "To be getting into what religion my mother is, I don't think is relevant," Allen said, furiously. "Why is that relevant -- my religion, Jim's religion or the religious beliefs of anyone out there?"

"Honesty, that's all," questioner Fox answered, looking a bit frightened.

"Oh, that's just all? That's just all," the senator mocked, pressing his attack. He directed Fox to "ask questions about issues that really matter to people here in Virginia" and refrain from "making aspersions."

"Let's move on," proposed the moderator, George Stephanopoulos of ABC News.

Yes, let's -- but not before we figure out what that was all about. Turns out the Forward, a Jewish newspaper, reported that the senator's mother, Etty, "comes from the august Sephardic Jewish Lumbroso family" and continued: "If both of Etty's parents were born Jewish -- which, given her age and background, is likely -- Senator Allen would be considered Jewish in the eyes of traditional rabbinic law, which traces Judaism through the mother."

If that's true, the Presbyterian Allen joins public figures Madeleine Albright and John Kerry in discovering his Jewish roots. Of the three, the 6-foot-4-inch Allen, a down-home former college quarterback known for opposing laws to keep children out of the back of pickups, seems the least likely candidate for inclusion among the Chosen People. It would be no more surprising to learn that Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) has Southern Baptist ancestry.

Fox's question, while a matter of some intrigue, seemed out of place in the debate, which focused on more urgent matters such as Iraq. But Allen turned on the questioner with ferocity. He may have been irked that the question was a follow-up to one noting that "macaca" was a racial slur that his mother may have learned in Tunisia. He may have been concerned that Jewish roots wouldn't play well in parts of Virginia.

Or he may just have been in a quarreling mood. Allen protested frequently when Stephanopoulos tried to move the debate along. "I thought we had rebuttal," the senator complained at one point, tossing down his pen. He voiced suspicions at one questioner's motives, accused another of contradicting himself, and charged Webb with "continuing to degrade and disrespect women."

But that was nothing compared with what Allen gave Fox.

The anchor may have thought she had license to pop the Jewish question when Allen, reacting to the "macaca" question, volunteered that his grandfather "was incarcerated by the Nazis in World War II."

Citing reports about his "possible Jewish ancestry," Fox questioned Allen's past denial that his mother is Jewish.

"I'm glad you all have that reaction," Allen said to the audience as people jeered the questioner. Allen lectured Fox about the importance of "freedom of religion and not making aspersions about people because of their religious beliefs."

In between his heckling of Fox, Allen reported that "my mother is French-Italian with a little bit of Spanish blood in her, and I've been raised, and she was, as far as I know, raised as a Christian." That's not inconsistent with the Forward report, which said the Lumbrosos, forcibly converted in Portugal, escaped to Livorno and became traders with branches in Tunis.

Fox took a long drink from her water bottle. In the second round of questions, she chose the relative safety of Iraq, saying, "I don't think this question will get me booed."

"I was shocked," she said after the event. Disclosing that her great-grandfather was a Mormon polygamist, she added: "Why would he get so angry at the suggestion there might be something in your background that's Jewish? I don't think that's a bad thing at all."

Fox said her motive was curiosity. "I thought it was important to find out is this part of his heritage, because if it is nobody knows it. Do you deny part of your heritage for political reasons?"

Allen, surrounded by cameras and microphones after the event, hadn't cooled down. "What do you mean, 'make me so angry'?" he demanded angrily when asked why Fox's query had made him so angry.

"To make whatever sort of comment that was, you just don't judge people by their ethnicity or their religion," Allen said, fuming that Fox would "drag my mother into this." The senator said his mother was the one who taught him about tolerance. "Because," he repeated, "my mother's father was incarcerated by the Nazis in World War II."

Burns On Vonage Plane After Pushing Bill (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, September 19, 2006

Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, a Republican in a tight re-election race, flew on a private plane chartered by Vonage Holdings Corp., just days after he pushed legislation that the company has advocated for more than a year.

Burns accompanied Vonage lobbyist Frank Cavaliere on the company's chartered plane to and from the "13th Annual Burns Classic Golf Weekend" in Bigfork, Mont., on Saturday. Cavaliere and a Burns spokesman both confirmed the plane trip to The Associated Press on Monday.

Campaign finance rules allow members of Congress to fly on corporate aircraft as long as they reimburse the company for the equivalent of first-class airfare. Jason Klindt, a spokesman for Burns, said the senator will reimburse the company.

The fundraiser was held two days after the Senate passed a Burns-sponsored amendment that was pushed in various forms by Vonage and several public safety groups. The amendment was added to a port security bill that the Senate approved 98-0 on Sept. 14.

The legislation, originally sponsored by Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson of Florida, would give Internet phone companies the ability to better provide their consumers access to 911 services.

Vonage and other companies that connect calls over the Web have been under fire for problems with connecting its customers to reliable emergency service, and had asked Congress for the tools to help them.

Among the lobbying firms working for Vonage has been Gage, a group founded by Burns' former chief of staff Leo Giacometto.

Vonage CEO Jeffrey Citron has contributed $4,000 to Burns' campaign since March 2005 and the company paid $75,000 to Gage for lobbying on various bills last year, according to campaign and lobbying disclosure reports. Brooke Schulz, senior vice president of corporate communications for Vonage, said the lobbying firm does not lobby Burns on the company's behalf.

Calls to Gage were not returned Monday.

Burns, a three-term incumbent, is in a competitive race against Democrat Jon Tester, who has attempted to make ethics a central issue of the campaign.

The Burns amendment would give Vonage and other Internet phone companies access to the 911 infrastructure used by traditional phone companies. It would also provide liability protection for the Internet phone companies and phone centers that handle emergency calls.

In March, Vonage CEO Jeffrey Citron said these two provisions were important to help the company comply with a Federal Communications Commission mandate to provide enhanced 911 service to its customers.

Some provisions pushed by Vonage did not make it into the bill, however. Two provisions that could have given the company more leeway to comply with the FCC mandate were stripped from Burns' final version of the amendment.

Schulz said the omitted provisions were those that the company most wanted.

"It's odd to suggest this was somehow a 'thank you,'" Schulz said in a statement.

Klindt echoed Schulz.

"Frankly it is a wonder that they are still speaking to us," he said. "Conrad has been working since July to remove their provisions from the bill. He was ultimately successful and that's why it passed unanimously."

Tester has played up the ethics issue and lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who was convicted on federal corruption charges earlier this year. Burns' campaign took about $150,000 in donations from Abramoff, his clients and associates, all of which he has since returned or given to charity.

Lisa Sutherland, staff director for the Senate Commerce Committee, which passed the Vonage-friendly provisions late last year, said Burns' amendment will save lives.

"He has been the strongest advocate on our committee for emergency response systems," she said.

September 17, 2006, 3:09 pm Making Nice, but No Progress

The standoff continues between the Bush administration and some senators over limits on CIA interrogations of suspected terrorists, raising questions on whether Congress will act on the matter before it leaves town later this month for the fall campaigns.

Making the rounds of the Sunday talk shows, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley declined to say what specific techniques would be illegal if Congress didn't pass Mr. Bush's proposal. But he said the CIA program would suffer and be shut down if interrogators do not have guidance. He said the White House is working on a compromise that "achieves Senator [John]

McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change" the Geneva Conventions. "We need to find a way through that obstacle course, and I think we can," Mr. Hadley said.

Michigan Sen. Carl Levin said he wasn't certain a compromise was possible. "I don't see a way unless the president gives up on his idea that we're going to unilaterally modify Geneva," he told CBS' "Face the Nation"

A Supreme Court ruling in June essentially said the Geneva Conventions on the rights of wartime prisoners should apply to suspected terrorists in CIA custody. The decision froze the interrogations and eventually led the administration to turn over the last 14 prisoners in CIA custody to the military officials running a prison for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

September 17, 2006, 1:11 pm Chewing Over the Virginia Senate Race

Republican Sen. George Allen, who has seen his big lead over former Navy Secretary Jim Webb deflate since he flung the "macaca" comment at a Webb volunteer of Indian descent last month, squared off with his opponent on NBC's "Meet the Press," where both men found themselves on the defensive. Webb had to answer charges that a magazine article he wrote 27 years paved the way for harrassment and abuse of women at the U.S. Naval Academy. In fact, after some early argument over Iraq and detainee interrogations, the debate turned to dealing with all the baggage.

Allen didn't really need to apologize for his remark, he's already done so repeatedly. Nonetheless, he called it "a mistake" and said "there was no racial or ethnic intent to slur anyone." When pressed on his past embrace of the Confederate flag, Allen said there are "a lot of things I wish I'd learned earlier in life," and pledged to help people of all races become a part of "team America."

Webb said he regretted "many pieces" of the article, such as one passage that referred to Naval Academy dormitories as "a horny woman's dream" and another in which Mr. Webb wrote that he had never met a female he would "trust to provide" combat leadership." Mr. Webb then tried to shift attention back to Allen's previous opposition to admitting women to the Virginia Military Institute. He later noted that he agrees with the Army's current policy of having women "attached" to combat — 62 have died serving in Iraq over the last three years - -but not directly fighting as part of infantry units.

In the end,the two came to agreement on something: chewing tobacco. Show host Tim Russert pressed them both on their long-time tobacco habits, asking if that was a good example for children. Both candidates agreed it was a bad example, but, perhaps in deference to the presence of major tobacco firms in Virginia, neither said they planned to quit. "Yes I do dip," Allen said, striking a softly defiant tone. He then quoted Mark Twain: "Nothing needs more reforming than someone else's habit." –Christopher Conkey

September 15, 2006, 6:27 pm Wait, Who's on the Ballot?

The White House this afternoon released the president's schedule for next week, which includes one intriguing entry. On Thursday, President Bush will be in Orlando, Fla., to attend a "Charlie Christ for Governor" event.

We'll take a guess they meant Charlie Crist , the Republican candidate for Florida governor. It's an easy enough mistake to make.

On the subject of religion, President Bush at a Rose Garden news conference this morning did talk about what he sees as America's changing attitudes. Responding to question about his address to conservative columnists earlier this week in which he brought up a "Third Awakening" of religious devotion, the president said: "It seems like to me that something is happening in the religious life of America… But I'm able to see a lot of people, and from my perspective, people are coming to say, I'm praying for you. And it's an uplifting part of being the president; it inspires me. And I'm grateful that a fellow citizen would say a prayer for me and Laura." –Amy Schatz

September 15, 2006, 5:34 pm Dodging a Dukakis Moment

DOJ_NMG_0065370

While touring a high-tech plant today, Massachusetts Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey , the Republican candidate for governor, apparently refused to be seen wearing goggles and a hard hat by waiting photographers, according to the Patriot Ledger. The incident in Quincy follows a similar one last month in New Bedford, the AP reports, when Healey's campaign staff barred photographers from snapping photos "while she was wearing a hair net at a fish processing plant."

Seems to Washington Wire that doing anything to avoid a Dukakis moment, particularly in Massachusetts, is only prudent. Also, let's be honest: Who looks good in a hair net?!

Healey's decision to nix the goggles photo op means the Democratic winner of the state's Sept. 19 primary will have one less photo to choose from when the attack ads start. Three Democrats are currently trying to win the nomination to take on Healey in November. At this point, the governor's race is considered a toss-up. –Amy Schatz

Among the allegations the Justice Department today announced against Rep. Bob Ney (R, Ohio): on two occasions in 2003, he accepted thousands of dollars of gambling chips from a "foreign businessman" for use at private London casinos. In exchange, he lobbied the State Department for an exemption to a trade embargo against a country to which the businessman wanted to sell U.S.-made aircraft and airplane parts, the Justice Department says.

Ney The Justice Department wouldn't divulge the businessman's nationality or the country to which he sought the embargo exception. But according to numerous media accounts, the London rendezvous included British resident Nigel Winfield and Syrian-born Fouad al Zayat, co-owners of Cyprus-based FN Aviation. Their intended market: Iran. (Ney, who once lived in Iran, is the only member of Congress fluent in Farsi.)

Under the gifts section of his 2004 financial disclosure report, Ney listed $34,000 from a "game of chance" at the Ambassador's Club, a London casino. The Justice Department said his combined winnings exceeded $50,000. In June, Ney was one of just 17 Republican to vote against a bill to crack down on Internet gambling. –Ben Winograd

The new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows that a 59% majority of voters rejects President Bush's recent comparison of the war on terrorism to earlier struggles against Nazism and fascism. In equal proportions, nembers of families including a current soldier or military veteran join other voters in calling that "an inappropriate comparison that is only being made to justify the Bush policy."

Americans of all ages, incomes and demographic groups agree on the point; only Republicans and conservatives side with the president. Asked about the war in Iraq at today's Rose Garden news conference, Bush said he's prosecuting "the ideological war of the 21st century" but did not repeat the comparison to the battle against Nazism. –John Harwood

September 15, 2006, 3:10 pm Indiana Voters Leaning Leftward?

When he worked at the White House, Mitch Daniels wasn't always the most popular guy in the room. It's not an uncommon problem for the head of the Office of Management and Budget, whose job includes telling the president and federal agencies how much less money they'll have to spend than they want.

Daniels That's one reason why Daniels, who as Indiana governor has spent a lot of time trying to balance the state's budget, probably won't be fazed by new poll from WISH-TV in Indianapolis, showing Hoosiers aren't very happy with him. Daniels, a Republican, was rated in the fair or poor categories by 57% of all respondents (although just 35% of Republicans). The poll of 800 likely voters conducted from Sept. 5 to Sept. 8 found that 55% think the country is headed in the wrong direction while 41% say its going the right way.

Daniels isn't up for re-election this fall. But three Indiana congressional seats are in play, which is why both Republicans and Democrats are pouring money and resources into the conservative state. Among local issues, voters appear to still be miffed about Daniels's decision to lease a northern Indiana toll road to an international conglomerate as well as the continuing drama over the state's effort to pick a time zone. Consequently, the answer to one poll question–"Would you like to see more Democrats or Republicans elected to Congress this year?"– may be somewhat troubling.

In all, 46% said they'd prefer more Democrats while 41% chose Republican. Among women, 50% preferred Democrats, and 35% favored Republicans. –Amy Schatz

September 15, 2006, 1:17 pm Scrubbing the Numbers

The Citizenship and Immigration Service says its once-monumental backlog for green card, asylum and naturalization requests has almost disappeared—except for the 1.1 million people still in it.

USCIS Director Emilio Gonzalez called a news conference to announce that the service's "net backlog" had been winnowed to 139,000 by the end of July—down from 3.8 million in January 2004—and that he expects to eliminate it by Oct. 1. The backlog includes people applying to join family members, those who want to live and work here permanently, political refugees and those seeking asylum, and people who already are here and want to gain their citizenship.

The news should have come as a relief to certain categories of Filipinos, who have been waiting since 1984 for permission to join family members. Some categories of Mexicans have been waiting since 1993, and some Indians and Chinese have been on the wait list since 1995, according to a monthly government bulletin advising immigrants how long they can expect to wait.

But USCIS, which replaced the old Immigration and Naturalization Service, says it still has a "gross backlog" of a million people whose applications are being held up by other agencies and by situations over which it has no control. About 100,000 of those cases are waiting for the FBI to complete background checks. But most of the gross backlog is because Congress limits the number of new immigrants from any one country to 7% of the yearly total, regardless of the country's size or the number of its people who want to immigrate. Under that rule, tiny Singapore is entitled to as many green cards yearly as China.

The USCIS defines a backlogged case as one that's been in the works longer than six months. That means immigrants from small countries who are applying to join their families face a fairly speedy route through the immigration system. But for those long-waiting Filipinos and Mexicans, the wait could be almost as long as ever. –June Kronholz

September 15, 2006, 11:40 am Activists Call for IMF/World Bank Boycott

Antipoverty activists announce a boycott of the International Monetary Fund/World Bank annual meetings to protest Singapore's refusal to let some of them enter the country.

After massive antiglobalization demonstrations over the last decade, the international lenders have tried to incorporate nongovernmental organizations into their decision-making. But the relationship isn't always smooth.

Now 163 such groups say they won't participate in official events in Singapore. They had planned to raise concerns about the often-austere economic policies the IMF urges its 184 member nations to implement, as well as the environmental impact of dams and other big World Bank projects.

World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz condemned Singapore's "authoritarian" actions. "The one thing I think I would say is that a lot of that damage has been done to Singapore and it's self-inflicted," Wolfowitz told activists at a roundtable, before they walked out. "It is unacceptable."

An IMF spokesman said of the activist groups: "We have been having productive discussions, and we expect them to continue."

In a statement issued Friday, the World Bank said the Government of Singapore informed the organization that it will remove the objections to 22 of the 27 accredited civil society representatives whom they had previously said would be barred from participating in the annual meetings. "We are notifying those persons of their change in status," the World Bank said.

The World Bank said it would continue to urge the Government of Singapore to allow "all accredited individuals be permitted to participate," because "open dialogue with civil society is important for the effective operation of our institutions." –Michael M. Phillips

September 15, 2006, 11:31 am Gee, Thanks

For a moment, imagine that you are state Sen. Joy Padgett of Ohio. You're 59 years old and you've been kicking around local politics for years, paying your dues in both the state House and Senate. After all this time you've finally got a shot at the big-time, the local congressman has retired and endorsed you for the job.

Unfortunately, that congressman is Bob Ney, a six-term member who was forced to resign earlier this year over his shady dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. And on Thursday, the day you win a special primary, beating four other candidates for the chance to take on Democratic lawyer Zack Space to win Ney's seat in November, lawyers close to his case begin leaking word that he will plead guilty to federal criminal conspiracy charges Friday. Plus, he's now in rehab.

Do you:

a.) Curse, letting loose such a long string of expletives that even your 20-something campaign staffers look on in awe

b.) Call state party leaders to complain Ney's trying to torpedo your campaign

c.) Put on a brave face, telling reporters you have no need to distance yourself from the Ney scandal since voters in the district know and trust you

d.) All of the above

Washington Wire is betting Padgett goes with option "c," although it would be hard to blame her for choosing "d" instead.

The AP, which caught up with Padgett this morning in Columbus, reports that she wouldn't comment on the Ney case but says she doesn't worry about distancing herself from the former congressman. "I don't think I have to do that at all. There was an attempt in 2004 to try to Velcro me to (Republican Gov.) Bob Taft, and that didn't work," she said. –Amy Schatz

September 15, 2006, 11:22 am Bush Approval Rating Rebounds

President Bush's job-approval rating rebounded in the latest Harris Interactive poll, rising to 38% from 34% in August. The poll numbers come in the wake of a Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll that also showed a modest gain, following a series of speeches by President Bush on the Iraq war.

Still, less than one-third of those polled believe the country is going in the right direction–but that's up from last month's 26%. The Harris Interactive poll surveyed 1,004 U.S. adults by telephone from Sept. 8 to Sept. 11.

Capitol Hill figures of both parties, as well as cabinet officials, continued to draw low marks. The top issues on Americans' minds? Iraq–though down slightly–followed by the economy, health care and immigration.

September 15, 2006, 6:00 am The Power of Markets

Whether it's President Bush talking more about terrorism, gas prices dropping or something else, Republicans have improved their prospects of holding onto both houses of Congress in recent weeks, according to an analysis of trading in the Iowa Electronics Market by Moody's Economy.com.

As of Thursday, traders placed a 49% probability that Republicans will lose seats in the House, down from 56% a month ago. In the Senate, where only one-third of the seats are up for grabs, traders see only a 16% likelihood that Republicans will lose seats, down from 27% in August. The probability of Republicans holding onto their current total of 55 seats rose to 73% last night from 67% last month.

The IEM is a Web-based, real-money futures market operated for research purposes by professors at the University of Iowa. Investors can trade between $5 and $500 in a variety of futures contracts, such as whether the unemployment rate will drop or whether the Federal Reserve will raise interest rates later this month, and it opens trading on political outcomes in the months leading up to a major election. Probabilities are determined based on where traders put the price of a typical contract.

Think it doesn't have solid predictive power? Think again. On the eve of the 2004 presidential election, traders forecast President Bush would receive 50.45% of the vote to Sen. John Kerry's 49.55%. Pretty spot on. –Christopher Conkey

September 15, 2006, 12:00 am Poll Finds Support for Iran Strike

Voters talk tough on Iran's nuclear program.

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 54% say U.S. should strike militarily if necessary to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Support reaches 62% if U.S. joins international coalition.

Military officials warn a successful strike might only set back Iran's program, not halt it, and prompt Iranian retaliation in Iraq. But "even people who are for troop withdrawals" from Iraq back military action through a coalition, says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts Journal/NBC survey with Republican Bill McInturff.

Though Independents and Republicans would back unilateral strike, Democrats are opposed.

Democratic leaders remain elusive foils for Republican barbs.

Seven in 10 voters don't know top Senate Democrat Reid or have no strong feelings about him; six in 10 say the same of House leader Pelosi, who Republican strategists call out of touch with mainstream. House Speaker Hastert is similarly anonymous.

Senate Majority Leader and 2008 hopeful Frist has better name recognition but split ratings, 21% positive and 23% negative. Voters cite deficit and Iraq policy as biggest fears if Republicans keep control of Congress, gridlock and premature Iraq withdrawal if Democrats take over.

Voters want Wal-Mart to face tougher government oversight.

After criticism from unions and liberal activists, 52% say companies like Wal-Mart "should be reviewed and regulated more" over adequacy of health and pension benefits. That includes majorities of women, Southerners, and rural voters; even 41% of conservatives agree.

By 50% to 45%, voters earning more than $75,000 a year say companies should set their own standards. The Midwest is most sympathetic to that view. Two-thirds of all voters say they've patronized the retailer in the last month.

Overall, Wal-Mart is rated positively by 45%-31%, though Target enjoys stronger image at 51%-10%.

DEMOCRATIC COMRADES: Kerry taps list of three million donors to boost fellow veteran-politicians. An email appeal yields more than $200,000 in 72 hours for Congressional candidates in New York, Pennsylvania and California. By 77%-17%, voters who backed Kerry two years ago favor reducing troops in Iraq.

DIPLOMAT IN CHIEF? Bush and Rice visit U.N. next week to prod allies for sanctions on Iran. Some 31% of voters rate Bush highly as "a world leader," down from 36% a year ago and 49% before the Iraq war.

TAX TACTIC: Republicans weigh new gambit for cutting estate taxes. They might add measure to government funding resolution before leaving Washington for October campaigning. Among voters earning $30,000 or less, just one-third approve Bush's handling of the economy and back Republicans for Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0065374

NOT COMPLAINING: Despite controversy over imprisonment and interrogation of detainees, 54% of voters credit Bush administration with "the right course," while only 34% say administration has "gone too far." But by 51%-41%, voters oppose terror trials where suspects couldn't attend or view evidence.

Voters fault corporations, more than Washington, for widening income inequality.

Three in ten blame "excessive salaries and bonuses" for gap between highest-income workers and others. Another 26% say overseas competition, twice the 12% who cite Bush administration and Congress.

Tracking Democratic rhetoric, voters show increasing concern about the gap; one in four call it America's biggest economic problem, virtually matching the share who say energy costs. In international economic speech, Treasury Secretary Paulson says narrowing disparities is "the responsibility of all nations."

By 47%-36%, voters rate Bush poorly for "being compassionate enough to understand average people."

MINOR MEMOS: State whips Pentagon in battle of bureaucratic chiefs; Rice's positive rating rises to 55% from 48% in May 2004, while Rumsfeld's falls to 31% from 39%. Cheney's 50% negative rating exceeds that of both administration colleagues. – John Harwood

September 14, 2006, 7:29 pm Ballot Battle in Pennsylvania

Pennsylvania's Green Party candidate for Senate can't appear on the Nov. 7 ballot unless he can prove to a state court that nearly 3,000 signatures on his nominating petitions are indeed valid.

That's a big issue for Democrats, who worry that Carl Romanelli could siphon crucial votes from their candidate, Bob Casey Jr., who's locked in a tight race with Rick Santorum, the Republican incumbent. "We feel very strongly that [Romanelli's] candidacy will take away votes from Bob Casey and we're hopeful the court agrees with us," said Pennsylvania Democratic Party spokesman Abe Amoros.

Democrats filed suit challenging signatures on Romanelli's petition for listing on the ballot. A month-long review found some 30,000 invalid signatures — ones that are faked, illegible, or aren't those of registered voters — leaving him about 3,000 signatures short of the 67,070 needed. Romanelli lawyer Lawrence M. Otter argues that some of the signatures were incorrectly labeled invalid.

Pennsylvania Democrats accuse Santorum and the Republicans of helping Romanelli's climb to the ballot by financing the candidate's signature campaign and helping in the petition drive.

The Romanelli camp has until his scheduled Sept. 25 court date to rehab the 3,000 mislabeled signatures.

In the meantime, Romanelli's not showing concern. "I am confident I will remain on the ballot — definitely," he said. – Erika Lovley

September 14, 2006, 6:07 pm Dueling Letters Over Judicial Appointee

Trying to revive the nomination of one of President Bush's most controversial judicial appointments, a group of 18 retired military officers sent a letter to top Senate Judiciary Committee members in support of Williams J. Haynes II.

Yesterday's letter sought to debunk a July letter signed by 19 retired military officers that expressed "deep concern" with Haynes' nomination. Haynes, general counsel to the Defense Department, was first nominated to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in 2003, but his nomination has stalled over apprehension about his involvement in crafting legal policies toward detainees in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

According to the July letter, "Mr. Haynes was arguably in the strongest position of any other senior government official to sound the alarm about the likely consequences for military personnel of the views being put forward by the Justice Department" offering legal cover for the use torture during interrogations. Haynes also helped craft the military commission system the Supreme Court struck down in June for departing from the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Yesterday's letter said the July letter created a "highly misleading impression of Jim Haynes" by "asserting that Jim ignored the advice of Judge Advocates with respect to the policy on interrogation of detainees." This morning, the Senate Judiciary Committee was scheduled to discuss Mr. Haynes and four other appeals court candidates President Bush re-nominated earlier this month. The committee could not reach a quorum. – Ben Winograd

September 14, 2006, 5:58 pm FCC's Martin Says AT&T-BellSouth Review on Track

A federal judge's ongoing review of two telecom deals won't slow the government's review of AT&T's pending $67 billion deal to acquire BellSouth Corp., Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin said Thursday.

In a conference call with UBS investors and analysts, Martin was asked about whether a federal judge's antitrust review might delay the government's review of AT&T's current acquisition. The court review focuses on the Justice Department's approval of the SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp. deal as well as Verizon Communication Inc.'s purchase of MCI Inc.

Noting the FCC hopes to complete its review of the BellSouth deal by mid or late October, Mr. Martin said the court review wasn't a problem. "It doesn't really have an impact from our agency's standpoint," he said. "There's not a deadline for us other than a self-imposed" 180-day clock. — Amy Schatz

September 14, 2006, 4:41 pm Run, Don't Walk

The Republican National Committee issued a call to arms, part of its much-admired get-out-the-vote effort. The RNC's "September Sprint to Victory" asks supporters to hold house parties, set up a home-based phone bank and go door-to-door in their neighborhoods in support of local Republican candidates.

Acknowledging that most people have lives to lead and aren't going to put them on hold for political races, Republicans are offering supporters three ways to help (beyond the obvious option of giving $$). There is Turnout Tuesday, in which you can invite a few friends over and turn your house into a mini-call center, using your cellphones; House Party Thursdays, where absentee ballots can be distributed or local candidates invited to speak; or Super Saturday on Sept. 30, which features a walk around the 'hood to spread the word before "invit(ing) folks back home to watch the big game."

Not clear what game that is, although it's a safe bet it's on a campus and involves a football. The volunteer who makes "the biggest impact" during the drive–including volunteers recruited, new voters registered, etc. – will "receive a special surprise gift autographed by President Bush ," (RNC's emphasis).

A spokeswoman said the campaign was an "invaluable part of our broader effort to contact millions of voters in the coming days." She declined to provide any hints about the special prize (although we note the RNC loves handing out autographed photos). –Amy Schatz

The Bush administration says proposed rules on electronic stability control systems for all new passenger vehicles would save between 5,300 and 10,300 lives annually and prevent between 168,000 and 252,000 injuries.

Electronic stability control, already available on some vehicles, helps keep cars from veering out of control and tipping over. The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration proposal would require manufacturers to begin installing the technology on September 14, 2006, 2:21 pm Seeing Red in Pennsylvania

Recently, it seemed like Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum was gaining some momentum in his effort to hold his seat from challenger Bob Casey Jr., the Democratic state treasurer. Warm and fuzzy television ads that played all over the state this summer (see "Polka" and "Hoedown") were widely credited with reintroducing the conservative Republican in a good way to the state — and erasing the scary double-digit lead Casey had built-up. When the two debated for an hour on NBC's Meet the Press, many political observers dubbed the Sept. 3 match a draw.

Santorum

Which brings us to a negative television ad the senator's campaign launched yesterday, dubbed "Corner Bar." It suggests Casey's political team contains a bunch of unethical hacks who are halfway to landing in a jail cell, if they aren't there already. It will be interesting to see what–if any–impact this has on the race, particularly given that one of the allegedly shady characters on Team Casey has apparently been dead for almost two years. –Amy Schatz

September 14, 2006, 2:02 pm Michele Davis Tapped for Treasury Post

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has picked Michele A. Davis for the top public affairs position in the department, a role she filled during the tumultuous tenure of President Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill. Bush is expected to announce his intent to nominate her for the assistant secretary's post this afternoon. The position requires Senate confirmation.

While it's a job title she's held before, Davis is expected to play an expanded role, serving as a senior strategist for Paulson on policy as well as communications matters. Davis has been serving as deputy national security advisor at the White House's National Security Council. After leaving Treasury the first time, Davis served as senior vice president of regulatory policy at mortgage giant Fannie Mae. She also served as communications director for former House Majority Leader Richard Armey, (R., Texas).

September 14, 2006, 11:59 am Paulson: Fodder for Bloggers

In a blog post on RGEmonitor.com, Brad Setser praises parts of Wednesday's speech by the new Treasury secretary, but pokes a couple of holes.

Paulson

"It was rather surprising that Paulson's speech didn't explicitly allude to any risks from the rising financial imbalances that have been associated with the current form of globalization. After all there is no intrinsic reason why globalization implies that emerging economies should be financing the world's advanced economies," he says. "I was a bit concerned that Paulson may be putting a bit too much emphasis on domestic capital market reform and opening up China's domestic banking markets to foreign competition and too little emphasis on currency reform…..(L)etting US financial institutions operate Chinese banks won't do much (if anything) to address the concerns of American auto parts workers. …

"Above all, though, I was struck by the irony of the United States – and particularly the Bush Administration – emphasizing how important it is that all countries like up to their international responsibilities…. Wasn't the Bush Administration elected, in part, to make sure that the United States own policies – including its economic policies — weren't subject to any global tests?"

And Brad Delong, the Berkeley blogger who did a stint at the Clinton Treasury, writes that Paulson "appears to have decided to be Secretary of the U.S.-China Relationship. It's an honorable job, and one well worth his considerable talents." Why this approach? "Given the White House he has to deal with, he can do nothing to undo the disastrous fiscal policies of the Bush administration," DeLong suggests. "Given the White House he has to deal with, he can do nothing to bring the resources devoted to entitlement programs into long-run balance with the spending plans of the programs."

At billsdue, a blog that focuses on the improbable combination of China and video games, comes this nugget: "He was definitely trying to speak in language the Chinese government understands, and even cribbed a phrase almost directly from the latest Hu-Wen economic stump speech: China needs a more harmonious, more balanced pattern of growth that gives Chinese households more income and the confidence to spend it."

The blog maintained by the National Association of Manufacturers – whose chief, John Engler, attended the speech, was full of praise: "a clear appreciation of the place and of the nuances of the global trading system." Foreign Policy magazine's blog boiled 4,000 words of rhetoric into a single sentence: "Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson to China: We want you to succeed." – David Wessel

September 14, 2006, 11:21 am Remembering Ann Richards

Richards It's slightly too early in the day for the Washington Wire to imbibe, but we're raising a margarita tonight (frozen, no salt), in honor of Ann Richards, a true giant of Texas politics and one of the wittiest pols in the business, Democrat or Republican. President Bush, who ended her political career by defeating her in the 1994 governor's race and became her verbal pincushion, had nice words to say.

The 73-year-old former governor died yesterday from esophageal cancer, and the Texas statehouse political reporters paid homage today in Dallas, Austin and Houston.

Here's a sampling of the governor's greatest lines, beyond her classic: "Ginger Rogers did everything that Fred Astaire did. She just did it backwards and in high heels."

"I thought I knew Texas pretty well, but I had no notion of its size until I campaigned it."

"I have always had the feeling I could do anything and my dad told me I could. I was in college before I found out he might be wrong."

"Poor George [H.W. Bush], he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

"There is a lot more to life than just struggling to make money."

"I did not want my tombstone to read, 'She kept a really clean house.' I think I'd like them to remember me by saying, 'She opened government to everyone.'"

September 14, 2006, 6:00 am 54 Days Left to Go

Seven-term Republican congressman Jack Kingston's Georgia seat doesn't exactly appear to be in jeopardy. Running against Democrat Rev. Jim Nelson, a United Methodist pastor and author ("Where Would Jesus Put the Sidewalks? A Study Of Faith and Politics"), political prognosticators suggest Kingston needn't give up his Washington digs.

Never hurts to reward the faithful, however, which is why Kingston's campaign committee sent out a desktop flip calendar this summer so supporters could track the last 100 days until Election Day—from Sunday, July 30 to Tuesday, Nov. 7.

DOJ_NMG_0065378

Dubbed "100 Reasons to Vote Republican," the calendar is liberally sprinkled with quotes from prominent conservatives, including Rush Limbaugh and President Reagan (Aug. 11: "It has been said that politics is the second oldest profession. I have learned that it bears a striking resemblance to the first." Sept. 21: "The trouble with our liberal friends is not that they're ignorant: It's just that they know so much that isn't so."). It's peppered, too, with quotes from those on the other end of the spectrum, including Dixie Chick Natalie Maines (Sept. 14: "The entire country may disagree with me, but I don't understand the necessity for patriotism.").

The calendar has 200 pages, but the ones after Nov. 7 are blank. Unfortunately, the Friends of Jack Kingston apparently couldn't fill all 200 of them with reasons to vote Republican.

"It's for notes," explained Rob Asbell, a Kingston spokesman, who said this is the second campaign in which the congressman has sent out the calendar/notepad to supporters. — Amy Schatz

Critics Of War Spare Senator In Close Race (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

SEATTLE, Sept. 18 — Even as Senator Maria Cantwell of Washington has faced frequent criticism for having voted for the war in Iraq, her re-election campaign appears to be benefiting from a cold dose of pragmatism among many of her fellow Democrats.

After looking east to Connecticut, where another supporter of the war, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, lost the Democratic primary last month, many Democrats here say attacking Ms. Cantwell in Tuesday's primary seems flat-out foolish because it could benefit the well-financed Republican challenger in November.

"Those people were looking for a reason to vote for her anyway," said Hong Tran, an antiwar advocate running against Ms. Cantwell who has stayed in the primary race despite polling in the low single digits and raising about $40,000.

Cathy Allen, a longtime Democratic consultant here who is not involved directly in the race, said, "If anything, what you would succeed in is poking yourself in the eye."

After all, unlike in Connecticut, the question here is not whether another Democrat will unseat Ms. Cantwell. Instead, the wild card is whether antiwar opponents will peel away enough support to leave her vulnerable to the Republican opponent, Mike McGavick, a former insurance executive who recently put $2 million of his own money into his campaign.

With a practical eye on that very different political reality, Ms. Cantwell and many of her antiwar critics have moved closer to each other, and the senator's lead over Mr. McGavick has increased to double digits in some polls.

If the primary in Connecticut proved the power of the war issue among Democrats, it has not necessarily been a template for other prominent races in which Democrats have been criticized for their war stance.

"People are not saying 'Throw the bums out' in these other races," said James H. Dean, chairman of Democracy for America, the national coalition that played a crucial role in Ned Lamont's victory in the Connecticut primary.

"In Connecticut," Mr. Dean said, "we didn't have to worry about a Republican becoming a senator."

Mr. Lamont had voter demographics, liberal bloggers and a strong grass-roots operation on his side. And he had money, putting $4 million of his own into his campaign.

Here in Washington, the two most prominent antiwar candidates still running against Ms. Cantwell are polling in the low single digits and have little money. One, Aaron Dixon, is a former Black Panther who is running as the Green Party nominee in the general election in November on an antiwar platform. The other is Ms. Tran, a lawyer for a nonprofit organization who said that if she lost she would vote for Ms. Cantwell.

Ms. Cantwell, who was first elected in 2000 by just 2,229 votes, has strong union support and has won praise from environmentalists for helping to fight oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

With Washington's history of close elections, both national parties consider the race critical and plan to spend time and money here this fall.

The war is far from the only campaign issue. Democrats and outside analysts say Mr. McGavick has stumbled in discussing events in his past, while some Republicans say Ms. Cantwell has had a recent rise in the polls largely because she ran new television advertisements when Mr. McGavick was off the air.

Ms. Cantwell had $5.1 million in her campaign account at the end of August, compared with about $2.8 million for Mr. McGavick, including his own money.

The first lady, Barbara Bush, campaigned over the summer for Mr. McGavick, as have Republicans including Senators Bill Frist of Tennessee and John McCain of Arizona. Former President Bill Clinton and other Democrats have campaigned on behalf of Ms. Cantwell.

Asked whether Ms. Cantwell had changed her position on the war, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said: "No, I think people have become more familiar with her position. And unlike Joe Lieberman, she has not been afraid to criticize the president on the war."

Still, Ms. Cantwell has made a clear effort to offset antiwar opposition.

" 'Do you really want a Republican representing Washington?' That's the question she's asking," said Chad Lupkes, a Washington coordinator for Democracy for America.

In July, Ms. Cantwell hired two of her potential Democratic primary challengers, both critics of the war, to work on her campaign. The move drew charges from both sides that she was paying off opponents; one of those hired, Mark Wilson, is paid $8,000 a month. The other person hired was Dal LaMagna.

Mr. Wilson, now a Cantwell campaign outreach director, did not respond to a request for an interview. Mr. Lupkes said Mr. Wilson was far from a sellout. He said it had been "critical" for Mr. Wilson to join the Cantwell campaign.

"The progressives really want to learn how the system works," Mr. Lupkes said. "You've got a bunch of people who say that the war is their top, only issue. Those people are fools. They're going to vote for Aaron Dixon. Maybe 5 percent of the vote goes for him?"

Ms. Cantwell has made other overtures to antiwar voters. On Aug. 9, the day after Mr. Lamont won in Connecticut, she was among many Democrats nationwide who congratulated the new nominee. Six days after that, she released a statement on her campaign blog about her initial vote in favor of authorizing the war in Iraq: "If I knew then everything that I know today and the Republican leadership still brought it up for a vote, I would have voted no."

The comments echoed those of other Democrats in Washington who voted for the war, but for Ms. Cantwell they were new.

Michael Meehan, her campaign strategist, said the comments did not reflect a shift in her position. Rather than playing "a hypothetical game of looking backwards," Mr. Meehan said, the senator "thinks it was more important to say, 'How are you going to hold them accountable now?' "

DOJ_NMG_0065380

Ms. Cantwell, in a brief interview after attending a Labor Day picnic with union members in Chehalis, about 85 miles southwest of Seattle, said her position on the war had not changed this year but that campaigning during the August break had helped her clarify her stance with voters.

She said she supported a Senate resolution in November calling for 2006 to be a "period of significant transition to full Iraqi sovereignty." She backed a Democratic plan in June calling for troops to start coming home this year. And in July, she sponsored a measure with Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware that said no permanent American military bases would be established in Iraq.

Mr. McGavick, who has largely echoed Ms. Cantwell's views on the war, has been on the defensive himself recently.

Last month, his voluntary acknowledgment that he had been charged with driving under the influence of alcohol in Maryland more than a decade ago backfired somewhat after The Herald of Everett, Wash., reported that he had not disclosed all the details of the arrest. The newspaper reported that Mr. McGavick had also run a red light, had been handcuffed and had fallen asleep at the police station.

"I fully disclosed everything I remembered, period," Mr. McGavick said in an interview.

Mr. McGavick and Ms. Cantwell disagree on several national issues. Mr. McGavick has accused the senator of helping kill a Senate bill that would have increased the federal minimum wage, while Ms. Cantwell has said the bill would have cut incomes for workers who earn tips. Mr. McGavick supports letting some workers invest in voluntary private accounts as part of Social Security, an idea Ms. Cantwell opposes.

Republicans have portrayed Ms. Cantwell as a tax-and-spend liberal, while Democrats have cast him as a cheerleader for President Bush.

Beyond specific policy differences, Mr. McGavick said his campaign was centered on "the need for civility and the need for common sense and problem solving."

"That's what has gotten me this far," he said, "and that's what will carry me on to victory."

He acknowledged that dissent among Democrats could help him. "They're not going to take votes from me," he said.

Ms. Cantwell drew criticism from Republicans, too, after The Associated Press reported that she once lent $15,000 to $50,000 to Ron Dotzauer, a lobbyist and political consultant, and later helped steer federal money to his clients. The senator's staff has said there is no connection between the loan and the federal spending.

But with the senator and some of her antiwar critics now appearing less divided, said Mark A. Smith, an associate professor of political science at the University of Washington, Mr. McGavick may need to sharpen his message.

"I think he's almost hoping for self-immolation on the Democratic side," Mr. Smith said. "That seemed like a pretty decent strategy three or four months ago. I don't think that looks like such a decent strategy now."

Cantwell Polls Higher As She Adjusts War View (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, September 19, 2006

Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) does not face nearly as strong an anti-war primary challenger today as Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) did a month ago, but she has taken about as much flak for her support of the war in Iraq.

Cantwell, who like Lieberman comes from a blue state with a strong anti-war segment of the electorate, has sought, unlike him, to distance herself from the unpopular war.

Her opponents say that the shifts are cosmetic, but Cantwell's poll numbers have jumped in recent weeks, undermining what had been Republicans' hopes of a dramatic pick-up in the Senate.

Today's primary, which includes anti-war Democrat Hong Tran, could provide an indication of how many anti-war Democrats remain unhappy enough with Cantwell to cast a protest vote against her. She will face two third-party anti-war candidates in November, and in a close race that could cost Cantwell her seat.

While Cantwell and her Republican rival, Mike McGavick, have been polled as close as four percentage points from each other recently, Cantwell enters the primary leading by 17 points, 52-35, according to an independent Rasmussen Reports poll released last Tuesday. The results closely resemble a SurveyUSA poll from late August, which had Cantwell up 53-36.

McGavick's campaign attributed the poll results to his decision to reveal his 1993 drunken driving arrest, and subsequent reports that show he misstated details of it. He said later it was due to faulty memory.

"That poll is a snapshot of a period immediately after Mike took what many called a courageous act in the self-revelation of mistakes and when we had just gone on TV in Seattle for the first time in months," McGavick spokesman Elliott Bundy said.

Cantwell's campaign said the bump is a result of the senator's increased visibility, in person and in ads.

The poll was also conducted before reports surfaced about Cantwell's role steering $11 million to projects that benefited clients of a lobbyist who had worked as her campaign manager. Ethics experts have criticized Cantwell, but she says she did nothing wrong.

However these issues play out, the war will continue to be at the forefront of the race.

In addition to the primary challenger, Cantwell will face two third-party anti-war candidates, the Green Party's Aaron Dixon and Libertarian Bruce Guthrie. Neither is likely to take more than a few percentage points in the general election, but their support could come almost exclusively at Cantwell's expense.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who like Cantwell has been criticized for not speaking out more forcefully against the war, took 83 percent of the vote in her primary against anti-war challenger Jonathan Tasini. But unlike Cantwell, Clinton does not face a difficult reelection bid.

Cantwell faced another anti-war Democrat, Mark Wilson, until he dropped his bid and joined her campaign in a paid position, a move criticized by her opponents.

Cantwell voted for the resolution authorizing President Bush to use force in Iraq and for subsequent spending bills, but in June she supported a Democratic amendment urging the president to begin troop withdrawals this year (Lieberman opposed it), and in the ensuing months has been more critical of the execution of the mission.

By July, she was calling for a "change of course," and in August, after McGavick said he would not have voted for the war if he knew then what he knows today, Cantwell recanted on earlier statements and agreed.

Both have rejected a call for immediate withdrawal but say if progress is not made this year, the mission should be reevaluated.

Cantwell's spokeswoman, Katharine Lister, said the difference between Cantwell and McGavick is that McGavick is for "staying the course" while Cantwell and congressional Democrats are holding the administration responsible.

But both Dixon and McGavick said Cantwell still holds a view on Iraq that barely differs from McGavick's.

"I do think that she's been trying to moderate her position, and if she continues to, then we will be in disagreement," said McGavick, a former Safeco CEO. "But there's nothing that is substantive yet."

Dixon, a community activist and former Black Panther Party leader, said he has noticed Cantwell trying to shift her stance, so far without significant steps. He said he hopes she will support an immediate withdrawal.

"The war is becoming so unpopular … we're just hoping that she is beginning to listen to them," Dixon said. "But her record has proven that she's not to be trusted."

Dixon said part of his campaign's purpose was to "put some pressure" on Cantwell. He said he's not wary of stealing votes from her in November because the two major parties haven't differed much and the country needs a multi-party political system.

The SurveyUSA poll showed Dixon and Guthrie each taking 3 percent of the vote.

Party Rival Says Cantwell Deserves To Lose Over War (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

SEATTLE -- Hong Tran tells voters she is giving them an opportunity to "Vote no on war" in today's Democratic primary election for U.S. Senate.

Though she knows she is highly unlikely to beat incumbent Sen. Maria Cantwell, she says her fellow Democrat's October 2002 vote in favor of the Iraq war is worthy of electoral punishment.

Mrs. Tran has received little of the national attention enjoyed by anti-war candidate Ned Lamont, who used that momentum to beat Sen. Joe Lieberman in the Connecticut Democratic primary, but she campaigns on a similar message.

DOJ_NMG_0065382

"The war is a big issue for all voters, not just Democratic voters, and it's really dismaying that Maria Cantwell is so out of step with people," Mrs. Tran said yesterday. "She is completely unresponsive to her constituency, and we need to have someone stronger as our senator."

Miss Cantwell on Aug. 15 released a statement about her vote authorizing President Bush to use force in Iraq.

"If I knew then everything that I know today," she said on her Web site, "I would have voted no."

She said the United States should start to bring troops home this year.

She also painted a difference between herself and Republican front-runner Mike McGavick, who is poised to win his own primary today.

"I am for changing the course in Iraq; my opponent is for staying the course," Miss Cantwell said. "The Iraqis must take over responsibility for their own security this year."

In addition to the war, Mrs. Tran disagrees with the freshman senator on trade policy, and says Miss Cantwell votes to help special interests instead of working people.

Miss Cantwell has the money, name recognition and the state and national party machines behind her, all things that will probably propel her to victory today. She also currently holds a wide lead over Mr. McGavick.

But several voters here said they will issue a "protest" vote for Mrs. Tran, a lawyer with a nonprofit agency, to send a message they are frustrated with their senator.

"I'm sure not going to vote for her in the primary, because she voted for the Iraq war," saidlongtime Democrat Toni Ameslav of Seattle, a medical social worker. "I don't know what I'll do in the general election. I definitely won't vote Republican, but I might just stay home."

Miss Cantwell held a weekend rally with Sens. Patty Murray of Washington and Barbara Boxer of California, but then returned to the Capitol for her "day job," according to campaign staffers. Instead of doing the last-minute campaigning yesterday and today, she sent in her own primary ballot by mail, as do most voters in the state.

Mrs. Tran says state and national Democrats have openly tried to keep her from getting attention, forbidding her from putting up signs at Democratic events. Miss Cantwell, whose campaign hired two of her early critics, has also refused to debate Mrs. Tran.

Democratic voter Steve Brunner, who works in interior design, said he completely disagrees with the administration's war policy, and called the Iraq conflict the "Vietnam of our generation."

Still, Mr. Brunner, 40, said he will "stick with" Miss Cantwell in the primary because she has a proven track record.

"Somebody needs to take back Republican control, and we can't lose this seat," he said. "I'd rather have a lousy Democrat than a good Republican."

Mrs. Tran, 40, said she is relying on grass-roots support and has not done much fundraising. She has radio ads running but nothing on television.

By contrast, Miss Cantwell has television ads blanketing the state saying she is an environmental leader and understands the plight of working people. She had more than $5 million in the bank as of Aug. 30.

Mr. McGavick, a former insurance executive and a millionaire like Miss Cantwell, had $2.8 million on hand at the end of August. He also is running TV ads portraying himself as independent-minded.

Mrs. Tran said she would not vote for a Republican in the general election, but added that if she does not win today, she will "certainly not" endorse Miss Cantwell.

Cantwell's Ties To Lobbyist Aired (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, September 19, 2006

Sen. Maria Cantwell's (D-Wash.) personal ties to a prominent Washington state lobbyist have come under intense scrutiny in recent weeks. But it is unclear if their friendship will hurt Cantwell re-election efforts.

Ron Dotzauer has been involved in every race Cantwell has ever run. Cantwell worked for him at his former consulting firm, Northwest Strategies. At one point they were a couple and when he fell on hard times financially, Cantwell loaned him money.

DOJ_NMG_0065383

When she sought to unseat then-Sen. Slade Gorton (R-Wash.) in 2000, Dotzauer shelved his business to manage Cantwell's campaign.

After their victory Dotzauer went on to found Strategies 360, a firm whose clients have secured more than $11.6 million in federal appropriations.

Republicans strategists think that in a year when GOP candidates have been on their heels for lobbyist ties — think superlobbyist-turned-felon Jack Abramoff and his tentacles, or disgraced former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) — the Cantwell-Dotzauer connection may blunt the image of the GOP as the party of special interests.

The case could be especially helpful to Republicans in the Evergreen State, where former insurance company CEO Mike McGavick (R) is campaigning as an outsider who is tired of partisan bickering and politics as usual in Washington, D.C.

"Maria Cantwell has bent over backwards to do the bidding of lobbyist Ron Dotzauer, even changing her vote on key legislation before the Senate," alleged Brian Nick, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee. "And while Cantwell delivers millions of dollars in earmarks for her lobbyist pal, his grateful clients have showered her with thousands of dollars in campaign contributions.

"If you're looking to build a federal lobbying client base, apparently it's good to know Maria Cantwell," he said.

Democrats say Republicans are looking for scandal where none exists. They also point out that McGavick is no political novice — he worked as Gorton's chief of staff and managed his successful 1988 campaign — and is hardly free from special interests, given his insurance industry background.

"McGavick's campaign is in the toilet so NRSC surrogates are grasping at any straws to take a shot at Sen. Cantwell," said Kelly Steele, a spokesman for the Washington state Democratic Party.

After showing some momentum, McGavick's campaign was dealt a setback in August when he volunteered past mistakes, including a traffic stop for driving under the influence.

But when reporters unearthed the actual police report, it showed that McGavick, in his mea culpa, left out some key details of the drunk driving incident, including the fact that he was arrested.

The focus in the campaign now seems to be back on Cantwell, which is exactly how national Republicans would have it.

"The Republicans are trying to keep it alive but it just hasn't shown up anywhere," said Stuart Elway, an independent Seattle-based pollster.

"It would be worse if he lent her the money," Elway added.

According to Cantwell's personal financial report, Dotzauer still owes her between $15,000 and $50,000.

Exactly what the loan was for is unclear. Dotzauer has said in the past that he could not remember.

He did not return a call seeking comment for this story.

According to Senate records, Dotzauer's career as a federal lobbyist coincides somewhat with Cantwell's time in federal office.

For instance, he had only two clients in 1995, the year after Cantwell lost her bid for a second term in the House. He then did not begin lobbying Congress again until 2002, two years after she was elected to the Senate.

Knowledgeable sources say that tracks with a difficult period in Dotzauer's personal life during which time his business suffered.

Cantwell's campaign dismisses the allegation that she did Dotzauer any special favors. Cantwell does not sit on the Senate Appropriations Committee, though Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) does.

Michael Meehan, Cantwell's senior political adviser, notes that the bulk of the appropriations under scrutiny were for projects supported by most the delegation — and Republicans back in the state.

Steele added: "Slade Gorton, George W. Bush and Rep. Dave Reichert all supported these appropriations; this is a pathetic smear."

Meehan also pointed out that the Senate Ethics Committee has never questioned the relationship between Cantwell and the lobbyist.

Since arriving in the Senate, Cantwell has reported the loan to Dotzauer, Meehan said.

"If the Ethics Committee hasn't had a problem with it, I don't think the voters of Washington state will have a problem with it," Meehan said.

Melanie Sloane, executive director of the watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, agreed that the appropriations appeared benign.

Nevertheless, she said Cantwell and all lawmakers need to be beyond reproach.

"In an ideal world she wouldn't let him lobby her and she'd get her money back," Sloane said. "Members should be more careful."

The financial connection does not end at the loan or the appropriations. Cantwell has also received at least $65,700 in campaign contributions from clients of Strategies 360, according to Federal Election Commission records.

Democrats say that is only logical given that Dotzauer's group represents many Pacific Northwest interests.

His clients include the Cascade Water Alliance, a nonprofit corporation representing municipalities in the suburban Lake Tapp area; Inologic, a biotechnology firm; and the West Coast Seafood Processors Association.

T.J. Petrizzo, a Republican lobbyist who has paired with Strategies 360 on occasion, says he does not believe Dotzauer's group gets any special access.

"We share a client and not once have I seen even an appearance of a conflict of interest," Petrizzo said.

Where's The Party? Nowhere To Be Found In Steele Ads (WP)

By Paul Farhi

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

In his latest TV commercial, Maryland senatorial candidate Michael Steele looks and sounds like a man running for talk show host. Seated informally on a big letter "S," jazzy music playing in the background, Steele takes a bold stand on . . . puppies.

"Hey, me again, Michael Steele," says the lieutenant governor, pretending to knock from the inside of the TV screen. "Soon your TV will be jammed with negative ads from the Washington crowd. Grainy pictures and spooky music saying, 'Steele hates puppies' -- and worse. For the record, I love puppies. And I think you deserve better -- some real ideas for change."

The slightly self-amused tone is just one of the things that make Steele's ads for his U.S. Senate campaign one of the more unusual of this, or any, election season. Political ads tend to come in two flavors: the kind in which candidates shake hands with supporters and embrace schoolkids, and the kind in which basso-voiced announcers warn that the opponent is bad news.

So far, Steele has taken a third approach: the candidate as your pal, the friendly, reasonable guy who's beyond politics.

In two of his first three campaign ads, Steele doesn't appear on the campaign trail or some other traditional political backdrop. He doesn't slam his Democratic opponent, Rep. Ben Cardin, or even mention that he has an opponent. Instead, he talks casually while perched on a stool or an oversize sculpture of his last name. The setting is odd and stark -- a blue-and-white backdrop that evokes the Nowhereland of Apple's iPod commercials (the Steele spots were shot in a local TV studio).

"I know what you're thinking," Steele says without a word of introduction in his first commercial, which debuted in late August. "I know what you're feeling. Washington has no clue of what's going on in your life. They blame each other, they work the angles while you're just trying to make today better than yesterday. . . . Instead of the spin, I'll talk straight about what's wrong in both parties."

The much buzzed-about spots -- created by veteran Republican adman Brad Todd of Alexandria's OnMessage Inc. -- are designed to reinforce Steele's assertion that he would be a different kind of senator. (That, in fact, is the title of the first commercial.)

To drive that message home, says political scientist Thomas Schaller, Steele had to break the conventions of political advertising. "These aren't just another red-white-and-blue, glad-hand-at-the-parade, here-are-my-three-talking-points-about-health-care ads," says Schaller, of the University of Maryland Baltimore County. "The fact is, people are talking about them and you're writing about them. That tells you how effective they are, and it compounds and magnifies their impact."

What's different, too, is what's not said in Steele's commercials.

The spots never mention that Steele is running as a Republican, or that he is the second-highest-ranking member of his party in Maryland. Or that he was once chairman of the Maryland Republican Party. Indeed, the word "Republican" doesn't appear anywhere on Steele's Web site, and his official bio omits his tenure as party chairman. When Steele won the Republican Senate primary last week, his campaign's official news release reported only that he won "his party's primary" without bothering to say which one.

This may be a bow to political reality. Registered Democrats outnumber Republicans by almost 2 to 1 in Maryland.

Steele also has played down any association with President Bush, whose approval ratings have been in a long slump. Steele's Web site notes the endorsements of two moderate Republicans, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, but never mentions that Bush helped raise $500,000 for his campaign last year.

Which prompts Cardin's campaign to accuse Steele of running from his party and his president. "Michael Steele's ads don't change the fact that he's a conservative Republican who has embraced President Bush's agenda," says Cardin spokesman Oren Shur, "from his support of the war in Iraq to his opposition to stem cell research to his endorsement of the president's plan to privatize Social Security."

Several other Republican candidates have been less than eager to wave the GOP banner this year. In New Jersey, Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr. calls himself an "Independent Reformer" in his ads. Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio uses the slogan "Independent Fighter for Ohio Families," while Rep. Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania and Rep. Vito Fossella of New York both use the same phrase, "Independent Fighter for Us."

Steele himself said to The Washington Post in July that running as a Republican candidate this year was akin to wearing "a scarlet letter" (he later maintained that he was joking). Nevertheless, his campaign says he is not trying to avoid the subject in his TV spots.

The ads emphasize that "he approaches issues as a different kind of candidate," said Steele's spokesman, Doug Heye. "What he has done is to build bridges against the things that divide us -- racial, economic and geographic. He has never made any bones about being a Republican."

High Stakes In Governors' Races (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, September 19, 2006

By many indicators, Democrat Jennifer Granholm should be heading for certain defeat in her reelection race as Michigan's governor. State unemployment is at 7.1 percent, well above the nation's 4.7 percent. Sixty percent of Michigan voters give Governor Granholm a negative job rating. And her Republican opponent, multimillionaire Dick DeVos, can spend freely - and has - to try to unseat her.

For sure, Granholm is in a tough race; she's probably the most embattled Democratic governor in the country. But in a year when Republican candidates nationally are laboring under an unpopular President Bush, an unpopular Iraq war, and negative perceptions about the national economy, even Granholm might survive. The latest polls show her either ahead or in a statistical dead heat against Mr. DeVos.

Overall, the Democratic Party may well emerge from the November elections with a majority of governors' seats for the first time since 1994.

The Republicans are "going to lose governors' seats, there's no question," says Jennifer Duffy, an expert on gubernatorial races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. She predicts a net Democratic gain of four to six seats.

Currently, the GOP majority in governors' mansions stands at 28 to Democrats' 22, but the Republican Party is defending far more seats this fall than are the Democrats. Of the 36 seats on the ballot, 22 are held by Republicans and 14 by Democrats. Among the 10 incumbents vacating their seats, nine are Republicans, including Alaska Gov. Frank Murkowski, who lost in a rare primary defeat for a sitting governor.

Unlike in the House and Senate, winning a majority of governors' seats holds mainly symbolic importance. But it is still in each party's interest to control as many governorships as possible. Governors' mansions are the training ground of future presidents. (Four of the past five presidents were ex-governors.) Governors who aren't running for president can lend the support of their local political infrastructure to politicians from their party who are.

DOJ_NMG_0065386

In the event of a disputed result in a key state, as happened in the past two presidential elections, having friendly statewide elected officials is a bonus.

Governors can also turn their states into laboratories for policy innovations with potential national applications.

New York is the Democrats' top takeover opportunity, with state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer running far ahead of former state Assembly minority leader John Faso to replace GOP Gov. George Pataki.

The Democrats' next best takeover hope is Ohio, where the state's retiring Republican governor, Bob Taft, has been mired in scandal and has at times posted single-digit job approvals. Nonpartisan political handicappers (Cook Political Report, Rothenberg Political Report, and CQPolitics.com) give the edge to Democrat Rep. Ted Strickland, despite the state's close partisan divide, as the beneficiary of a voter desire for change.

Beyond those two, analysts are less in accord, though they all list more Republican-held than Democratic-held seats as "potential takeovers."

Among Republican governors running for reelection, the most endangered is Robert Ehrlich of Maryland. Independent pollster Del Ali, who is based in Maryland, sees the state going back to its "true blue" roots this fall.

"This problem for Ehrlich is he's on the record supporting the war in Iraq, very strongly," Mr. Ali says. Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic nominee for governor, "will dig up all the video he had in 2005 talking about standing behind the president."

Among the other biggest Democratic pickup possibilities are Colorado, Arkansas, Massachusetts, and Alaska.

Besides Michigan, Republicans are most hopeful about taking over in Wisconsin and Iowa. In Wisconsin, Gov. Jim Doyle (D) has struggled with ethics charges - and though he has now been cleared of wrongdoing by the state ethics board, the odor of impropriety lingers in a state that prides itself on clean government. Muddying the picture for GOP challenger Rep. Mark Green is a recent judgment that he return $467,844 in donations from out-of-state political action committees, a ruling he is fighting in court. Polls show a tight race - and both men are pounding each other hard in ads.

The Republican Party is not pretending this will be an easy election year, at any level of government. And in races where a member of Congress is running for governor, that link to Washington can be an anchor around the congressman's neck.

Take Iowa, where Rep. Jim Nussle (R) and Iowa Secretary of State Chet Culver are dueling to replace retiring Gov. Tom Vilsack (D).

"Nussle's a good guy, but it [being a Republican in Congress] probably at the end sinks him," says Ali, who notes that the popular Vilsack will likely provide coattails for Mr. Culver. Still, Ali adds, the race is "closer than five points."

Phil Musser, executive director of the Republican Governors Association, predicts Mr. Nussle can overcome his Washington label by focusing on Iowa-specific proposals in areas such as the economy, energy, and education.

"It's not the best year to be running as a member of Congress for state office, but in the end it's about local issues," says Mr. Musser.

In Colorado, a Democratic pickup hope, Rep. Bob Beauprez (R) is struggling, too, with his Washington tag - perhaps more than Nussle is in Iowa - as he seeks to replace retiring Republican Gov. Bill Owens.

Independent Colorado pollster Floyd Ciruli sees Representative Beauprez losing traction in his governor's race, in a combination of local and Washington-related factors. On the local front, the state's fractured Republican Party has hurt Beauprez, and nationally, says Ciruli, "the war and just general aggravation with Republicans and the president are hurting him."

Still, the anti-Washington model doesn't apply everywhere. In Nevada, Rep. Jim Gibbons (R) doesn't seem to be suffering for his membership in Congress, and is leading in polls to replace retiring Gov. Kenny Guinn (R), whose coattails seem to be helping Mr. Gibbons.

"Guinn is a popular governor, and Gibbons is well known; the good economy in Nevada also helps Gibbons," says Ali. "It's Gibbons's race to lose. If he supports the war, he hasn't said [much] about it."

Confident Of Sweep, State Democrats Set Sights On Pataki And Bush (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065387

SMITHTOWN, N.Y., Sept. 18 — Chest-thumping leaders of the New York Democratic Party rallied here on Monday and predicted a clean sweep of statewide offices in the November election over the enemy — identified by one Democratic speaker after another as "the two Georges," Messrs. Bush and Pataki.

The party's tight focus on President Bush and Gov. George E. Pataki, instead of the actual Republican candidates this fall, is the latest sign of the low regard in which Democrats say they hold their opponents. They are so confident of outright victory that they are now shooting for bigger game — an electoral rebuke of Mr. Bush and Mr. Pataki.

The Democrats were also eager on Monday to convey a degree of party unity that they have not shown in years. Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic nominee for governor, called and asked Thomas R. Suozzi, the man he defeated for the nomination, to attend the party conclave, though the two men are not close.

Mr. Suozzi did not give a speech, but he did stand for a photo with Mr. Spitzer and an even greater foe, Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver.

It was not all unity, however: Andrew M. Cuomo, the Democratic nominee for attorney general, did not make the same gesture to invite his runner-up, Mark Green. Mr. Green said he had received no invitation to the event from anyone. Another failed candidate for attorney general, Sean Patrick Maloney, who said he had been invited by the state party, did show up, though he — unlike Mr. Green — has not ruled out running for office again.

The event, technically a business meeting, was striking in comparison with dealings among the Republicans. John Spencer, the Republican nominee facing Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, has refused to take telephone calls, including a concession call on primary night, from the woman he defeated, Kathleen Troia McFarland.

Both camps confirmed on Monday that Mr. Spencer had not called her back, with Spencer aides saying there was no point. Forty percent of Republicans voted for Ms. McFarland in last week's primary. During the campaign, she and her aides made some personally nasty remarks about Mr. Spencer, a former Yonkers mayor, and he openly resented her challenge.

Mr. Spencer's name did not even come up at the Democratic event; nor did that of John Faso, the Republican candidate for governor.

A poll released on Monday by the Siena Research Institute showed Mr. Spitzer with a lead of 51 percentage points over Mr. Faso, and Mrs. Clinton with a 29-point lead over Mr. Spencer. The poll, conducted by telephone, surveyed 625 likely New York voters and had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus four percentage points.

The Democrat facing the greatest competition this fall, Mr. Cuomo, led the rhetorical assault on Monday by telling hundreds of party faithful here that his opponent, Jeanine F. Pirro, was a lackey of the Republican leadership. Mr. Cuomo had a 17-point lead over Ms. Pirro in the Siena poll.

"My Republican opponent is a devout disciple of the Bush doctrine, and she is a protégée of George Pataki," Mr. Cuomo said. "We don't need a follower of the two Georges to lead us as the next attorney general."

While Ms. Pirro is a moderate Republican who favors abortion rights, Mr. Cuomo said after his speech that she is nevertheless a Bush supporter and that it is fair to hold her accountable for what he called administration failures to enforce clear air and clean water rules and ensure integrity in the financial markets.

In response, Ms. Pirro's spokesman, John Gallagher, said: "Andrew Cuomo is using phony political attacks to distract voters from paying attention to his failed record at HUD and his lack of experience as a prosecutor. It's sad."

In Albany on Monday, Ms. Pirro held a news conference calling the civil confinement of sex offenders "the most important public safety issue of our time." Ms. Pirro, a former district attorney of Westchester County, has sometimes seemed preoccupied by civil confinement, bringing it up frequently in remarks; she tried to explain why after a reporter asked if it was a more important safety issue than terrorism.

"Terrorism, obviously, is an overwhelmingly important issue for safety in New York," she said. "But as it concerns families, there isn't a family that I come across that isn't concerned about children going to school and possibly being abducted or confronting a sexual predator."

In Smithtown, Mr. Cuomo said that he also supported a civil confinement bill.

By and large, the Democrats focused on the politics of optimism instead of any substantive agenda. The chairman of the state party, Assemblyman Herman D. Farrell Jr., who was re-elected by the party to a new two-year term on Monday, said this would be a "historic year" for Democratic victories. Mr. Silver said "it would take the invasion of the body snatchers" for any Republican candidate for major office to win this year.

Mr. Spitzer said he looked forward to Speaker Silver being his partner, and joked that they would surely agree on everything; Mr. Silver is known as a skilled negotiator who fights for his own agenda. Democrats need to stay together because, he added, referring to Republicans, "the mess they're leaving behind is pretty bad."

Ryan Moses, the executive director of the State Republican Party, parried by tweaking the Democrats for their predictions of victory over Mr. Pataki in 2002 and Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg in 2005, neither of which came to pass.

Campaign Gifts From Big Insurer Elude The Limit (NYT)

By Mike Mcintire

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

New York law prevents corporations from contributing more than $5,000 a year to candidates for state office, but one of the world's largest insurance companies has skirted those limits in giving almost 20 times that amount to some of New York's most prominent politicians, according to a review of contribution data.

The company, American International Group, has enlisted dozens of obscure subsidiaries to distribute contributions, all drawn from a common A.I.G. bank account and often through sequentially numbered checks, totaling hundreds of thousands of dollars.

A.I.G. defends the contributions, which seem to comply with the law as interpreted by the State Board of Elections.

The donations in recent years include totals of $50,000 to the gubernatorial campaign of Attorney General Eliot Spitzer; $335,000 to those of Gov. George E. Pataki; $34,300 to the campaign of Lt. Gov. Mary O. Donohue; and $25,000 to the 2006 campaign of Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi.

Often, the subsidiaries' identities give no hint of their affiliation with A.I.G., making it difficult to determine the extent of A.I.G.'s giving. For example, 10 companies — with names like Green Hills Corporation and Yosemite Insurance — gave $5,000 checks to Mr. Spitzer's campaign on a single day in December 2003. The only clues that the checks came from a common source were that they all had sequential numbers and bore an address of 70 Pine Street in Manhattan, A.I.G.'s headquarters.

Those contributions were made before Mr. Spitzer's office began investigating insurance industry practices, including those of A.I.G., in mid-2004. A.I.G. has made no further contributions to the Spitzer campaign since then.

A.I.G. and 33 subsidiaries used the same approach to direct hundreds of thousands of dollars to Mr. Pataki's campaigns beginning in 2001, in six batches of sequentially numbered checks. A.I.G.-related companies have also contributed to the New York State Democratic Party and to several campaigns for the New York State Senate.

Joe Norton, a spokesman for A.I.G., said that although the company's subsidiaries use checks drawn from a common account maintained by A.I.G., the contributions are charged back to each subsidiary's budget, so that, ultimately, the money comes from the subsidiaries. He said, however, that even though the contributions were made by the subsidiaries, A.I.G. usually decided what candidates to support, a process he said was within the law.

"There's no requirement that decisions about contributions be made by the subsidiaries," Mr. Norton said. "The parent company can recommend that a contribution be made."

A.I.G.'s practices are an example of how corporations have found ways to get around contribution limits in New York's porous campaign finance laws.

Last month, Common Cause New York, a watchdog group, did an analysis showing how limited liability corporations, which are allowed to contribute up to $50,100 to a candidate, were becoming a preferred vehicle for individuals and partnerships to effectively double or triple their contributions. (L.L.C.'s are business entities that can be easily established and provide special tax benefits as well as limits on financial liability.)

As a conventional corporation, A.I.G. is bound by the limit of $5,000 in total campaign contributions each year. The state's election law permits subsidiaries, even those wholly owned by a parent company, to make their own contributions as well. But the elections board issued an opinion in 1977 clarifying that a subsidiary must not receive money from its parent to make the contributions.

DOJ_NMG_0065389

Rachel Leon, executive director of Common Cause New York, said A.I.G.'s methods, including the use of a common bank account to write checks for its subsidiaries, "clearly violate the spirit of the law."

"This is definitely one of those cases where it fails the common-sense test," she said.

While it is difficult to determine A.I.G.'s motivation in making contributions to state candidates, its business as an insurer is heavily regulated by state government. A.I.G., though it is based in New York, has also made contributions to candidates in other states and at the federal level.

Asked about the propriety of practices like those of A.I.G. in New York, Robert Brehm, a spokesman for the elections board, initially said that a determining factor would be whether the subsidiaries were making their own decisions, independent of the parent company, when contributing to candidates.

"The regulation and guideline is that the contribution come from a distinct group using its own money, not a situation where the parent company reaches down and makes the decision for them," he said. "What is important is who are the decision makers and that each distinct subsidiary is making those decisions."

But two lawyers with years of experience in New York election law said that the contributions appeared to be legal.

"There are no bright lines" in New York's laws governing contributions by subsidiaries, said Lawrence A. Mandelker, an election lawyer in New York City, adding that A.I.G.'s methods were "probably legal."

Kenneth A. Gross, a prominent election lawyer in Washington who has advised New York candidates on the state law, said there "is nothing that requires the decision to make the contribution be made independently" by each subsidiary.

As for the use of a common bank account, Mr. Gross said: "As long as the subsidiary is being charged back, say on the profit and loss statement, then the method that is used, whether it's through a single paymaster or a common check ledger, is not a concern to the New York Board of Elections."

Mr. Brehm later said that he "may have misspoke" on the issue of whether the subsidiary needs to make its own decisions. The board's position, he said, is that it is acceptable for parent companies to make decisions on contributions for their subsidiaries, since not all subsidiaries have executives on staff to make those decisions.

"The only requirement," he said, "is that the money a subsidiary uses to make a contribution must be its own and not come from the parent company."

The section of the law dealing with corporate contributions takes up only a couple of paragraphs and has been the subject of dispute over the years. In 1975, the board declined to issue an opinion on the legality of subsidiary contributions, saying the Legislature needed to clarify the law, whose intent was to limit the influence of corporations in politics.

But in 1977 the board issued an opinion saying that as long as a subsidiary was a "distinct legal entity," its contributions would not be counted against the limit imposed on its corporate parent.

The lone caveat was that the parent company could not "transfer funds to the subsidiary for the purpose of furthering the subsidiary's political activities," or vice versa.

Since then, the board has had a record of loosely interpreting contribution limits on corporations.

Three years ago, Matthew Lee, a lawyer and community advocate in the Bronx, filed a complaint with the board accusing a large housing lender of using 13 subsidiaries to improperly channel contributions to a number of state candidates. Mr. Lee said that his complaint went nowhere.

"I was amazed that this state agency couldn't seem to articulate a clear answer as to what the law is," he said.

An added wrinkle in the A.I.G. contributions is that two of the companies that made use of A.I.G.'s common account are not actually A.I.G. subsidiaries. Starr Technical Risk Agency and Starr Associates of Massachusetts, which together gave a total of $20,000 to the Spitzer, Pataki and Donohue campaigns, are affiliates of the privately owned C. V. Starr & Company, which is controlled by Maurice R. Greenberg, chairman of A.I.G. until 2005.

Before Mr. Greenberg's departure, the Starr companies shared office space, personnel and administrative services with A.I.G., whose brokerage commissions were the sole source of income for the companies, according to securities filings and news releases by A.I.G. Although not owned by A.I.G., the Starr entities would appear to fall within the election law's description of a subsidiary, as any corporation "financially supported, in whole or in part," by another company.

DOJ_NMG_0065390

Mr. Greenberg was ousted at A.I.G. after Mr. Spitzer and federal regulators accused the company of manipulating its accounting practices to raise its stock price.

Mr. Spitzer's campaign has said that its policy is not to accept contributions from anyone who is the subject of an investigation by the attorney general's office, but that it will not return contributions made by companies or individuals before they come under investigation.

Schwarzenegger Signs L.A. Schools Overhaul Into Law (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today signed a bill that gave the mayor of Los Angeles greater control over the Los Angeles Unified School District and could change how the city's 730,000 students are taught.

At a ceremony at the Central Library in downtown L.A., Schwarzenegger signed the bill that gives Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa a leading role among other mayors in the school district's affairs. The bill also gives Villaraigosa direct control over three high schools and their feeder schools.

"Today we are proclaiming a victory for the students of LAUSD and their parents. I want to congratulate Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa for having the vision and fortitude to put our children first with this effort to increase accountability in LA public schools," Schwarzenegger said in a statement.

"With this bill, schools with the biggest problems can get the most attention and direct oversight by the mayor, so he can focus on what counts — moving test scores up and dropout rates down."

The signing is the latest — but probably not the last -- step in the political infighting as Villaraigosa pushed to get a voice in educational affairs. The school board, which loses power under the bill, has said it will sue to overturn the measure whose constitutionality has been questioned.

The new bill, which goes into effect in January, is far less than Villaraigosa had sought to fulfill his election promise to take over the school district.

Instead of complete control, Villaraigosa will share authority with the school board, the superintendent and a newly created council of mayors. The superintendent will gain new budget responsibilities. The school board will have limited power to review the budget and no direct management of its own staff.

As the largest city in the district, Los Angles will have the most power on the new mayors council, but the L.A. mayor will need allies.

For example, the new district superintendent must be a consensus choice by Villaraigosa, a school board majority and the mayors of cities that constitute at least half of the district's students who live outside the city of Los Angeles.

The three high schools that the mayor will take over have yet to be named. The mayor's office has requested information on six high schools, district sources recently said. They are Crenshaw and Dorsey in South Los Angeles; Sylmar and Monroe in the San Fernando Valley; Belmont, west of downtown; and Roosevelt in Boyle Heights.

Ill feelings between the mayor's office and the district were apparent at the signing. The top school officials, who have opposed the bill, were absent.

Villaraigosa and Schwarzenegger had planned to stage the signing at Roosevelt High School, but the school board refused to allow one of its campuses to be used during school hours, forcing the ceremony to be moved to the library.

In a recent statement, board President Marlene Canter said, "Serious questions have been raised regarding the constitutionality of a number of the provisions," after the board voted 6 to 1 to sue to block the law.

The only school board member to support the mayor was Monica Garcia, a close ally.

"It makes sense to avoid implementing changes that could later be declared unconstitutional," Canter said. "As a number of interested parties have urged, we will ask the courts to review this measure and to determine the constitutionality of these provisions as quickly as possible."

DOJ_NMG_0065391

Even though it was expected, the signing presented some intriguing political problems. Republican Schwarzenegger, who is running for reelection and is courting Latino voters, has strongly backed Democratic Mayor Villaraigosa, who has endorsed his party's nominee, Phil Angelides.

The depth of Villaraigosa's support for Angelides is unclear because the mayor is considered a gubernatorial hopeful in 2010.

McCain's Stand On Detainees May Pose Risk For 2008 Bid (WP)

By Charles Babington And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Sen. John McCain's bid to position himself as the natural heir to President Bush as a wartime commander in chief and to court conservative leaders in advance of his likely 2008 presidential campaign has threatened to run aground in recent days, as the two men clash over how to detain and try terrorism suspects.

For months, McCain has been wooing Bush's donors, hiring his former advisers and standing by him in the Iraq debate. But the fragile rapprochement between two men who were once bitter rivals for the presidency is facing a sharp new test over McCain's rejection of Bush's pleas to let the administration interpret the Geneva Conventions as it sees fit.

The impasse, which has preoccupied Congress this month, is likely to be settled within a few days but could remain hanging when lawmakers adjourn in a few days. Either way, it is likely to carry a long echo -- especially if the senator from Arizona forces Bush to back down.

Substantively, the legislative battle will shape what limits the administration will face on its anti-terrorism policies in the final two years of Bush's term. Politically, McCain's willingness once again to confront Bush raises questions about how he will position himself toward the Republican Party's conservative base, which he has aggressively cultivated over the past year as he pursues the presidency.

In a reprise of criticism showered on McCain during his 2000 campaign, some prominent conservatives are branding him a disloyal Republican and an unreliable conservative because of his assertiveness on the detainee issue.

The senator's actions "are blocking our ability to gain from terrorist captives the vital information we need," said a front-page editorial Saturday in the Union Leader of Manchester, N.H., the largest newspaper in the state with the first presidential primary. Conservative radio talker Rush Limbaugh said Friday that opposition to Bush's approach "is going to go down as the event that will result in us getting hit again, and if we do, and if McCain, et al. , prevail, I can tell you where fingers are going to be pointed."

If McCain or his backers worry that such pointed criticism threatens his presidential hopes, they do not admit it, calling the issue a matter of principle on which the senator has had a long record. But his camp acknowledges being well aware of the potential political ramifications.

For now, those ramifications remain uncertain. McCain's maverick style has long been popular with GOP voters in New Hampshire, where he bested Bush in the 2000 primary, said Andy Smith, a pollster who directs the University of New Hampshire's Survey Center.

"I don't think this impacts him too much in New Hampshire," Smith said yesterday. Polls consistently show McCain well ahead of potential Republican rivals there, Smith said, and the Union Leader's once-feared editorial page "is nowhere near as strong as it used to be."

McCain's defiance of the administration could prove particularly troublesome in South Carolina, the early-primary state where Bush's hard-hitting attacks in 2000 killed McCain's momentum and put the Texas governor on the road to the White House. Yet McCain's most outspoken ally in the detainee dispute is the state's senior senator, freshman Republican Lindsey O. Graham, who spent years as a military lawyer.

In a telephone interview from South Carolina yesterday, Graham said: "What I hear is, people respect the commitment of the president to the [CIA interrogation] program, and they respect my commitment and Senator McCain's commitment to the troops."

Graham added: "Every editorial in the state has understood Senator McCain's and my concerns, and believe they are legitimate." The Geneva Conventions say wartime detainees must be "treated humanely." Bush says the United States complies so long as CIA interrogators abide by a 2005 law barring "cruel, inhuman, or degrading" treatment of captives. McCain and his allies say that the requirement is too narrow, and that they are concerned Bush's approach would invite other nations to interpret the conventions in lax ways that could lead to abusive treatment of captive U.S. troops.

Joined by virtually all 44 Senate Democrats, McCain and his supporters appear to have a solid majority in the 100-member chamber, where Bush's initiative is stalled.

From the moment the Supreme Court ruled in June that the Geneva Conventions cover U.S. detainees, the White House understood that McCain -- who was tortured as a Vietnam War prisoner -- would be the key voice on the issue. Bush aides hoped to persuade him to follow their approach. But they said they were not surprised when he did not, and in recent days they have been tempered in their comments about him.

"There's no question of motives that there may have been a couple years ago," said a senior administration official, who declined to speak for attribution about a powerful senator. "My sense is, this is paining him and this pains us. Neither of us wants to be in the position to have to do this and have it spill out into public."

If anything, the White House appears more irked by Graham, who Bush advisers believed had been supportive of their position until a few weeks ago. But the White House did not shy away from a fight with McCain, convinced that the politics would favor the president's side.

"They're not spooked by the opposition by McCain," said William Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard. "They believe they can win the issue legislatively . . . and if a few Republicans join all the Democrats, so be it." Although he professed respect for the senator for following his principles, Kristol said "it hurts McCain" politically because "it's just not where most Republicans are."

John Weaver, McCain's top political adviser, said it is possible the move will hurt his presidential hopes but added: "I don't see evidence of it so far, other than the armchair quarterbacking that we've experienced."

"When John does what he think is right, it usually works out in all ways, including politically," Weaver said. "When we take the expedient route, it doesn't work out."

Asked for an example, he cited the 2000 debate over public display of the Confederate battle flag in South Carolina. McCain initially called the flag "a symbol of racism" but softened his views, leading to accusations of waffling and pandering.

Nonetheless, a Republican strategist close to the White House said McCain risks alienating his primary base in the detainee dispute.

"The politics of this for him are pretty dangerous," said the strategist, who spoke anonymously to avoid antagonizing the senator. "This is an issue that's the most important issue to the Republican base overall, and they're strongly with the president on this."

The strategist added: "This is a manageable issue today. But I don't know that it's manageable if Congress leaves without doing anything."

McCain's Interrogation Stance May Cost Him Conservatives (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — Conservative activists are heaping criticism on Sen. John McCain for fighting President Bush over proposed rules for the interrogation of terrorism suspects, a dispute that has reopened long-standing divisions between the maverick Republican lawmaker and his party's establishment.

The attack from the right, which coalesced over the weekend, could undercut McCain's effort to woo Bush backers and other party regulars for an anticipated 2008 presidential bid. His position on terrorism prisoners has fueled critics' skepticism about McCain's conservative credentials.

"This very definitely is going to put a chilling effect on the tremendous strides he has made in the conservative evangelical community," said the Rev. Louis P. Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition, one of several conservative activists who support Bush's proposal on interrogation techniques.

DOJ_NMG_0065393

Even as conservative leaders berated McCain for refusing to yield to Bush, the high-profile battle could burnish the Arizonan's credentials among admirers who have been concerned about his moves to court the GOP establishment.

His aides say McCain's position in the interrogation dispute is a matter of conscience — not calculation — but they still see a political upside.

"When he does the right thing and he knows it, that works out well for him," said John Weaver, a top political advisor to McCain. "He's going to see this through."

The administration took a possible step toward breaking the deadlock late Monday, when it sent a new proposal to Capitol Hill. Details were not immediately available and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a military judge in the Air Force Reserve who is a key McCain ally in the fight, was noncommittal in responding.

"The parties continue to share ideas with each other," Graham said in a statement.

Referring to the back-and-forth, Graham told reporters, "Have y'all ever bought a car? This is how you buy a car."

The episode underscores the complexity of McCain's political position as the perceived front-runner in a potentially crowded field of GOP presidential candidates. He must please the GOP activists who play a big role in choosing the party's nominee while demonstrating the independent streak that could appeal to moderates in a general election.

As McCain's profile in the interrogation debate has risen, other potential GOP presidential candidates have weighed in.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, widely seen as a leading competitor for McCain's centrist appeal, has forcefully endorsed Bush's position.

"I am four square behind President Bush," Romney said in an interview. "Sen. McCain's position is mistaken on this issue."

One key issue is a section of the Geneva Convention, which sets international standards for the treatment of wartime prisoners. Known as Common Article 3, the section bans "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment."

Bush says this language is vague, and it leaves intelligence agents in doubt about whether some of the harsher interrogation tactics they have employed are legal. He has asked Congress to clarify the language.

But McCain and his allies say Congress should not unilaterally set a definition, or other nations may do the same — to the detriment of U.S. personnel in captivity.

The House is expected easily to approve the White House proposal next week. But in the Senate, McCain is expected to prevail with the support of most Senate Democrats and, according to a GOP leadership aide, at least 11 Republicans.

The dispute between McCain and Bush is especially charged because their competing views are shaped by experiences at the core of their political identities.

For Bush, a revised interrogation policy is an essential tool for what he considers the historic mission of his presidency: waging a global war on terrorism unlike any other struggle the U.S. has confronted.

But McCain sees the debate through the prism of his own defining experience: the torture he endured as a prisoner during the Vietnam War.

The faceoff is the latest chapter in a complicated political relationship. McCain was Bush's chief rival for the 2000 GOP presidential nomination. During Bush's first term, McCain was at odds with the White House on major issues, including campaign finance reform and the Medicare prescription drug benefit. Last winter, he fought the administration for a measure to curb the use of torture in Iraq and elsewhere.

But he campaigned hard for Bush's reelection in 2004. And McCain has been a notable and loyal ally on Bush's policy in Iraq. He has also taken several steps aimed at smoothing relations with conservatives who long have doubted his commitment to their agendas. Most prominently, he delivered the commencement speech this year at Liberty University, a Baptist school in Virginia founded by the Rev. Jerry Falwell, a leader of the Christian conservative movement.

A White House official said Monday that Bush is not personally upset with McCain over the interrogation impasse. But the official, speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing White House deliberations, said others in the administration were offended by McCain's criticism last week of CIA Director Michael V. Hayden, who is pushing for the redefinition of the interrogation language.

DOJ_NMG_0065394

And the White House has been encouraging conservative activists to defend Bush's position — and, by extension, undercut McCain.

Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a frequent McCain critic, said he and other conservative leaders had been briefed about the flap at the White House in the last week.

Norquist, in an interview Monday, accused McCain of "showboating" and foiling a White House political strategy of framing this year's midterm elections as a choice between Republicans who support tough treatment of terrorists and Democrats who are standing in the president's way.

The White House "would like to have a conversation between now and the election about punishing the people who did 9/11," said Norquist. "McCain is interrupting that conversation and confusing the message."

Rush Limbaugh, the conservative radio talk show host, charged on Monday that McCain was part of a "cabal" in Washington that is "trying to thwart the policies of the Bush administration."

This weekend, McCain was criticized in an editorial of the Union Leader, an influential conservative newspaper in New Hampshire. The editorial was published Saturday, the day before McCain visited the state that traditionally hosts the first presidential primary.

"Sen. McCain comes here because he wants to be our next President," the editorial said. "But the question is being asked, in the midst of the most difficult and challenging war we have ever faced, can the nation afford a President McCain?"

McCain, appearing on ABC's "This Week" on Sunday, dismissed the criticism.

"I believe that this has nothing to do with politics," McCain said. "I tell you very frankly, no matter what the political impact is, this is a matter of conscience."

Despite the fire from the right, McCain remains in great demand as a campaigner for Republicans facing tough fights for reelection, said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Campaign. On Monday, he headlined a fundraiser in the district of Rep. Nancy L. Johnson of Connecticut, one of several GOP House members who depend on strong support from centrists.

"He's one of the more popular figures out there on the trail," Forti said. "This is just one controversy."

Time For Integrity (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

In the early 1960s, Johnny Carson hosted an afternoon TV show called "Who Do You Trust?" The title was grammatically incorrect, but I will use it anyway to pose a question regarding the current fuss over the Geneva Conventions: When it comes to George Bush and John McCain, who -- or whom -- do you trust?

This is about as dumb a question as the Groucho Marx standard from "You Bet Your Life," yet another old TV show: Who's buried in Grant's Tomb? The contest, after all, is between a president who has repeatedly broken faith with the American people over the war in Iraq -- everything from weapons of mass destruction to disingenuous assurances that torture has not been used in the interrogation of suspects -- and a former Vietnam War prisoner who was tortured by his jailers because, among other things, he refused an offer of early release. There is nothing in George Bush's life that even approaches what McCain has done.

Of course, McCain does not stand alone against Bush. He was joined on the Senate Armed Services Committee by three other Republicans: Lindsey Graham, Susan Collins and, importantly, the chairman, John W. Warner. They were in turn joined by the Democrats, who, for once, have wisely stepped out of the way to allow the Republicans to duke it out among themselves. But it is McCain who gets the lion's share of attention, and it was McCain who elicited that letter from Colin Powell saying, among other things, that under Bush's proposals to amend the Geneva Conventions, the world would "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." The lion had finally roared.

In New Hampshire, the state's largest newspaper, the reactionary Union Leader, opened up on McCain for opposing the president. But McCain has carried New Hampshire before, over the protestations of the Union Leader, and could do so again. Still, the all-but-declared presidential candidate -- McCain now has a staff about as big as FEMA's -- has plenty of opposition within his own party. Between his temper and his iconoclastic positions -- campaign finance, for instance -- he has made loads of enemies.

For the moment, the spotlight is on McCain and Bush -- a delightful GOP squabble. But it is the Democrats who ought to be paying close attention. For while the Democrats are awash in potential presidential candidates, they have nobody who even remotely approaches McCain's stature. I say this not because I agree with McCain across the board -- not on abortion, for sure, and not on Iraq, and not with his bellicose statements regarding North Korea -- but because he embodies a quality for which the country yearns: integrity. He is a man of his word.

The conventional wisdom is that the Senate is the graveyard of presidential ambitions. In recent times only John F. Kennedy has gone directly from there to the White House, while countless others have gone grimly back to Capitol Hill, John Kerry being just the latest example. McCain, though, has so far figured out how to leverage his Senate seat without falling prey to the sort of institutional problems that have bedeviled others -- a clotted verbosity, for instance. McCain somehow still speaks English.

The prime issue facing this country is not the war in Iraq. It is the people's loss of faith in their own government. In that, Iraq has played an important part but so, too, have campaign spending and fiscal idiocy of the sort represented by Sen. Ted Stevens's notorious "bridge to nowhere." Those of us who have been with McCain when he speaks of restoring faith in government know the effect on his audience. The man and his message are one and the same.

To restore trust, many Democrats and independents might be willing to overlook disagreements with McCain on issues of lesser importance -- including, maybe, even his rah-rah support for the war in Iraq (after all, how different is he from Hillary Clinton in this regard?) and his disquieting move to make nice with his former enemies on the religious right. But if that is to be the case, McCain must remain true to the principles he has enunciated in his disagreement with Bush over the Geneva Conventions and similar matters. Compromise is not a dirty word, but abandonment of principle is a different matter entirely.

The United States cannot conduct itself as its enemies have. We do not torture. We do not have kangaroo courts. We are John McCain, not his North Vietnamese jailers. As he did back in the Hanoi Hilton, this is McCain's moment to once again make that clear.

Kerry Speaks About Faith, 'Godly Tasks' (AP)

By Michael R. Blood

AP, September 19, 2006

Democratic Sen. John Kerry on Monday urged people of faith to work cooperatively on problems such as poverty, global warming and reducing the number of abortions — "godly tasks" that transcend the nation's culture wars.

In a speech laced with anecdotes of his own journey of faith, Kerry, a Roman Catholic, told students in a speech at Pepperdine University that "we can take up God's work as our own.

"Shame on us if we use our faith to divide and alienate people from one another, or if we draft God into partisan service," Kerry said. "As God gives us the ability to see, let us take up the tasks associated with loving our neighbors as ourselves."

Even with the nation riven over reproductive rights, Kerry said a shared goal should be reducing the high number of abortions. The first step, he said, it to accept the responsibility of making abortion rare.

"Even as a supporter of Roe v. Wade, I am compelled to acknowledge that the language both sides use on this subject can be unfortunately misleading and unconstructive. ... Everyone is worse off for it," the Massachusetts senator said.

The 2004 Democratic nominee is a potential candidate for the party nod in the next presidential election.

Kerry's remarks were among his most extensive ever on religion. He alluded to the 2004 election, saying his past reticence to openly discuss his faith allowed others to "draw the caricature for me. I will never let that happen again."

In the election, a national debate over religion and politics was touched off after St. Louis Archbishop Raymond Burke said he would deny the Eucharist to Kerry, who supports abortion rights.

Anti-abortion advocates pressured more bishops to follow Burke's lead. Kerry supporters accused Catholic leaders of trying to help re-elect President Bush, a Methodist whose position on abortion is more in line with Catholic teaching.

Exit polls in 2004 showed Kerry losing Protestants by a wide margin; Bush won the backing of six in 10. Among Catholics, Bush also prevailed although narrowly, 52 percent to 47 percent.

Kerry said although he was raised Catholic, it wasn't until years after the Vietnam War that he came to a deeper understanding about his faith.

"For 12 years I wandered in the wilderness, went through a divorce and struggled with questions about my direction. Then suddenly and movingly, I had a revelation about the connection between the work I was doing as a public servant and my formative teachings. Indeed, the scriptures provided a firmer guide about values applied to life," he said.

Kerry Talks Of Loss, Renewal Of His Catholic Faith (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

In a speech he said he wishes he had given before the 2004 presidential election, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) yesterday described his religious life in greater candor and detail than ever before.

Kerry said in Malibu, Calif., that he "wandered in the wilderness" after the Vietnam War but came back to the Roman Catholic Church after a sudden and moving revelation in the late 1980s.

Kerry expressed regret over his reluctance to talk publicly about his faith during his failed presidential campaign. "I learned that if I didn't fill in the picture myself, others would draw the caricature for me. I will never let that happen again -- and neither should you," he told students at Pepperdine University.

Kerry is the third high-profile Democrat to give a reflective, deeply personal speech on religion and politics in recent weeks, following Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Robert P. Casey Jr., the Democratic nominee for U.S. Senate in Pennsylvania.

The addresses fit into a broader effort by liberal religious groups and Democratic candidates to appeal to religiously motivated voters in November's midterm elections. A pair of opposing events in Washington this week neatly encapsulates the battle.

Yesterday, a new group called Red Letter Christians, named for the colored type that highlights the words of Jesus in popular editions of the Bible, called for Christians to "vote their values" by considering the war in Iraq, torture, environmental degradation and helping the poor to be vital religious issues.

"We believe in a Jesus who said 'Blessed are the peacemakers,' " said the Rev. Tony Campolo, a founder of the group, which says it is forming a grass-roots network of 7,000 clergy members.

Meanwhile, conservative advocacy groups are planning a four-day "Values Voter Summit," starting Friday, that is expected to draw 1,500 religious and political leaders to Washington. The goal of the conference is to "bring back to the forefront the issues that motivated and drove values voters to the polls in 2004 -- protecting human life, defending traditional marriage and preserving our religious liberties," said Tony Perkins, president of the Washington-based Family Research Council.

Kerry's speech "almost sounds like a speech that I might give," Perkins said. "It sounds good." But he added, "The pickle that some of these liberal policymakers find themselves in is, they know that faith is important to people, but when they get pinned down on their policy positions that are inconsistent with the tenets of their faith, they start hedging and talking about other factors in their decision."

Kerry, who supports abortion rights, was pilloried in the 2004 campaign by conservative Catholics, including a small minority of U.S. bishops who threatened to deny him Holy Communion.

In yesterday's speech, Kerry said he was "born, baptized and raised a Catholic." In Vietnam, he said, "my relationship with God was a dependent one -- a 'God, get me through this and I'll be good' relationship." As he became disillusioned with the war, he said, he struggled with "the problem of evil, the difficulty of explaining why terrible and senseless events are part of God's plan."

"For 12 years I wandered in the wilderness, went through a divorce and struggled with questions about my direction. Then suddenly and movingly, I had a revelation about the connection between the work I was doing as a public servant and my formative teachings," he said.

Kerry did not describe the revelation in the speech. But in a telephone interview afterward, he said it occurred in 1987 or 1988 after a friend, whom he declined to name, died of cancer.

DOJ_NMG_0065397

"I have a very vivid image of the loss of that friend and of his words about why he had to die, how it was part of God's purpose. And out of that came a sense of acceptance," he said.

It was "a stark awakening about how you reconcile some of these difficulties I had about . . . the suffering, about the problem of evil," Kerry added. "I understood that to be part of the test of faith."

Liberal Evangelicals Begin Campaign (AP)

By Philip Elliott

AP, September 19, 2006

Liberal evangelicals, weary of a Republican-centric image, launched a campaign Monday to promote Christian values beyond the issues of abortion and same-sex marriage.

Red Letter Christians, a project of Sojurners/Call to Renewal, announced plans to establish a grass-roots network of 7,000 moderate and progressive clergy members.

"A debate on moral issues should be central to American politics, but how should we define religious values?" said Jim Wallis, an activist and executive director of the Christian ministry, which also publishes the liberal Sojourners Magazine.

The project's name comes from the color of some Bible's type, with words directly attributed to Jesus appearing in red.

Wallis said Christian conservatives have limited the discussion to abortion and same-sex marriage, two fears that mobilized voters in 2004, and that voters care about more than two the issues.

"We must insist that the ethics of war — and whether we tell the truth about going to war — these are moral values issues too," Wallis said. Democrats have pinned part of their midterm strategy on voters' restlessness with the war in Iraq.

The Red Letter Christians campaign plans to use voter guides for congregants and briefings for their leaders to argue education, poverty and the environment are all evangelical issues. Wallis also launched a new blog this week at BeliefNet.com , debating with former Christian Coalition head and failed Republican Georgia lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed.

The faith-based group also hired a full-time coordinator in Ohio, where conservative Ken Blackwell is running against Rep. Ted Strickland, a former Methodist pastor. Another coordinator is soon to arrive in Pennsylvania, where Sen. Rick Santorum faces a tough re-election bid.

Faith-based get-out-the-vote efforts registered scores of new voters during 2004's presidential election. The Southern Baptist Convention's iVoteValues.com campaign alone reached 400,000 voters, the majority of whom voted for President Bush.

And later this week, the Family Research Council will have its Values Voters Summit in Washington, D.C. Speakers will include Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

Wallis said the Christian conservatives have lost their independence with too-cozy ties to the Republican Party. He also is quick to note his group is not an extension of the Democratic Party. He is openly critical of Democratic politicians and titled his best-selling book "God's Politics: Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It."

Religious Left To Reclaim Its Faith (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

A new group representing values voters on the religious left castigated the religious right yesterday, announcing plans to counter conservatives with a series of candidate fairs, voters guides and Web logs.

Fourteen activists, some of whom portrayed themselves as disenchanted evangelicals, announced the formation of "Red Letter Christians," a group that says it bases its actions and political philosophy on the words of Jesus, which appear in red lettering in some versions of the Bible.

"The evangelical faith has been hijacked by right-wing zealots," said Columbia University professor Randall Balmer, adding that when he quizzed eight conservative religious organizations on their positions on torture of terrorism suspects, only two responded. Both backed the Bush administration's stance.

"I happen to think that's morally bankrupt," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0065398

The event was a pre-emptive strike against the 1,500 to 2,000 people set to gather for a "Values Voter Summit" at the Omni Shoreham this weekend. The conference will feature activists such as American Values President Gary Bauer, columnist Ann Coulter, former Education Secretary William J. Bennett and several members of Congress.

"The liberal elite is surprisingly intolerant of democratic activity they don't approve of," Mr. Bauer said in response, "consistently condemning pro-marriage referendums, parental involvement in the schools and now the peaceful assembly of their fellow citizens to talk about the most important issues of the day."

Red Letter Christians was organized by the evangelical left Sojourners magazine and its affiliate, Call to Renewal.

The Rev. Jim Wallis, founder of the magazine, said he will be debate former Christian Coalition head Ralph Reed this week on a new blog at www.godpolitics.com. Sojourners also plans to issue 200,000 "Voting God's Politics" voter guides and sponsor an Oct. 2 candidates' forum in the key electoral state of Ohio.

"The monologue of the religious right is finally over, and a new dialogue has just begun," Mr. Wallis said. "That's good news for churches, for politics and really, for both parties. We believe the debate on values should be central in American politics. The question is: Which values, whose values and how should we define moral values?"

The right has concentrated on opposition to same-sex "marriage" and abortion, he said, adding that the war in Iraq, poverty and the environment should equally concern evangelicals.

Also yesterday, Americans United for Separation of Church and State announced its new initiative against election-year politicking in churches. It will mail more than 117,000 letters to churches in 11 competitive election states informing them of Internal Revenue Service regulations.

Its executive director, the Rev. Barry Lynn, said the IRS has issued new guidelines to ensure churches don't endanger their tax-exempt status by endorsing or opposing candidates. He criticized Focus on the Family for seeking coordinators in evangelical churches to distribute voter guides and engage voters.

"This is nothing less than an old-fashioned political machine," Mr. Lynn said. "Why would [Focus founder] James Dobson want a specific contact in every church to coordinate election-year efforts if he did not want to use those churches to influence the outcome of the elections?"

He added, "I'm convinced this year that the IRS thinks things have gotten out of control, that church politicking has become a major problem, and they're putting real teeth into their enforcement efforts."

"Our guides are definitely not biased and fit within IRS law," responded Focus Senior Vice President Tom Minnery. "We have expert attorneys who advise us every step of the way."

Report Critical Of Training Of Teachers (NYT)

By Alan Finder

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

Most American teachers are trained in university programs with low admission and graduation standards, and with faculty members and courses that are often unimpressive and disconnected from what takes place in elementary and secondary schools, according to a study released yesterday.

Some education departments and schools should be shut down and others need vast improvement, said the report, “Educating School Teachers,” released by the Education Schools Project, a research group.

“Teacher education right now is the Dodge City of education, unruly and chaotic,” said the author of the report, Arthur Levine, the president of the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation and the former president of Teachers College at Columbia University.

“There is a chasm between what goes on in the university and what goes on in the classroom,” Dr. Levine said yesterday at a news conference in Washington.

Among other problems, he said, is that states and universities differ over how much education teachers need, what kinds of courses they should take and how much time they should spend as student teachers.

The report was based on surveys of alumni of education schools, deans and professors of education, and school principals, along with visits to 28 education schools.

DOJ_NMG_0065399

Among its findings was that 54 percent of American teachers graduate from small universities that grant bachelor's and master's degrees, but not doctoral degrees. On average, students at these universities have lower high school grades and lower standardized test scores than students at research universities that award doctoral degrees.

The study determined that high school and grade school students taught by graduates of these less prestigious universities had smaller increases in their math and reading test scores than did students taught by graduates of more prestigious doctoral universities.

Arthur E. Wise, president of the National Council for Accreditation of Teacher Education, rejected what he called the elitism in the report and in Dr. Levine's views. Most teachers graduate from regional state colleges and universities. They do not "spend over $160,000 in four years, in order to prepare for a job that pays $30,000 a year," Mr. Wise said.

Dr. Levine recommended that some teacher education programs at universities granting only bachelor's and master's degrees be dropped, and he proposed expansion of the teacher training programs at major research universities.

Dr. Levine's report also said teachers should be trained for five years, with four years in a traditional subject like English or chemistry and one year of learning how to teach. He suggested that education programs be refocused as professional schools.

Several critics said it would be impractical to shut down programs at less selective universities.

"We should not abandon the schools that produce the highest number of teachers," Sharon Robinson, president of the American Association of Colleges of Teacher Education, said at the news conference. "Rather, we should focus on them."

Teacher Training Is Chaotic, Study Says (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — Aspiring teachers emerge from college woefully unprepared for their jobs, according to a study that depicts most teacher education programs as deeply flawed.

The damning review comes from Arthur Levine, former president of Teachers College at Columbia University.

His report, released Monday, comes as public schools are under federal orders to have a qualified teacher for every class. It casts doubts on the most basic aspects of how teachers are taught. Teacher quality has a huge influence on whether students pass or fail.

The coursework in teacher education programs is in disarray nationwide, the report says. Unlike other professions such as law and medicine, there is no common length of study or set of required skills.

Then there are a host of other problems: low admissions standards, disengaged college faculty, insufficient classroom practice and poor oversight, according to Levine's study.

"Teacher education right now is the Dodge City of education: unruly and chaotic," said Levine, who now heads the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation. "There's a chasm between what goes on in the university and what goes on in the classroom."

In taking on his own field, Levine said he is not out to bash teacher education. Rather, he said he hopes his candid assessment and recommendations will lead to changes.

He found some exemplary programs but said most are poor or mediocre. He called for turning education schools into professional schools, rooted in practical experience.

The response from Levine's peers was mixed. Representatives of the teaching profession embraced many of Levine's themes but took exception to some ideas as misguided or elitist.

The four-year study is based on surveys of deans, faculty, alumni and school principals, along with 28 case studies of various kinds of education schools.

In those surveys, school principals gave teacher education programs low grades. Many teachers who graduated from the programs said they were often unprepared for their jobs.

"The findings are sobering, and we take them seriously," said Sharon Robinson, president and CEO of the American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education, which represents 800 schools. She said Levine's motives are true and his "tough love" findings have credibility.

DOJ_NMG_0065400

But she took issue with some ideas, such as shifting more teacher training to the top doctoral universities, where Levine said the programs are strongest. Bolstering programs at public colleges and universities makes more sense, Robinson said.

"That's what people can afford," added Donna Cooper, Pennsylvania's secretary of planning and policy, who joined other speakers for the report's release in Washington.

Levine said accreditation — the process by which schools are judged for quality — must be revamped to put more focus on how students perform. The National Council for Accreditation of Teacher Education said it has already been working on such measures.

Yet as long as accreditation is optional for teacher colleges, some weak schools and selective schools will keep opting out, said Arthur Wise, president of the council.

"We might all wish that elite institutions would produce a more significant share of America's teachers," Wise said. That's not likely, he said, because "the sad truth is that teacher education is not an important part of the mission at some elite institutions."

The study is the second in a series known as the Education Schools Project. Last year, Levine reported that principals and superintendents also have inadequate training. The research is paid for by the Annenberg Foundation, the Ford Foundation, the Ewing Marion Kauffman Foundation and the Wallace Foundation.

The country has more than 1,200 schools, colleges and departments of education, covering a spectrum of non-profit and for-profit programs, undergraduate and graduate.

Robinson, the leader of the teacher college association, challenged Levine to help turn many of his ideas into action. Levine said he would.

He said his report was meant to be optimistic.

"I've spent most of my career at education schools," he said. "I really believe in them."

Civic Involvement Tied To Education (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

High school dropouts are significantly less likely than better-educated Americans to vote, trust government, do volunteer work, or go to church, according to a new report that reveals a widening gap in "civic health" between the nation's upper and lower classes.

The report, a portrait of civic life in the United States, finds that Americans' disengagement from their communities during the past few decades has been particularly dramatic among adults who have the least education. Among people who lack a high school diploma, the percentage who have voted plummeted from 1976 to 2004 to 31 percent -- half the 62 percent of college graduates who voted in 2004.

The class divide is the most striking finding of the report, prepared by leading social scientists and released yesterday by the National Conference on Citizenship, a nonprofit organization created by Congress. "High school dropouts are . . . nearly voiceless in a system that fails them," said John Bridgeland, a former domestic policy adviser to President Bush who is chief executive officer of Civic Enterprises and leads the conference's advisory board.

Compiled from several national surveys since the mid-1970s, including some that have not been made public before, the report is an attempt to draw attention of the public and policymakers to civic life, in the same way that economic indicators routinely are used to shape the government's economic policy. It examines 40 indicators of nine basic aspects of civic life, including how much people say they trust one another, stay informed, follow the news and express their political views.

Overall, the findings of "Broken Engagement, America's Civic Health Index" reinforce earlier studies that have shown steep declines in civic participation. "The most hopeful signs," the report says, are a recent increase in volunteering, particularly among young people, and an upturn in political involvement since the late 1990s.

Still, it says, the trauma of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and, more recently, Hurricane Katrina, have not been catalysts for "the deeper civic transformation for which many had hoped."

Yesterday, at a Washington conference to recognize Citizenship Day, a panel of scholars and policy specialists gave a sober view even of such promising signs as the increased volunteer service among people ages 18 to 25. "We have to be a little careful about celebrating this young generation. This is mostly an upper-middle-class phenomenon," said Robert D. Putnam, a Harvard University government professor whose 2000 book, "Bowling Alone," documented the decline in civic participation. "If we continue to have a substantial and growing gap between people coming out of the middle class and people coming out of the lower class, we are going to be in a serious pickle in civic terms."

Putnam said the reasons behind the civic drop-off among people with little income or education are not well understood. He speculated that it could result from the increasing instability of the working class, which he said has caused children to grow up with parents who have less steady jobs and marriages. He said the change also could stem from the weakening of trade unions and other institutions that used to unify working-class people, or by an agenda of political issues that appeals mainly to the upper classes.

William A. Galston, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution who was a domestic policy adviser to President Bill Clinton, said, "An increase in income inequality is going to produce an increased gap in civic participation" because more affluent people tend to be most engaged in their communities. Galston said low-income people also could be reacting to "the standard view that neither political party has done much" to help them.

Peter Levine, director of the University of Maryland's Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement, which helped compile the data, said the gap among the social classes exists in almost all 40 indicators of civic engagement included in the report. Levine said the data show that such differences are not associated with people's race or ethnicity.

For instance, nearly half the adults with a college degree said they had attended a community program last year, compared with fewer than one in five high school dropouts. Similarly, 60 percent of the college graduates said they believe people are honest, compared with 44 percent of the dropouts.

Higher Standards Don't Lead Every Student To Success (WP)

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

The National Center for Educational Accountability, in a February 2006 brief titled "Orange Juice or Orange Drink? Ensuring that 'Advanced Courses' Live Up to Their Labels," noted that several states are attempting to raise high school standards.

Since the February 2005 National Education Summit on High Schools, the center said, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Mississippi, Iowa and Louisiana have stiffened course requirements for students to get a diploma. Twelve states have business-sponsored State Scholars programs to encourage students to take college-preparatory courses. All 50 states and the District of Columbia offer incentives for students to take Advanced Placement, International Baccalaureate or dual enrollment courses in cooperation with local colleges, the center said.

But the center's analysis of student progress in Texas found a failure to prepare low-income and minority students adequately for state tests in some demanding subjects.

According to the Texas Education Agency, 58 percent of low-income students, 67 percent of African American students and 59 percent of Hispanic students in Texas who received course credit for algebra 1 in 1999 failed a corresponding state test. The percentages for non-low-income and white students were 39 and 35 percent, respectively.

Among low-income Texas students in the graduating class of 2002 who took AP exams, the center said, fewer than one in four passed. The ratio was roughly the same for African American and Hispanic students.

Among white and non-low-income students in Texas who took AP exams, about 57 percent passed.

Struggle For Sobriety That Knows No Party Lines (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 18 — Scenes from an uncommon political marriage:

DOJ_NMG_0065402

Representative Jim Ramstad, a Republican from Minnesota, and Patrick J. Kennedy, a Democrat from Rhode Island, are deep in conversation on the House floor, Mr. Ramstad's hand draped over his colleague's shoulder.

Later that day, Mr. Ramstad receives a note in the Republican cloakroom from Mr. Kennedy, who needs a ride to a support group they attend in Georgetown. "Patrick's not driving currently, so I'm sort of his chauffeur," Mr. Ramstad says.

After the meeting, Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Ramstad sit with friends in their regular booth at Morton's Steakhouse. The gathering resembles any Washington power table, except the men are sipping Diet Coke and mineral water, have just come from "group" and are occasionally crying. "We love each other for our imperfections and for our common humanity," Mr. Kennedy says.

The dinner last Tuesday celebrated Mr. Kennedy's fourth month of sobriety, a process jolted into motion by an early morning car accident on Capitol Hill in May and a subsequent rehabilitation at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota, where he was treated for an addiction to painkillers.

In the precarious course of his recovery, Mr. Kennedy, the 39-year-old son of Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, has come to rely heavily on Mr. Ramstad, 60. He has served as Patrick Kennedy's sponsor, his primary source of advice and support in what he calls "the daily fight for my life" against addiction.

The day after the accident, Mr. Kennedy received a phone call from Mr. Ramstad, a recovering alcoholic who has been an evangelist in Congress for addiction treatment and 12-step recovery programs. The men did not know each other well.

But in battling their addictions, the two built a fast kinship that flouts the partisan divisions of Congress, their own divergent politics and the conditional nature of so many friendships in Washington. They speak daily, often several times. Mr. Ramstad visited Mr. Kennedy during his 28-day rehabilitation, driving two hours each Saturday from his Minnetonka home. When the Rhode Island Republican Party chairman called for Mr. Kennedy's resignation after his crash, Mr. Ramstad called it "a slap in the face" to all recovering addicts.

Former Senator Max Cleland, a Georgia Democrat who frequently attends the Tuesday dinners, said, "This is a story of a shared and common humanity and overcoming political differences in a town known for its inhumanity." Mr. Cleland, who lost both legs and part of an arm in Vietnam, says he is in recovery from "the trauma of war."

"It's a great brotherhood we all share," he said of the dinner group. "And it has nothing to do with politics except that we're all in it."

The political world could learn much from these gatherings, Mr. Ramstad says. "If we could turn Congress into one big A.A. meeting," he said, referring to Alcoholics Anonymous, "where people would be required to say what they mean and mean what they say, it would be a lot better Congress."

In a joint interview with Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Ramstad in Mr. Ramstad's office, each man nods solemnly while the other speaks. Both are mindful of the confidentiality rules involving recovery groups. They say they agreed to be interviewed because their "sponsorship" relationship was revealed in court as a condition of Mr. Kennedy's probation (he pleaded guilty to impaired driving).

Mr. Kennedy has big expressive eyes, a lanky frame and slightly hunched posture that lends the impression of an overgrown boy. Mr. Ramstad walks chest-out and speaks with the practiced certainty of a man who has counseled numerous addicts over 25 years.

The two men share a keen sense of the twin burdens that being an addict and congressman impose, Mr. Kennedy says. "To some degree, all politicians lead a double life, a public one and a private one," he said. Mr. Ramstad has emphasized the importance of integrating what he calls "the political game face" with "the real person inside."

Being a Kennedy carries its own weight, Mr. Kennedy says, given the legacy of drug and alcohol abuse in his family. His mother, Joan Kennedy, has endured a long battle with alcoholism, and his father was involved in a string of alcohol-related episodes earlier in his career. (Senator Kennedy says he will drink a glass of wine at home at night or in social settings. He describes himself as being "well" over the last 15 years, a recovery he attributes to his current wife, Victoria.)

In a phone interview, Senator Kennedy says he shares a meal with Patrick once a week. His son is doing well, he says, thanks in large part to "the incredible generosity of spirit" of Jim Ramstad.

Patrick Kennedy makes frequent references to the pressures and expectations inherent in his name. “When you grow up in my family, being somebody meant having power, having status,” he said. “The compensations you got were all material and superficial. I’ve come to realize, in the last few months, that that life made me feel all alone.”

Both Mr. Ramstad and Mr. Kennedy are active in a House caucus of about 60 representatives that promotes legislation for treatment of addiction and mental illness. Some of the members are addicts themselves, or recovering addicts, Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Ramstad say, but neither would estimate how many.

Mr. Ramstad attended support group meetings with former Representative Phil Crane, Republican of Illinois, who battled alcoholism and says his own recovery was nurtured by the late Senator Harold Hughes, Democrat of Iowa, who spoke of his own struggle with drinking.

“There is a very powerful recovering community in this town,” said Capt. Ronald Smith, the former chairman of psychiatry at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., and a regular at the Tuesday dinners. A recovering addict, he has treated many senators and congressmen and leads the support group attended by Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Ramstad and Mr. Cleland.

It is unclear, Captain Smith says, whether addiction is more common among politicians, but alcohol does tend to pervade political life, with its cocktail party fund-raisers, endless dinners and constant travel. Ann Richards, the former Texas governor who was buried Monday, used to visit prison inmates and say, “My name’s Ann, and I’m an alcoholic.”

Mr. Ramstad makes repeated mention of “July 31, 1981,” the day he awoke from an alcohol-induced blackout in a Sioux Falls, S.D., jail after creating a disturbance at a hotel coffee shop. He had just finished his first term as a Minnesota state senator. “If I had not wound up in that jail cell, I would not have sought treatment,” Mr. Ramstad said. “I would probably be dead today.”

Mr. Kennedy has endured several public battles with mental illness. He was treated for cocaine addiction as a teenager, suffered from depression as a young adult, was given a diagnosis of bipolar disorder after coming to Congress in 1994 and then became addicted to painkillers. He also was prone to binge drinking, which contributed to a scuffle with an airport security guard and a visit from the Coast Guard after a heated argument with a girlfriend aboard a yacht, among other episodes that became public.

The May car crash was the latest embarrassment. The police found Mr. Kennedy disoriented, claiming he was heading to a House vote though Congress was not in session (it was 2:45 a.m.). Mr. Kennedy, who had been driving without headlights before swerving into a police barrier, blamed a mix of prescription medications for the accident.

Both men describe their signature humiliations — Mr. Kennedy’s accident and Mr. Ramstad’s arrest — as “blessings” that spurred them into recovery. “We both totally hit the wall, and it was publicized,” Mr. Kennedy said. “Or the barrier in my case.”

Mr. Ramstad says he has come to “love Patrick like a brother,” although there is more of a paternal tone to his manner when they are together. At one point during the interview, Mr. Ramstad tells him to turn off his hyperactive cellphone. Mr. Kennedy sheepishly obliges. He says he is learning to take instructions from a Republican.

L.A. County Human Rights Panel Reaffirms Award For Muslim Leader Hathout (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

The Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission voted Monday to reaffirm its selection of Muslim leader Maher Hathout for a human relations award, ending a bitter, two-week battle that many lamented has seriously set back the region's Muslim-Jewish relations.

After a hearing marked by vitriolic name-calling and the expulsion of one unruly audience member, only four of the 14 commission members voted to support Hathout, chairman of the Islamic Center of Southern California and the first Muslim to receive the county's John Allen Buggs Award. Five members abstained; four were absent.

But Hathout said he was unconcerned by so many abstentions and called the vote a victory for free speech, inclusiveness and a rejection of the "tactics of intimidation."

"We will not allow untouchable and sacred cows in the midst of our democracy," said Hathout, referring to Israel. He added that he was accepting the award for the "Jews, Christians, Buddhists, atheists and Muslims" who supported him.

DOJ_NMG_0065404

The furious fight over what has normally been a quiet award selection process was sparked when some Jewish groups charged that Hathout, a 70-year-old retired cardiologist, was a closet extremist who denounced Israel as an apartheid state and was soft on terrorism. Their opposition prompted the commission to reopen its July decision selecting Hathout.

Hathout's supporters, who spanned a wide ethnic and religious spectrum, called him a pioneer in promoting moderation, tolerance and understanding.

The Muslim leader, in remarks before the commission vote, offered to meet in a dialogue with critics and expressed regrets for harsh language toward Israel.

But his opponents did not seem mollified. They reiterated that they fully supported his right to express his opinions, but believed he was too divisive to merit a human relations award.

"I'm deeply concerned that the selection of Dr. Hathout will further divide our city and will set up extremist rhetoric as a desirable form of public discourse," said Roz Rothstein, national director of StandWithUs, a Los Angeles-based pro-Israel organization.

"It is regrettable that this will now be L.A.'s public image of good human relations," Rothstein said.

Despite the continuing conflict, commission President Adrian Dove said the controversy — which he called the biggest in his 12 years of county human relations work — had presented his group with an opportune chance to begin repairing the region's Muslim-Jewish relations.

Those relations have considerably soured in the last five years, as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has heightened sensitivities here.

The region's first significant Muslim-Jewish dialogue group, which Hathout and others began in the late 1990s, eventually fell apart as the Middle East conflict grew.

The commission has already begun to plan "human relations summits" between Muslims and Jews in an attempt to bridge their differences, said Dove, who can only cast a vote in the event of a tie.

"We realized by our process that we had opened wounds and now recognize where the healing needs to take place," Dove said.

Similar efforts are underway by Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, who has asked the Rev. Leonard Jackson, an associate minister of First African Methodist Episcopal Church, to head a weekly meeting among Jews, Muslims and other faith leaders to improve relations.

In deliberating the issue Monday, some commissioners sought to find a middle way out of the conflict that would address the concerns of both sides.

Commissioner Donna Bojarsky, for instance, proposed that the commission honor Hathout not by granting the award, which she said had become tainted with controversy, but by featuring him as a keynote speaker at the commission's award event scheduled for next month.

"This is clearly not the environment we want for the human relations commission and county," she said, adding that the last 12 days had been "one of the most difficult" in her life. She abstained.

Commissioner Vito Cannella, a 24-year veteran of the human relations body, asked Hathout if he would withdraw in the interest of harmony.

The Muslim leader refused to do so, challenging commissioners to "look me in the eye" and find him unworthy of the honor despite a record, he said, that showed his support of Israel's right to exist, condemnation of terrorist actions by Hamas and Hezbollah and years of interfaith work.

Cannella ultimately abstained Monday in a shift from his previous vote of support in July.

He said he changed his mind based on new information received reflecting divided opinion toward Hathout.

He said he believed the commission's vote to reaffirm the selection was a mistake.

"Due to the situation, I think we should refrain from giving the award and try to repair the bridges before this time next year," he said.

But commissioner Albert DeBlanc, who supported Hathout, said his years as an attorney had taught him that judgments should be based on eyewitness testimony rather than hearsay.

DOJ_NMG_0065405

Hathout, he said, had been endorsed by scores of prominent and diverse faith leaders who had worked with him for years.

Meanwhile, Commissioners Ray Bartlett and Judy Coffman, who previously supported Hathout, were absent Monday.

Commissioner Eleanor Montano, who earlier endorsed Hathout, abstained.

Before the vote, the county counsel's office advised the commission that there was a "sufficient basis to have concern" that it may have violated the state's open meetings law in selecting Hathout during two July votes. As a result, the commission began its meeting by first voting to rescind those earlier actions.

It's Time For Unity Among Democrats (RC)

By Donna Brazile

Roll Call, September 19, 2006

Election Day is fast approaching. With seven critical weeks remaining, the stakes are too important for Democrats to be distracted by internal dissension.

Despite the recent uproar by three powerful Republican lawmakers who decided to break ranks with the Bush administration over U.S. policy regarding the interrogation of suspected terrorists, it's time that Democrats put aside their perennial squabbling and unify the party going into Election Day.

Karl Rove understands that midterm elections are not just centered on national issues. They consist of hand-to-hand combat between candidates — their backgrounds, their personalities, their constituents' mood and whatever "smut" can be found on one's opponent. He also understands that it's important to rally and energize the base early to approach unaffiliated voters and disaffected Democrats closer to Election Day.

Now, what are we doing on the Democratic side? Fighting for a seat here or a position there? Sorry — this is no way to galvanize Americans to vote for Democrats on Nov. 7. Most voters fail to recognize what stake they have in the battle between Reps. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) and James Clyburn (S.C.) for the post of Majority Whip if Democrats take back the House. Or in the leadership battle between Reps. Steny Hoyer (Md.) and John Murtha (Pa.).

One of the few recent midterm elections in which the Democrats actually picked up seats — 1998 — represented something of a high-water mark. We were unified. We were undaunted by the repeated attacks on then-President Bill Clinton and the GOP's rush to impeach, investigate and incriminate Democrats.

Working with the former Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Martin Frost (Texas) and Rep. Charlie Rangel (N.Y.), we spent countless hours putting together a creative approach. (When you're short on money, you compensate with imagination.) We tried to reach swing voters with a persuasive message, while also inspiring and motivating base voters to bring others to the polls.

The program was so successful that the GOP has replicated and expanded it in every election since then. It's time we do the same, and realize that money alone will not determine who controls Congress. A winning strategy comes from leadership and fighting for what people care about, as opposed to fighting each other over crumbs.

In poll after poll, voters continue to favor Democrats to handle complex issues such as immigration, health care and even foreign policy. However, when asked which party has better leaders, they favor Republicans despite recent public revelations of cronyism and corruption, starting with former Reps. Tom DeLay (Texas) and Duke Cunningham (Calif.) and Rep. Bob Ney (Ohio).

For once, Democrats need to reach consensus on leadership posts, party direction and resource allocation. Democrats need to face the reality that the public yearns for strong, effective leadership, as opposed to a mere partisan message with a Democratic slant. They want leaders who can get things done without contributing to the mess in Washington, D.C. At least that is my read, and today as I spend time with voters in Peoria, Ill., I'll see how it plays with them.

The GOP may be fragmented on divisive social policy issues such as immigration and budget deficits that are spiraling out of control, but they are unified on the one thing that matters to them: protecting and maintaining their majority status. At times, I have the impression that the Democratic strategy for 2006 rests with the presumption that the voters dislike Republicans more than Democrats. While it is true that there is mounting disdain against incumbents and that there currently are more Republicans than Democrats in federal office, an effective election plan requires more than just relying on bad news from the other side.

While in Peoria, I intend to discuss the war and whether Republican leadership has made us safer. I will discuss how a new Democratic majority will fix what has been broken by an ideology-driven Bush administration and a sycophantic Republican Congress. This will require that United States push even harder on the Iraqi government, especially on developing a political solution to control the insurgency, even if it requires a short-term increase in troop levels.

Yes, I support the call made by both Democrats and Republicans to develop a timetable for a phased troop withdrawal based on predetermined metrics. I would hope a Democratic Congress would hold our defense officials accountable and replace nonperformers. And we must develop a plan to generate humanitarian and diplomatic aid within the international community to enable a smooth transition to an autonomous Iraq. Sadly, our current rebuilding and reconstruction efforts are a joke.

We Democrats have a lot riding on the November elections, and that includes more than just who wins Congressional leadership races or who benefits in the all-important 2008 presidential sweepstakes. For once, I wish the Democrats would demonstrate a winning attitude, hit back when the GOP starts slinging mud, give the voters a positive agenda that sets forth constructive solutions to issues that matter most to voters — and stand together for the sake of our country.

The Boom Generation Seventh Decade (WSJ)

By Michael Milken

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

SANTA MONICA, Calif. -- On July 4, along with more than 9,000 other American post-war babies, I turned 60. Our generation, the 78 million American baby boomers born between 1946 and 1964, has had a profound social and economic impact around the world for more than half a century. As we start moving into our seventh decade, it's logical to ask what effect baby-boomer retirements will have on real estate and financial markets. The question is logical, but it puts the emphasis on the wrong side of the equation. The real future value of U.S. assets won't be determined by retirements, but by policy decisions on education, taxation, regulation, immigration, international investment and the environment.

Baby boomer asset liquidation isn't really a financial market issue because (1) there's plenty of liquidity in the global economy; (2) as the rest of the world becomes wealthier, people outside the U.S. will own a greater percentage of global assets and they'll want to keep a share of their net worth in America; (3) liquidity will grow in both developed and developing nations as they adopt recent American financial innovations and market structures; (4) as baby boomers live longer and healthier, their new mantra will become "Who wants to retire?" and (5) most assets won't need to be sold.

I will examine each of these points. * * *

1. Large parts of the developed world are awash in liquidity -- Japan has more than $10 trillion -- and we're also seeing a buildup in several countries with small populations. Norway, the UAE, Taiwan, Singapore and others each have hundreds of billions of dollars available for investment beyond the immediate needs of their citizens -- in some cases, as much as $50,000 per person. To put that in perspective, Hewitt Associates reports that the median amount in a U.S. 401(k) plan is just $27,100.

2. The "BRIC" nations -- Brazil, Russia, India and China -- will continue to grow faster than the U.S. and, with the U.S. and Japan, will become the world's major economic powers by mid-century. There are 600 million children in China and India whose future buying power will grow at least as fast as their rapidly improving educations. As the BRICs accumulate wealth, they will want to diversify their holdings globally. America stands to benefit as richly from that diversification as it did from European investment in the 19th century.

China and India combined to produce nearly half the world's economic output in 1820 compared to just 1.8% for the U.S. Our remarkable growth since 1820 has benefited from democratic institutions, a belief in capitalism, private property rights, an entrepreneurial culture, abundant resources, openness to foreign investment, the best universities, immigration and relatively transparent markets.

3. Recent U.S. financial innovations -- including new markets for securitized mortgages and credit-card liabilities, collateralized loan and high-yield bond obligations, and financial derivatives -- helped to spread risk and created tens of millions of jobs by freeing up investment capital for growing businesses. As these financial technologies are deployed throughout the world, they will increase prosperity by multiplying the value of human capital, social capital and real assets. They have the potential to create as much as $50 trillion to $100 trillion in worldwide liquidity.

In the U.S., the value of home mortgages equals 95% of the nation's gross domestic product. The ratio is considerably lower in other countries: mortgages in Germany total about 69% of GDP; in Japan, it's 36%; and in Russia, less than 1%. A worldwide securitized mortgage market alone could free up some $20 trillion for productive investment by unlocking the unused capital in residential real estate.

4. More baby boomers are asking themselves, Why retire? It's a cliché to say that 60 is the new 40, but it has some biological and psychological validity. Advanced biomedical research is leading to continued progress against cancer, heart disease, arthritis, dementia and other conditions that forced people out of the workforce before they wanted to quit. In the future, aging workers will be healthier and will use broadband technology to live and work from anywhere at the increasing proportion of jobs that involve knowledge rather than physical labor. They'll spend more years earning income, often in multiple careers, instead of selling assets.

Fewer people will retire in their 60s simply because they know that average life expectancy at birth is increasing at an astounding rate. Americans, who could expect to live an average of 47 years in 1900, now enjoy life spans approaching 80 years. (It already exceeds 80 for women.) An American who makes it to age 65 can look forward to living almost two decades more. Worldwide, the increase has been even more dramatic. In a single century -- despite wars, AIDS and other scourges -- the global average more than doubled to 66 years. Nobel laureate Robert Fogel believes it will exceed 100 years within this century.

More than just the length of life, the number of healthy years will also increase. When people are vibrant into their 80s and 90s, 65 will evolve from the traditional retirement age to a mid-career milestone for those who choose to keep working. Who wants to retire when you have fulfilling work, when you earn a good income, and when you feel great? According to a Yahoo! poll, 70% of people over 55 say it's never too late to start a new business.

5. Many baby-boomer assets won't be liquidated. The Federal Reserve reports that the wealthiest 5% of American households own about 60% of the nation's assets. Ninety percent of all stock is owned by 10% of investors. Debate continues about how this concentration of wealth affects our society, but what seems irrefutable is that the owners of most wealth will have no urgent need to raise cash. A retiree with a $10 million net worth doesn't sell stocks to buy groceries or pay the mortgage. He can easily live on dividends and interest while preserving assets for his grandchildren or a favorite charity. And if wealthy retirees don't sell their assets, they won't put pressure on valuations.

In the top 1% of households -- which own a third of U.S. assets -- net worth starts above $10 million and moves well into the billions. Rather than sell assets, these families endow non-profit institutions and give their wealth to foundations, which are growing in number and size.

If the top 5% of wealth holders won't be liquidating their 60% of U.S. assets, what about the remaining 40% of assets owned by 95% of the population? For most baby boomers, the biggest chunk of their net worth is the equity in their house. Many of these houses will be transferred to the next generation through inheritance. For those properties that will be sold, their future prices will be greatly influenced by policy decisions affecting social capital -- things like good schools, clean air, cultural attractions, reasonable regulations and safe streets. A community that ignores the quality of its schools will eventually see that neglect reflected in its real estate market.

The best way to assure the future value of American assets is to focus on succeeding in the worldwide competition for human capital. We have some excellent preschool programs and the world's best system of higher education; but we need to shore up our K-12 educational infrastructure -- especially in science -- to help the next generation compete on a world stage.

When I went to Wall Street in 1969, the major providers of investment capital had adopted regression analysis and concluded that the future would be much like the past. So they financed yesterday's industries. Today's predictions of a coming asset liquidation problem seem to make the same mistake of projecting the past into the future. There's one thing I can predict about the future with complete confidence: it won't be anything like the past. It never is. But as long as we maintain asset values by enhancing human and social capital, I believe the future of the baby boomers -- and their nest eggs -- is secure.

Poverty's Changing Faces (WP)

By Bradley R. Schiller

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

The recently released poverty data paint a grim picture of life in America. Once again the U.S. Census Bureau tells us that 37 million people -- one of every 12 residents -- is living hand-to-mouth in the United States. This is a shocking statistic, especially in view of our extraordinarily high average incomes (around $60,000 per household), three years of robust economic growth, declining unemployment rates and a dramatic drop in welfare rolls.

Critics of the administration, of course, are quick to interpret this picture. They point to "tax cuts for the rich," punitive welfare reforms, a stagnant federal minimum wage, cutbacks in education and increasingly cutthroat international trade as explanations for both persistent poverty and the widening gap between rich and poor Americans. But whatever merit some of these explanations might have, they are not focused on the right subject. The most important picture that emerges from census data is not the size of the poverty population but its transitory nature.

The number of people living in poverty has been in a narrow range of 32 million to 37 million for the past 25 years. The 1991 recession briefly pushed the number of poor people up to 39 million; the 1995-99 economic boom shrank it to 31.6 million. The year-to-year changes have been about a million people, up or down.

Although the size of the poverty population has been fairly stable, its composition has not been. The people who were poor in 1981 aren't poor now. The 4 million poor people who were over 65 back then are mostly dead now. The millions of household heads who were unemployed then are probably retired from their jobs. And all those welfare kids being raised by single moms in 1981 are now grown up.

So who took their place in the poverty ranks? We've got a constant flow of immigrants, for starters. Well over a million immigrants -- both legal and illegal -- enter the country every year. Most come in at the lowest rungs of the economic ladder, working for the minimum wage or less. The household poverty rates among immigrants are twice as high as those of non-immigrants.

Then we've got 5 million or so low-achieving kids dropping out of high school every year. And more than a million births a year to single moms, about a third of whom are teenagers. On top of that, add more than a million divorces every year that often devastate someone's finances. Then there are the persistent scourges of death, disability and illness -- all of which throw families into poverty, often without warning. Finally, there's the economy, in which constantly shifting demands, costs and technology create a continuous profusion of winners and losers. So there's always a flow of new faces into the poverty ranks.

The outflow is just as impressive. Unemployed workers don't stay unemployed -- they do find work and exit the poverty population. Likewise, minimum-wage workers don't keep working for minimum wage. As they gain skills and experience, they command higher wages. Within three years of joining the labor market, 85 percent of minimum-wage entrants (primarily teenagers and immigrants) earn significantly more than the federal minimum.

Immigrants assimilate and move out of poverty as quickly today as in past generations. Most of the single moms will marry (again), gaining the greater economic stability of a two-parent family. Others, perhaps prodded by welfare reforms, will gain employment, particularly once their children start attending school. Inflation-adjusted Social Security and disability benefits will lift millions of older and disabled workers out of poverty.

The reality of our poverty population is constant churn. Some people fall into poverty every year, and just about as many escape its clutches. The popular notion of a "poverty trap" is greatly exaggerated. The flows in and out of poverty are far more impressive than the relatively small subgroup of individuals who stay in poverty for many years. Researchers have observed that three out of five families that fall into poverty in any one year are out of poverty the following year -- making poverty a highly transient state.

Even more impressive statistics were collected over a longer period. A University of Michigan study discovered that one out of three U.S. households experienced poverty in at least one year of a 13-year stretch. But only one out of 20 families was poor in at least 10 years, and only one out of 60 stayed poor in all 13 years. Hence, the permanent poverty rate is less than 2 percent, even though the annual poverty rate is closer to 13 percent.

The evident churning in the poverty population doesn't diminish its social importance. But it should change the way we look at poverty statistics and the policy choices we make. We don't have a permanent poverty caste in the United States. Instead we have a very fluid combination of demographic, social and economic forces that propel people in and out of poverty. Policy choices should focus on reducing institutional barriers that slow the poverty outflow and expanding (temporary) safety nets (e.g., unemployment benefits, child support) that reduce the poverty inflow.

The Deep Roots Of AIDS (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

YOKADOUMA, Cameroon

It was about 70 years ago, evidence suggests, that a man somewhere in this remote forest area of southeastern Cameroon butchered a sick chimpanzee — and the AIDS virus was born.

Chimpanzees here carry a strain of simian immunodeficiency virus (the monkey version of H.I.V.) that is genetically close to the main human variant. So the scientific betting is that the virus jumped to humans here and then traveled with human hosts by river south to Kinshasa, Congo, and then eventually to the wider world. The first proven case dates from Kinshasa in 1959.

I'm traveling with Casey Parks, the student who won my contest to accompany me on a reporting trip, and we've been talking to people about AIDS here in its possible birthplace because the world can't address global poverty unless we tackle AIDS effectively — and in places like this, it's obvious that still isn't happening.

We met the family of Pascal Nttomba beside the fresh mound in the garden where he was buried two weeks ago. Mr. Nttomba was the breadwinner for the 20 people in the family.

The Nttombas were relatively well off, living in a nice wooden house and sending their children to technical schools to learn vocations that would take them up a notch in the world. But then Pascal became sick.

He could no longer work, and the family used all its savings to try to cure him — first paying a traditional healer and then a doctor. Neither did any good, although the doctor charged more.

In theory, antiretrovirals are available here to control the disease. But they are mostly for middle-class victims in the cities, and as in most of Africa, an ordinary person in a remote area has next to no chance of getting the drugs. And so Pascal died, and now the family is destitute.

"There's nothing to eat in the house, since this morning," said his father, Valeré. The women in the family were planning to scour the fields for cassava leaves to cook for dinner. They say they can also go into the forests to look for edible wild plants, but malnutrition looms.

The children in technical school have dropped out, because there is no money. One of them is Hermine, a 19-year-old, who is now at risk of being approached by an older sugar daddy offering gifts in exchange for being his mistress, a common arrangement in Africa that has led to high infection rates among young women.

"I'd do it," she acknowledged — after all, the family needs money.

The family's predicament underscores how the virus not only kills people but also further impoverishes the world's poorest. And while the hardest-hit countries in southern Africa are doing a bit better against AIDS, others in the middle range like Cameroon or India haven't woken up to the severity of the problem.

An essential challenge is that 90 percent of those with H.I.V. worldwide don't know it, and you can't begin to tackle the disease when no one knows who has it. Here, for example, neither Pascal's wife nor any other member of his family has been tested.

The mantra has been "voluntary counseling and testing," but this tip-toeing approach is costing millions of lives.

DOJ_NMG_0065410

It's time to move to routine testing. Sure, that will cause difficulties; despite efforts to safeguard privacy, some who test positive will become pariahs and will be driven from their villages. But the present approach is even worse and is on track for a worldwide death toll of 70 million by 2020.

So unless they specifically opt out, people in high-prevalence countries should be tested whenever they enter the medical system, marry, enter the armed forces, take a job in the civil service, or get pregnant. That should be coupled with a pledge to try to make treatment available to all who test positive.

That emphasis on testing could be incorporated into the extension of President Bush's fine program against AIDS, which will save some nine million lives and is up for renewal next year. That program, which provided huge increases in spending and will be Mr. Bush's best legacy, should be extended with even more money, while dropping its obsession with abstinence-only programs.

With AIDS still killing 8,000 people every day worldwide — and infecting 14,000 more — we need to acknowledge that the present strategy isn't adequate. We need a more aggressive approach, built around greater testing, so that we don't go through another few decades with the Pascals of Africa dying needlessly and the Hermines selling themselves into sexual bondage.

The Critics Who Cried Wolfowitz (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

WHEN PRESIDENT BUSH appointed former Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz as head of the World Bank 18 months ago, it was as if John Ashcroft had been tapped to run the American Civil Liberties Union. Not since an architect of another war, Robert McNamara, led the bank has there been such mistrust within the development community, which typically ranges from left-leaning to socialist on the political scale.

The clash of perspectives is part of the reason for the recent tiff over Wolfowitz's drive to root out corruption in poor countries. In advance of this week's meeting of finance ministers in Singapore, Britain threatened to withhold a $94-million contribution to the bank, while debate over Wolfowitz's policies has been roiling the bank's executive board for months.

Critics are irked by Wolfowitz's tendency to cut off money to governments accused of corruption. Last year, he suspended $800 million in loans to a suspect program for maternal and children's health in India, and he suspended debt relief to the Republic of Congo after its president ran up an $80,000 hotel bill in New York. Under his leadership, the bank has blocked more than $1 billion in loans because of illegal practices by recipients.

Other World Bank chiefs have paid lip service to fighting corruption, but none has been so ready to do something about it. Opponents contend that his approach punishes the poor and innocent more than the guilty; even though some of the money in India may have been embezzled, for example, most of it was aiding needy children. Yet this ignores the fact that there is need everywhere, while aid is limited and should go to places it would be best spent. Corruption contributes to political instability, discourages private investment and justifies the views of foreign-aid opponents who argue that it's pointless to give money to poor countries that would only squander it.

This isn't to say that all World Bank policies are beyond reproach. Demands that loan recipients privatize such industries as water delivery have often done more harm than good. Yet the notion of withholding aid from countries that would waste it is sound. Unfortunately, it is also likely to be lost. The bank's policy board demanded on Monday that members have more input on decisions to suspend funding.

Wolfowitz has thwarted most of his critics by consistently doing the right thing. He has increased bank lending, helped lead a drive to forgive the debts of some of the world's poorest nations, spoken out against the developed world's agricultural protectionism and is a tireless advocate for the principle that rich countries are obliged to live up to their past promises to increase foreign aid. He has earned more leeway from his overseers, even if they don't approve of his friends in the White House.

Fun Union Facts (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

AFL-CIO President John Sweeney boasted recently that the union consortium intended to pour millions of dollars into this year's Congressional elections -- hardly a shocker. What is news is that this year, for the first time, rank-and-file union members are getting a look at precisely how much of their mandatory dues money is going to fund Mr. Sweeney's political causes, and plenty of other interesting details as well.

This month marks the deadline for the last of the nation's unions to file newly expanded disclosure reports, known as LM-2 forms. LM-2s have been around a long time, though until Labor Secretary Elaine Chao issued a rule requiring an expanded form in 2004, unions got away with providing the skimpiest details. This proved useful to union bosses who wanted to mask their political spending, or in some cases their corruption.

They are now being dragged into the sunshine. Whereas unions used to lump millions of dollars of disbursements into such vague categories as "sundry expenses," the new regime requires them to provide a detailed breakdown of who or what received union money: issue advocacy groups, political consultants, polling outfits, even hotels at which their members stayed. * * *

Hard-working union members deserve to know, for example, that of the AFL-CIO's $82 million in discretionary disbursements from July 2004 to June 2005, only 36% went to representing members in labor negotiations -- which is what unions were created to do. A whopping $49 million, or 60% of its budget, instead went to political activities and lobbying, while another $2.4 million went to contributions, gifts and grants. The National Education Association was even more skewed toward politics, spending only 33% of its $143 million discretionary budget on improving its members' lots.

By our calculations based on the filings, the AFL-CIO spent at least $2.7 million alone on T-shirts, flyers, telephone calls, Web site hosting, and other support for 2004 Presidential candidate John Kerry. Groups that received AFL-CIO money included Citizens for Tax Justice, an organization devoted to higher tax rates; the Economic Policy Institute, a think-tank that campaigns against Social Security privatization and tax cuts; and the Alliance for Justice, a ferocious opponent of President Bush's Supreme Court nominees.

Dues-paying workers of the world might want to ask: Why is Mr. Sweeney spending more of their money trying to raise taxes, or fighting for the cultural left, than he is on collective bargaining?

The IRS may also want to inspect these forms. That's because, prior to the new LM-2 disclosure rules, at least a dozen large unions had told the tax agency that they spent nothing on politics. The National Education Association's 2004 tax return, for instance, left blank the line for "direct or indirect political expenditures." Yet according to its LM-2, the NEA spent $25 million on such activities from September 2004 to August 2005. Eliot Spitzer could sure have fun with that one -- if he didn't have the NEA's endorsement.

The forms also offer a glimpse at union chief salaries. At least three union heads took home more than a million dollars in compensation in their last fiscal year -- though two were admittedly the heads of the NFL and NBA players unions. The third-fattest union cat was Martin Maddaloni, the chief of the Plumbers and Pipefitters, who took home $1.3 million last year. The Plumbers' "director of training" -- a fellow named George Bliss -- somehow managed to make $456,644 in 2005. Now we know why plumbers are so expensive: They have to make enough to pay the dues that keep their union reps in Armani.

The LM-2 forms show that some 1,015 paid union officers and employees devoted more than 90% of their time to political activities. Combined, these folks took home compensation worth nearly $53 million. Some 1,755 union personnel spent at least 50% of their time on political activities and lobbying.

As for financial management, let's just say some of these union chiefs are having fun in their jobs. United Auto Workers Local 14 reported it spent $67,000 at an amusement park. The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers spent $124,000 at a hotel resort. And the Plumbers forked over $225,000 on Nascar advertising.

A couple of other fun facts: Of the 100 highest paid union executives, 93% are men. We hope some class-action lawyer isn't looking to sue for gender discrimination. And, believe it or not, unions report that they spent $624,000 at largely non-unionized big box retailers across the country, including Target, Wal-Mart, Sam's Club, Costco and K-Mart. They apparently know a low price when they see one. * * *

When Secretary Chao proposed the new rules, unions were furious and came close to getting them blocked on Capitol Hill, and in court. Mr. Sweeney, the AFL-CIO chief, was quoted as saying the rule "will cost union members an estimated billion dollars a year," and that the average union would have to spend $1.2 million. The actual cost of AFL-CIO compliance turned out to be $54,000, so Mr. Sweeney was only off by 96%.

DOJ_NMG_0065412

Unions should have the right to spend whatever they want on politics, and we've defended that right against McCain-Feingold and other campaign-finance limits. At the same time, however, union members who don't like the way their coerced dues are spent have the right under the Supreme Court's Beck decision to ask for the political and grant portion of that money back. May these illuminating LM-2 disclosures be spread far and wide.

Judicial Politics Run Amok (NYT)

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

Contests for important state judgeships around the country are getting nastier, more partisan and tons more expensive. Monied interests seeking to influence court decisions are spending lavishly to boost preferred candidates, much as they do in campaigns for regular political office. Today's round of judicial elections in Washington State points to the seriousness of the problem and its threat to judicial integrity, independence and impartiality.

With three seats on the Washington State Supreme Court up for grabs, a record amount of money — some $2 million — has poured in to underwrite the contested races. Some of the television and radio attack ads against the incumbent chief justice, Gerry Alexander, were so unfair or misleading they would have seemed out of line even if the contests were for local alderman instead of a lofty position on the state's highest court. The inevitable result: reinforced ties between would-be judges and their partisan supporters, and diminished public respect and confidence in judicial decision making no matter which candidates win today.

The problem is hardly isolated. Thirty-nine states still choose at least some judges by election, instead of some preferable form of nonelective merit selection system. Recent court decisions have loosened restrictions on judicial campaigning without taking adequate care to delineate reasonable ethical boundaries needed to preserve public trust and the courts' special role as a neutral arbiter.

In 2004, spending on campaigns for state supreme courts rose to $42 million nationwide, up from $29 million just two years earlier. This year, spending in these contests is likely to spiral even higher, and pressure on candidates from interest groups seeking firm commitments, in writing, on controversial issues is likely to intensify.

Judges around the country are so concerned that the national Conference of Chief Justices, composed of top jurists from all 50 states, voted last month to start an initiative aimed at changing the deteriorating culture of judicial elections.

There is no perfect way to choose a judge. But to undermine the whole purpose of the court system by allowing special interests to buy judgeships, or at least try to, is the worst system of all.

Electoral Excuses (WP)

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

INSTEAD OF answers, there were excuses. Instead of a solution, there was whining. Those hoping to understand how and why Montgomery County so thoroughly botched primary day last week were sadly frustrated -- if not enraged -- by the unhelpfulness of top election officials at a County Council hearing on the subject yesterday. Only one thing became clearer: A change in leadership is needed to restore confidence in the county's ability to conduct elections.

Elections Board President Nancy H. Dacek and Election Director Margaret Jurgensen essentially washed their hands of responsibility and blamed state election officials for delays in the delivery of equipment and last-minute changes in procedures. No matter that the mistake that caused the most disruption (someone forgetting to deliver vital computer cards to the precincts) was homegrown. Never mind that county officials had not put in place a way to communicate with polling places in emergencies. Council members should have been allowed to ask questions of Ms. Dacek and Ms. Jurgensen, but Council Vice President Marilyn Praisner, who chaired the meeting, let the two off the hook, ostensibly so they could go help in the counting of provisional ballots.

Council members were properly outraged. As Tom Perez (D-Silver Spring) said, "we continue to have a situation where the county blames the state, the state blames the county and the victims are the voters."

The same could be said in Prince George's County and Baltimore -- which also experienced major breakdowns and which, a week later, appear no closer to a solution than Montgomery. The situation in Prince George's was overshadowed by Montgomery's problems, but voters there should be just as concerned about the competence of their election officials. Questions about the absence of judges in key precincts and suspicions about votes not being counted in a prompt manner have been referred to Maryland's state prosecutor, and we hope they will be thoroughly investigated.

There is, as we have said, no doubt that partisan bickering among Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), the legislature and the state Board of Elections caused stresses and strains that affected local boards of elections. However, the conduct of elections is the responsibility of county boards. While State Elections Administrator Linda H. Lamone could do more, she cannot take over their duties.

The state Board of Public Works is scheduled to hear from Ms. Lamone tomorrow in Annapolis. Let's hope the testimony leads to a plan of action for Nov. 7 and not a repeat of the blame game we saw yesterday in Rockville.

Bush Arrives At UN With Policy Problems (AP)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

President Bush faced disagreement Monday over how to confront Iran's nuclear ambitions and skepticism about his approach to Iraq and the Middle East as world leaders gathered for the U.N. General Assembly meeting.

Still, Bush was upbeat, focusing on his push for democratic change and first lady Laura Bush's call for governments to embrace literacy programs to improve lives.

"We don't believe freedom belongs only to the United States of America," Bush said at the White House Conference on Global Literacy hosted by his wife. "We believe that liberty is universal in its applications. We also believe strongly that as the world becomes more free, we'll see peace."

Bush arrived in New York to attend the 61st session of the world body with policy problems at home and abroad that have narrowed his room to maneuver on the international stage.

The U.S.-led war in Iraq is in its fourth year with no end to bloody sectarian violence in sight. International support is dwindling for imposing sanctions against Iran for defying U.N. demands that it halt certain nuclear work. The repressive Taliban regime toppled in Afghanistan is showing new signs of resilience. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict continues and Lebanon's government has, so far, proved too weak to rein in the Islamic militant group Hezbollah.

At home, Bush's approval rating, while experiencing a recent uptick, stands at just 40 percent. Americans are growing weary of the war. The White House is in a showdown with Senate Republicans over the interrogation and trying of terror suspects. And elections that will determine which party controls Congress are seven weeks away.

The president's so-called freedom agenda is the theme of his speech to the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday. He will focus on democratic reforms in Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon and elsewhere in the Middle East. He'll seek to quell skepticism about U.S. motives in the Middle East by working to avoid the impression that he wants to see a U.S.-style democracy imposed on any nation.

In his speech, Bush is expected to say that while military and law enforcement actions are needed to curb terrorism, the ultimate weapons are freedom and opportunity. He is to note two type of states in the Middle East — those with an absence of freedom and weak ones with fragile democracies, such as Iraq and Lebanon.

"I think the president sees this ... as a struggle between the forces of extremism and the forces of moderation in the Middle East," National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said, previewing Bush's speech. "And it's really a crucial time."

The president also is expected to firmly denounce Iran and Syria, two nations that Bush says are working to thwart freedom in the region. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad also planned to be at the United Nations, but Bush had no intention of talking with him.

On Tuesday, Bush will meet with French President Jacques Chirac, who is part of the coalition of nations working with the U.S. to try to stop Iran from doing work that could lead to a nuclear weapon.

Chirac, who is balking at the U.S. drive to sanction Iran for defying U.N. sanctions, proposed a compromise Monday to kickstart talks between Iran and the international community. Chirac suggested that the threat of U.N. sanctions be suspended if Tehran puts a freeze on its uranium enrichment work.

DOJ_NMG_0065414

"I am not pessimistic," Chirac said. "I think that Iran is a great nation, an old culture, an old civilization, and that we can find solutions through dialogue."

On Tuesday, Bush also meets with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan. Annan has been critical of the U.S.-led war in Iraq; Bush, on the other hand, says Americans are frustrated that the international body has been slow to reform.

Bush attended a reception Monday evening at the Manhattan home of Henry Kravis where he helped raise $1.4 million for the Republican National Committee. He spent the day with leaders from Malaysia, a democracy with a moderate Islamic government; El Salvador and Honduras, two Central American nations that have moved from military dictatorships to democracies; and the emerging African democracy of Tanzania.

Bush, who in 2003 warned that the United Nations could fade into history as an "ineffective debating society," now finds the United States relying more on the United Nations to help resolve problem in Iran, Lebanon, North Korea, Sudan and other global hotspots. On Wednesday, the president will meet with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Bush Says U.S. Policies Led By 'Freedom Agenda' (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

NEW YORK -- President Bush said yesterday that his "freedom agenda" remains the driving force for U.S. international policy, a day before his address to the U.N. General Assembly, in which he is expected to challenge the world to foster that vision in the Middle East.

"Those of us in a free society must help others realize the benefits of liberty. I believe that. I believe that's part of America's responsibility in the world," Mr. Bush told a gathering of international education officials and government leaders' spouses.

He joined first lady Laura Bush at the first White House Conference on Global Literacy, held at the New York Public Library, to lend support to his wife's signature issue.

The gathering was a warm-up for today's U.N. speech, during which the president is expected to push for a change in policies toward the Middle East, repeating his call that the world no longer should sacrifice freedom for stability.

With Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad speaking tonight, hours after Mr. Bush, the president is expected to use his time in New York to try to stiffen the resolve of the coalition working to stop Iran's uranium enrichment program. Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline imposed by the United Nations.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said yesterday that the administration is letting the Europeans take the lead in talking with Iran and that the U.S. will rejoin the talks only after Iran suspends its program.

"What we've always said was not permanent suspension; what we've said is, a verifiable suspension so we can then have a discussion," Mr. Hadley said.

Iran is just one of a series of international issues Mr. Bush will tackle during his three days here. News agencies reported yesterday that Mr. Bush will name a special envoy today to try to end the violence in Sudan's western region of Darfur.

Mr. Bush has labeled the killings there "genocide," but other countries have been reluctant to follow suit. Under international conventions, once a "genocide" is under way, other nations have an obligation to stop it. The news agencies reported that Andrew Natsios, the former chief of the U.S. Agency for International Development, was Mr. Bush's likely pick to be envoy.

Mr. Bush is scheduled to meet today with French President Jacques Chirac, whose nation is one of the three European countries spearheading the diplomatic efforts with Iran.

Yesterday, he met with leaders from Malaysia, Honduras, El Salvador and Tanzania, all democracies. Mr. Bush also has a meeting scheduled with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

"He's committed to peace, and we have worked with him and would continue to work with him. That's why the president is going to see him," Mr. Hadley said.

Dan Fisk, senior director for the Western Hemisphere at the National Security Council, said the leaders of El Salvador and Honduras backed the U.S. position in a fight over which nation will take the Latin America slot on the U.N. Security Council that Argentina will vacate at year's end.

Anti-U.S. Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, backed by Iran, wants the seat for his country, but the U.S. is backing Guatemala.

"Both countries -- Salvador and Honduras -- have expressed their support, by the way, for Guatemala in the U.N. Security Council. So that was reaffirmed by the other countries" in the meeting, Mr. Fisk said.

Mr. Bush touted the benefits of literacy yesterday, linking it to his freedom agenda. He said the ability to read makes for better workers, better consumers and better citizens.

"The goals of this country are to help those who feel hopeless; the goals of this country are to spread liberty; the goals of this country is to enhance prosperity and peace," Mr. Bush said.

U.S. Will Seize Diplomatic Opportunities At U.N. (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

NEW YORK -- U.S. diplomats this week will swallow their frustrations over the unwieldy U.N. bureaucracy and press for diplomatic progress at the annual General Assembly debate -- a global forum that will address issues ranging from Iran's nuclear ambitions to the war in Sudan.

The world body enacted few of the most important reforms proposed last year, but Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's plans to work in New York for more than a week reflects a recognition that, for better or worse, the United Nations is virtually the only forum to address a growing basket of global problems.

President Bush, by tradition, will address the world body on its opening morning, at about 11:30 today.

The administration plans to stress its "freedom agenda," particularly for the Middle East, a State Department official said last week.

The U.S. program for the session includes a private "democracy round table" for two dozen world leaders, a forum on Burma's human rights violations to be hosted by first lady Laura Bush, and tightly timed bilateral meetings for Mr. Bush and Miss Rice with their foreign counterparts.

U.S. officials said they are hopeful that the reform agenda that dominated last year's discussions will continue through the 61st session of the General Assembly.

During the seven-day debate, scores of world leaders will take the podium to share their views and meet on the sidelines to forge agreements on issues ranging from sanctions to trade and from peace to war.

That, diplomats said, is the power of the United Nations, even with all its imperfections.

"Why do people come to the U.N.?" French Ambassador Jean-Marc de la Sabliere asked last week, even as he lamented the slow progress on reforms. "Because it is needed."

Proposed reforms include a reconfiguration of the U.N. Security Council, whose five permanent members reflect the balance of global power in 1948, and measures to streamline the administration of the organization. The U.N. human rights body was reorganized last year, but the changes fell short of U.S. demands.

The Bush administration, meanwhile, has turned to the United Nations to help shore up Iraq's economy and development. More than a dozen nations participated in a meeting yesterday for the Compact on Iraq, which is seeking new funds for Iraq's reconstruction. Miss Rice represented the United States at the closed-door event.

U.S. officials said they do not expect to make significant progress on Iran or North Korea, both of which are pursuing potentially destabilizing nuclear programs.

The Middle East peace process will be reviewed tomorrow by the Quartet -- the United Nations, the United States, Russia and the European Union. The group is scouring the globe for troops to deploy on the Israel-Lebanon border under a U.N. resolution that ended the 34-day war between the Jewish state and Hezbollah guerrillas.

DOJ_NMG_0065416

Among the leaders en route to New York for the high-security event are: South African President Thabo Mbeki, French President Jacques Chirac; King Abdullah of Jordan; Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga, who has just declared her candidacy to succeed Mr. Annan; Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora; Cuban acting President Raul Castro; Sudanese President Omar Bashir; Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad; and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who is seeking a seat on the U.N. Security Council next year.

Bush To Address U.N. General Assembly (MCT)

By William Douglas And Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, September 19, 2006

UNITED NATIONS - President Bush addresses world leaders at the United Nations on Tuesday as his administration grapples with crises around the globe and seems to have fewer options for dealing with them.

The nuclear standoffs with Iran and North Korea, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and attacks in Sudan's Darfur region will top the president's agenda when he speaks to the U.N. General Assembly and privately to foreign leaders.

Bush has expressed frustration over the lack of progress in his key foreign policy initiatives and at times has criticized the United Nations for its deliberative pace and propensity for passing resolutions instead of taking concrete action.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and world leaders, in turn, have criticized the White House for the go-it-alone approach it took in Bush's first term.

"Bush is frustrated with the U.N. because the U.N. won't pick up and respond in an immediate way," said Stephen Schlesinger, director of the World Policy Institute at the New School in New York. "Iran remains a big problem for the administration, North Korea is a question mark, and Darfur is in the balance - three issues on the plate of the U.N. with no clear resolution."

On Tuesday, Bush intends to highlight his vision of spreading democracy in the Middle East as a way to combat terrorism.

"He will talk about, and I think really challenge, all of the other countries assembled there, and the United Nations as an institution, to take some responsibility in its role - and step up to the role of encouraging ... the forces of moderation in this struggle against extremism," National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley told reporters Monday.

On Iran, administration officials have put on hold the U.S. drive for sanctions against Tehran if it doesn't suspend uranium enrichment. Although they fear the Iranians are merely playing for more time to develop nuclear weapons, administration officials have little choice but to allow Europe's diplomacy with Iran to play itself out; their push for sanctions has run into resistance from allies.

The administration officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the talks, said they wouldn't be able to get European, Russian and Chinese support for sanctions until diplomatic efforts are exhausted. France, Russia and China are veto-holding members of the U.N. Security Council.

French President Jacques Chirac said Monday that Iran's suspension of uranium enrichment shouldn't be a precondition for negotiations. The Bush administration insists that it must be. Chirac also called for the threat of sanctions to be set aside, apparently backing away from a strategy that the European countries, Russia and the United States agreed to in June. Chirac and Bush are to meet on Tuesday.

European Union negotiator Javier Solana will meet here later this week with Iran's senior nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani. The EU, with U.S. backing, is trying to get Iran to suspend uranium enrichment temporarily, which would open the door to negotiations that the United States would join for the first time.

A senior State Department official, also speaking on condition of anonymity, said Chirac's comments weren't a break with the U.S. approach.

They're "consistent with the principle of suspension for suspension," said the official, referring to a prospective deal in which Iran would suspend uranium enrichment and the major powers would suspend efforts to impose sanctions.

The United States "will continue to actively work to define which sanctions will be in a U.N. Security Council resolution," the official said. "Meanwhile, Solana will keep open the channel with Larijani."

DOJ_NMG_0065417

Bush has said he has no intention of meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who'll address the general assembly Tuesday night.

Despite the lack of formal diplomatic contact between Tehran and Washington, some Middle East analysts believe progress could be made on the nuclear issue this week because it's in the best interests of both countries.

"Neither Iran nor the United States wants to be isolated," said David Mack, an analyst for the Middle East Institute and a former deputy assistant secretary of state under the first President Bush. "The powers in Tehran have made it clear that there's room for negotiation. The options to going to a unilateral (U.S.) military engagement don't look good. We're maxed out in terms of economic sanctions. There's nothing more that we can do."

White House officials also are looking for ways to end the unrest in Darfur. The White House is expected to announce that former U.S. Agency for International Development administrator Andrew Natsios will be the first presidential envoy for the war-torn region.

Bush told reporters Friday that he's frustrated with the U.N. handling of the situation, where government-backed militias have attacked and displaced millions of people.

A U.S.-sponsored peace pact is failing, and Sudan is opposing deployment of U.N. peacekeepers to replace an African Union peacekeeping force.

Gauging The Likelihood Of A Photo Opportunity Not Taken (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

The questions began before President Bush's helicopter even touched down in Lower Manhattan yesterday for a three-day visit marking the opening session of the United Nations General Assembly: Would they meet face to face? Even by chance?

The "they" in question were Mr. Bush and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, one of Mr. Bush's most prominent Middle Eastern foils. Mr. Ahmadinejad is scheduled to address the General Assembly just hours after Mr. Bush does today as the tense negotiations over Iran's nuclear program continue.

The United States has refused to join those talks until Iran suspends its nuclear enrichment program, something it has refused to do. Mr. Bush said flatly on Friday that he would not meet with Mr. Ahmadinejad at the United Nations this week — or any other week, anywhere else — if the Iranian leader did not first comply with his demands.

Aides to Mr. Bush bristled yesterday at the notion that they were trying to avoid a chance run-in between Mr. Ahmadinejad and Mr. Bush in the United Nations hallways. Contending that they were giving no extra attention to the possible walking route of the Iranian delegation or the Iranian leader's bathroom schedule, they said that to do so would only help to elevate the stature of a man they would rather diminish.

"This is not Khrushchev and Kennedy taking a measure of one another for the first time," said an administration official who would speak only on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak freely on the matter. "We're talking about the former mayor of Tehran here."

The official said it was possible that the two men could be in close proximity during a luncheon this afternoon that the United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, is holding, and that "nobody's going to body-block Ahmadinejad if he comes up with outstretched hand."

If anything, White House officials said they were surprised that so much was being made of a possible encounter. There was no such interest, they noted, when both men were at the United Nations last year.

But Iran's nuclear program is a major agenda item for Mr. Bush at the United Nations now. And Mr. Ahmadinejad's regional influence and ability to rankle the White House have seemed only to have grown in the past year.

Photographs of Mr. Ahmadinejad and Iraq's prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, embracing in Iran last week became fodder for Democrats to argue that the Bush policy in Iraq was going awry. The White House saw Iran's hand in the Hezbollah offensive against Israel earlier this summer. Mr. Ahmadinejad has also seemed to be competing with himself to make ever more inflammatory remarks about Jews and Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0065418

The atmosphere is certainly ripe for a showdown. Mr. Bush sees Mr. Ahmadinejad as leading a state sponsor of terrorism; Mr. Ahmadinejad has publicly challenged Mr. Bush to a televised debate.

Foreign policy analysts said they had mixed opinions about whether Mr. Ahmadinejad would want to press some sort of hallway confrontation. Edward Luttwak, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Affairs, said such a confrontation could be used to show a "defiance of the mighty." But, he said, Mr. Ahmadinejad would risk an unflattering comparison with Mr. Bush, who is considerably taller.

The speculation threatened to overshadow what the White House hopes will be a major address defending the president's foreign policy. White House officials said that his address would focus on Iran, as well as Iraq and Afghanistan, but that it would have an overarching theme of what the president frequently describes as "the greater ideological struggle" between radicalism and moderation. Officials said the speech would serve as something of a bookend to Mr. Bush's recent series of addresses on national security and terrorism.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush held a series of meetings with leaders of foreign nations that were intended to highlight the themes of his speech.

In a background session with reporters last week, senior administration officials said Mr. Bush's meeting yesterday with the prime minister of Malaysia, Abdullah Badawi, was intended to highlight a successful Islamic democracy. Administration officials said that Mr. Badawi raised his concern about the recent comments by Pope Benedict XVI about Islam and that Mr. Bush told Mr. Badawi that he believed that the pope's apology had been sincere.

Mr. Bush also met with the leaders of El Salvador, Honduras and Tanzania, before attending a Republican fund-raiser last night at the home of the financier Henry R. Kravis. White House officials said that on Thursday Mr. Bush would focus on Darfur. They hinted that he would appoint a new envoy for the region and did not dispute reports that it would be Andrew S. Natsios, a former United States Agency for International Development administrator.

UN Takes Centre Stage As Mandates Mount (FT)

Financial Times, September 19, 2006

One year ago, the United Nations was in turmoil, reeling from a wave of scandals, hamstrung by disagreements over terrorism, human rights and nuclear proliferation, and caught in an acrimonious and unravelling reform process.

Some asked whether they even might be witnessing the death throes of the 60-year-old organisation, as its creaking architecture struggled to respond to the new challenges.

Yet on Tuesday, as a panoply of leaders assemble to address this week's General Assembly session, the UN is back at the centre of almost every major dispute on the planet.

Despite divisions among its members, the Security Council is tackling crises from Lebanon to Iran, from North Korea to Darfur and the Palestinian territories, let alone a wealth of lesser crises in Africa, Haiti and East Timor.

And notwithstanding its differences, the council has, or is at least trying to craft, joint positions on nearly all of them – albeit often with limited results, such as in Darfur.

The US administration, public pronouncements aside, is embracing the UN in a way few would have imagined a year ago. By dispatching troops to Lebanon, Europe has put itself back in the business of peacekeeping.

The Security Council adopted a resolution threatening sanctions on Iran. Asia broke with precedent and allowed the UN to take a strong stand over North Korea's missile tests. The Middle East welcomed Kofi Annan's mediation on Lebanon and now wants the council to take centre stage on the wider peace process.

As the mandates have mounted, the UN's operational arms have seen unprecedented growth. Were the proposed Darfur mission to proceed, the UN would have more than 100,000 peacekeepers under its command in close to 20 countries: a huge challenge. Its aid agencies, financed by a new standing fund, are active in many more.

The UN is running a crim-inal investigation into the assassination of Lebanon's former prime minister and is conducting elections in the Congo. It handled the transfer of Liberia's former dictator to an international court, and is co-ordinating the worldwide response to avian flu.

In fact, in stark contrast to last year, UN officials' main fear is no longer in being sidelined but in being asked to do too much, too fast, without adequate tools to do so. "Our new challenge today is in the ricochet of world opinion," says Robert Orr, an adviser to Mr Annan. "Everyone is turning to us but we have the same capacity as on Monday."

Some analysts are asking whether the UN might be facing a new "early-90s" moment, when euphoria over the end of the cold war led to an exponential growth in its missions, followed by a string of catastrophes when they were overwhelmed.

But the atmospherics in 2006 are not the same. Rather than proclaiming the dawn of a new era, diplomats say the world is coming back to the UN, faults and all, because the challenges are so difficult that there is no one left to turn to.

The UN Secretariat, chastened by the disasters of Bosnia and Rwanda, and mismanagement of the oil-for-food programme, has since then become more realistic about what is achiev-able with what resources.

But, as one official suggested, while "the UN has, the member states have not".

UN appeals for more flexibility in hiring staff and allocating resources to manage its mandates were all but rejected by the developing world.

On Eve Of U.N. Speech, Bush Uses Informal Meetings To Set Tone (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, September 19, 2006

NEW YORK — President Bush exercised some personal diplomacy Monday on the eve of his annual address to the United Nations and pushed his hopes for democracy in Iraq and the Middle East with leaders of four smaller nations.

The one-on-one talks — known in diplomatic-speak as bilaterals — with the leaders of Malaysia, El Salvador, Honduras and Tanzania gave Bush a chance to charm and cajole his counterparts in a more intimate setting than before the 192-member U.N. General Assembly. Some countries in the world body, such as France, have criticized the president's decisions on the war in Iraq and other world affairs.

"They don't really set policy so much — they set a tone," Linda Jamison, a senior fellow with the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank, said about the private talks.

For example, during a brief visit Monday with Abdullah Ahmad Badawi, prime minister of Malaysia, the two leaders discussed the U.N.'s continuing role in the Middle East. "The main thing we talked about is how we can work together to keep the peace," Bush said.

The four countries involved in Monday's meetings have something in common: They are emerging democracies. El Salvador, for example, emerged from civil war during the 1980s and Honduras held its first election in 1982 after a decade of military rule.

The political histories of these countries are in keeping with Bush's dominant theme of freedom during his three-day U.N. visit. He is going to "emphasize the fact that countries need to find their way towards free and just societies in their own time consistent with their own culture and traditions," national security adviser Stephen Hadley said.

Michael Green, who worked for Bush at the National Security Council, said bilaterals can provide a relaxed forum to discuss issues such as beef sales to Japan or intellectual property rights in China.

"You drop these things in," Green said, "then the secretary of State or the ambassador can follow up."

Today, Bush meets with French President Jacques Chirac to discuss Iran's nuclear ambitions. Bush will also talk with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, a critic of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

Hadley said Bush would not meet this week with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who wants to "debate" his country's controversial nuclear program.

Iran's Freeze On Enrichment Could Wait, France Suggests (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

PARIS, Sept. 18 — In an effort to jump-start formal negotiations between six world powers and Iran over its nuclear program, President Jacques Chirac of France suggested Monday that Iran would not have to freeze major nuclear activities until the talks began.

DOJ_NMG_0065420

Over the years, Mr. Chirac has consistently taken an extremely hard line against Iran both in public and private. But his remarks in a radio interview could be interpreted as a concession to Iran, whose officials have said they will not suspend their production of enriched uranium as demanded by the United Nations Security Council.

"Iran and the six countries together, we must first find an agenda for negotiations, then start a negotiation," Mr. Chirac told Europe 1 radio. "During this negotiation I propose that on the one hand, the six refrain from referring the issue to the Security Council, and that Iran refrain from uranium enrichment during the duration of the negotiation."

In New York for the opening of the United Nations General Assembly, Bush administration officials insisted that the American position had not changed: that the United States would not join the talks until Iran suspended uranium enrichment. They said that the Europeans and Iranians might hold preliminary talks on suspension, and once Iran verifiably suspended enrichment, America could join those talks.

After reading the text of Mr. Chirac's remarks, a senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly on the subject, said he did not believe that Mr. Chirac had said anything that would require the United States to change its position.

"To tell you the truth, there's no suggestion being made that we would sit down with Iran before they suspend," the official said.

The formal position of the six world powers is that Iran must freeze uranium enrichment activities as a condition of the start of negotiations.

Mr. Chirac's remarks were the first time a leader of one of the six countries — the five permanent members of the Security Council (Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States) and Germany — has suggested that the suspension is not a precondition for talks.

In the interview on Monday, Mr. Chirac also made clear his opposition to sanctions. "I am never in favor of sanctions," Mr. Chirac said. "I have never seen that sanctions were very effective.'' He added, "Nothing replaces dialogue, you know."

Clearly, Mr. Chirac's remarks took Bush administration officials by surprise, in particular because ever since the six powers made a proposal to Iran on June 1 to provide a package of incentives in return for suspending enrichment, the Americans and the Europeans have been careful to appear unified. Russia and China might have to be dragged along, the thinking went, but the others would hold fast to the American line on sanctions.

But the United States and Europe have already given some ground by signing off on talks between Javier Solana, the European Union's chief diplomat, and the chief Iranian negotiator, Ali Larijani, about the conditions for suspension. The talks continue even though the deadline for Iran to suspend enrichment or face sanctions passed on Aug. 31.

Iran's nuclear program will be one of the main topics of conversation when President Bush and Mr. Chirac meet in New York on Tuesday during the General Assembly meeting.

In addition, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is planning to meet her counterparts in the Iran talks on Tuesday night to discuss how to proceed with a sanctions resolution, American officials said. "We're taking an opportunity to get the lay of the land and to determine what sanctions will be in the U.N. resolution," the Bush administration official said. But, he added, "no one expects that we're ready'' to put a resolution on the table this week.

Asked about Mr. Chirac's remarks concerning the timing of the talks, a senior European official said that Mr. Chirac was not only speaking for France, but also reflecting the current state of play in formal talks between Mr. Solana and Mr. Larijani.

What is currently under discussion is a convoluted formula in which the six powers could meet with Iran to discuss the agenda, but not substance, until Iran froze its nuclear activities, the official added. That approach would allow Iran to claim that negotiations had started; the United States and others could say they had not.

"We're trying to find a gimmick, a face-saving gesture that the Iranians will accept," said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity under normal diplomatic rules. He added that Mr. Chirac "has made explicit and public something that is common knowledge on both sides of the Atlantic."

"The Americans are aware of this discussion," he said.

The official added that American participation was crucial to the success of the talks. "At every step of the way, we need the agreement of the Americans,'' he said.

DOJ_NMG_0065421

Mr. Chirac agrees with the Bush administration's view that Iran is determined to develop a nuclear weapon. Like Mr. Bush, he has been eager to find a formula to induce Iran to stop its production of enriched uranium, which can be used for peaceful energy purposes — which Iran says is its intention — or to fuel a nuclear weapon.

Indeed, France and Britain, both on their own and in tandem with the United States, have worked for months on possible sanctions, and Mr. Chirac's remarks are certain to erode the sense of unity between the United States and the Europeans.

Throughout his long presidency, however, Mr. Chirac has been uncomfortable with the use of economic sanctions as a tool of foreign policy. While his criticism of sanctions on Monday seems to reflect that personal conviction, rather than any shift in French policy, it is likely to erode the sense of unity between the United States and the Europeans.

As for Mr. Chirac's remarks about stopping punitive action in the Security Council once negotiations are under way, that is generally understood by the six power group to be acceptable, as long as Iran has stopped enriching uranium.

In his talks with Mr. Solana, Mr. Larijani has proposed a freeze of uranium enrichment for only about two months, the two European officials said. Iran has accused France, Britain and Germany of dragging their feet in previous negotiations, forcing Iran to freeze major nuclear activities in exchange for rewards that never came.

The Europeans say they have no confidence that Mr. Larijani has full authority to negotiate on behalf of Iran's leadership. They say that at times Mr. Larijani admits he is not sure how far he is authorized to go.

France's Chirac Not In Favor Of Iran Sanctions (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Michael Abramowitz, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

On Eve of Bush U.N. Speech, Words Complicate U.S. Push

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 18 -- In a potential break with the Bush administration, French President Jacques Chirac said Monday that he is "never in favor of sanctions" and suggested that the United States and other nations could begin talks with Iran on its nuclear program before Iran formally suspends its nuclear activities.

Chirac's remarks came as President Bush prepared to address the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday, part of an intensifying U.S. drive to secure international sanctions against Iran. The French president, in a 45-minute interview on European radio, appeared to upend that diplomatic drive and signaled a widening breach on Iran between the United States and European partners, reminiscent of the debate over the Iraq invasion four years ago.

Perhaps mindful of those tensions, some U.S. officials both publicly and privately played down Chirac's comments, insisting there was little daylight between the U.S. and French positions. But others said that the remarks took them by surprise and that they would seek an explanation from the French at meetings on Tuesday.

In his speech, Bush plans to take a far less aggressive approach to Iran than he did four years ago in arguing for action against Iraq, U.S. officials said, casting the debate over Iran as part of a noble effort to bring democracy to the Middle East. The officials said that Iran will not be the major focus of the speech and that Bush also plans to announce he will name a special envoy to spearhead efforts to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region.

Chirac's comments represented another potential hurdle for Bush, who is coming to the United Nations this week seeking considerable assistance from the world community, including peacekeeping troops for Lebanon, financial aid for the reconstruction of Iraq and political support for his efforts to shut down Iran's nuclear program. At the same time, however, U.S. leverage has been weakened by the ongoing war in Iraq, and diplomats are skeptical that the lofty theme of Bush's speech Tuesday -- bringing freedom and democracy to the Middle East -- will be of much practical significance in swaying countries to Bush's side.

In fact, Chirac, who will meet with Bush before the American president's speech, noted in the radio interview that the difficulties in Iraq showed he had been right to oppose that war in the first place.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser in the Carter administration, said if Bush offers another "pep talk" about democratization in the Middle East, he risks losing an audience skeptical of the U.S. venture in Iraq and what it sees as a lack of American engagement in promoting an Israeli-Palestinian peace deal.

DOJ_NMG_0065422

"The speech is a major challenge, and if he plays it intelligently he can regain some of the ground he has lost," said Brzezinski, a trustee at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "He would be well advised to take a moderate tone. . . . He hopes to isolate [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad. If he adopts a belligerent tone and makes threats, it will be easy for Ahmadinejad to isolate him."

Bush is clearly hoping to make democracy promotion the theme of this week's meetings marking the opening of the U.N. General Assembly, and he held several meetings Monday with the leaders of countries the White House considers emerging democracies -- El Salvador, Honduras and Tanzania -- as well as Malaysia, whose government advocates a moderate form of Islam.

But Iran was shaping up as his major strategic challenge. In June, the five permanent members of the Security Council, plus Germany, offered to negotiate with Iran on a package of incentives to end its uranium-enrichment program, but only if Iran verifiably froze its nuclear activities first -- a stance that was affirmed in a U.N. Security Council resolution only last month. But under Chirac's formulation, that red line apparently would be erased.

"I believe that on the one hand that Iran and the six countries must first establish a schedule for negotiation, then must embark on negotiations," Chirac said, apparently referring to setting up an agenda for the talks. "And during these negotiations, I suggest that on the one hand the six give up on referring the matter to the Security Council and that Iran should give up the enrichment of uranium for the duration of the negotiations."

Chirac met last week with a senior Iranian envoy, Hashemi Samareh, who appealed to Chirac by saying Iran wanted to be partners with France and the rest of Europe in creating a stable Middle East, according to European diplomats briefed on the talks. Samareh also noted that Iran believed Lebanon's government might soon fall, which some took as a not-so-subtle warning about Iran's influence in a country with close ties to France.

Chirac's comments Monday were sometimes imprecise, leaving them open to interpretation. U.S. officials chose to focus on second half of his statement -- his call for Iran to suspend its nuclear program -- to argue that Chirac was not changing the terms of the agreement. One U.S. official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said he did not think Chirac was asking for the United States to sit at the table with the Iranians before the Iranian programs were frozen.

Another U.S. official said Chirac's public comments mattered less than what he tells Bush in private Tuesday morning. On Tuesday evening, Rice will hold a dinner with her counterparts from France, Germany, Britain, Russia, China and Italy, in what U.S. officials billed as a session to determine what elements would be in a sanctions resolution.

Nile Gardiner, a foreign policy expert at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said Chirac's remarks were "deeply unhelpful" to U.S. efforts to secure international support for sanctions against Iraq. "It will generally reduce the likelihood of a U.N. Security Council resolution," he said. "The French are going to fight tooth and nail against the imposition of European sanctions, which is certainly a big blow to the U.S. and Britain."

European Union negotiator Javier Solana has been leading talks with a senior Iranian official on the nuclear program, Ali Larijani, in an effort to find a face-saving solution that would permit talks to begin without making it appear that Iran was buckling under pressure.

One of the formulas under discussion would have the European Union countries begin the talks, and then the United States would join them once Iran suspended its programs -- which by itself would be a softening of the original offer that no talks would start until Iran suspends.

While U.S. officials announced Monday that Larijani has not yet come to New York, Solana told reporters he remained confident the two would meet this week.

France Now Opposes Iran Punishments (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065423

UNITED NATIONS — As world leaders converged at the United Nations on Monday, French President Jacques Chirac dealt a significant blow to the Bush administration's effort to slow Iran's nuclear development, saying his government would join Russia and China in resisting the U.S. push for sanctions against Tehran.

"I am never in favor of sanctions," Chirac told Europe 1 radio on the eve of the General Assembly's annual debate. "I have never observed that sanctions were very effective."

Chirac proposed a compromise in which the Security Council would suspend the threat of sanctions and Iran would suspend enrichment of uranium while the two sides talked. As a last resort, after diplomacy had been exhausted, France might consider penalties, he said, but only "moderate and adapted" ones.

The division over sanctions seems likely not only to complicate policy on Iran, but also to affect the administration's efforts to win international help on a range of other issues, diplomats and analysts say.

Bush plans to make Iran a centerpiece of his address to the General Assembly today, explaining why he considers the regime in Tehran a grave threat and insisting that sanctions be imposed if negotiations fail.

He will also talk about the administration's Iraq policies and its support for a peacekeeping mission in the Darfur region of Sudan in the face of opposition from the Sudanese government.

But on both issues, Washington finds itself on the opposite side from several Security Council members, including Russia and China, both of which have veto power on the council. In the Sudan case, the two nations, backed by other council members such as Qatar, insist that the U.N. must not intervene in a nation without its government's permission, even when the international community does not agree with the country's actions.

The change of heart by France means three of the five veto-holding members of the Security Council now oppose the U.S. stance on Iran.

"As preceding the Iraq war, Chirac's public comments are unfortunate, because France is a very powerful player," said Judith Kipper, a Middle East expert at the Council on Foreign Relations.

"It could encourage the Iranians and countries that are anti-American to believe that the United States is isolated. And if President Bush believes that there is no cooperation from the Security Council, it may encourage him to believe the only option is to strike Iran."

White House officials said Monday that their position on Iran had not changed, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice scheduled to talk with U.S. allies in New York this week about a possible resolution calling for sanctions.

Bush is to meet today with Chirac, and Rice plans to dine tonight with representatives from the countries negotiating with Iran: Britain, China, Russia, France, Germany and, as of Monday, Italy. All have agreed that Iran must stop enriching uranium — a process that can be used to produce energy or a nuclear weapon — in order to create trust before talks on helping Iran create a nuclear energy program can resume.

European diplomats say they want the United States to sit at the same table with Iran before they consider talks to have failed.

"I do not believe in solutions that do not involve dialogue … taken to its limits," Chirac said Monday.

Bush has ruled out discussions with Iranian officials unless they halt their nuclear program, and there will be no U.S. contact with the Iranian delegation this week, officials said.

European diplomats are scrambling to arrange a face-saving compromise that could allow Iran to suspend enrichment after talks resumed — with the U.S. then joining the negotiations. U.S. officials stopped short of ruling out that option Monday.

National security advisor Stephen J. Hadley said the administration was looking first for "a verifiable suspension so we can then have a discussion."

The U.S. also is seeking ways to put pressure on Iran outside the Security Council. At a meeting of Group of 7 finance ministers in Singapore on Monday, U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. warned Western banks of the "risks" of doing business with Iranian companies suspected of trafficking in materials for the production of nuclear weapons.

Union Bank of Switzerland has already halted business with Iran, and the U.S. this month banned American banking transactions with Bank Saderat, a state-owned Iranian financial institution suspected of channeling funds to terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0065424

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, was expected to continue talks this week with Javier Solana, the European Union's chief diplomat.

On Monday, Larijani had not yet arrived in the U.S. An Iranian diplomat said some members of the Iranian delegation had not received visas, but it was unclear whether that was the reason for Larijani's absence.

Iran is just one intractable problem world leaders will tackle in New York this week. Bush is expected to seek to rally support for his "freedom agenda" in the Middle East, and to paint conflicts there as the clash of extremism and moderation. He is also expected to seek other nations' help in investing in Iraq and supporting its fledgling government as it grapples with sectarian violence.

Additionally, he is likely to urge nations to continue helping shore up the fragile truce in Lebanon and to contain Hezbollah in the aftermath of this summer's conflict between the militant group and Israel. Iran, a Hezbollah sponsor, can make or break the cease-fire.

The continuing violence in Sudan also will be one of the main topics this week at the United Nations, both as an impending crisis and as a test of the world's "responsibility to protect" civilians whose governments have failed them — a tenet world leaders agreed to at last year's session.

The government in Khartoum has refused to allow U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur to help protect the more than 2 million people who have been displaced during three years of attacks by government-aligned militias.

Human rights groups have warned that a massive Sudanese military campaign to put down rebel groups could cause hundreds of thousands of casualties. The government has said it will take care of its own people, alongside a force of about 7,000 African Union troops due to leave at the end of the month.

China, Russia and Qatar insist the Security Council cannot send peacekeepers to the region without Khartoum's consent. But Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) said Monday that the Sudanese ambassador to the U.N. had told her Khartoum would allow the African Union force to extend its stay and expand.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton said he would circulate a resolution today for a vote Thursday on allowing an existing U.N. force in southern Sudan to expand into Darfur. Foreign ministers of Security Council members are expected to attend.

Chirac Backs UN Compromise On Iran (FT)

By Martin Arnold In Paris And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, September 19, 2006

Jacques Chirac, France's president, could be heading for another clash with the US over the Middle East, after pushing the United Nations security council to scale down its threat of sanctions against Iran.

Mr Chirac, who is widely expected to step down next year, on Monday also fired a clear warning shot at Nicolas Sarkozy, his rebellious interior minister and likely successor, who is thought to have infuriated the president with his recent declarations, particularly on Franco-US relations.

Mr Chirac's appeal for the UN Security Council to relax its position on sanctions, made in a rare interview with French radio on Monday, mirrors the recent position of Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, who indicated his support for a compromise last week.

Earlier this year the Security Council backed a resolution which called for Iran to suspend uranium enrichment by August 31 and warned of economic sanctions if Tehran failed to do so.

At the same time, the world's big powers also told Iran that it had to suspend enrichment, which can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material, before formal negotiations could begin on improving ties between Tehran and the west.

But some EU diplomats, including Mr Solana, have responded warmly to a compromise floated by Iran in which Tehran would halt enrichment not before but during negotiations.

Mr Chirac explicitly endorsed such a plan of action - even though EU diplomats say they have yet to receive proof that Tehran has committed itself to the proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0065425

"We must first find an agenda for negotiations, then during these negotiations I suggest that, on the one hand, the six (the US, the UK, France, Germany, China and Russia) renounce involving the security council and Iran renounces uranium-enrichment during the negotiations," said the French president.

Mr Chirac said that he had "never seen that sanctions were very effective", and suggested that should they be needed, any sanctions on Iran should be "moderate and adapted". He added that he was "not pessimistic" on the prospect of a deal with Iran.

His comments are likely to worry US officials. Washington is reluctant to give more concessions to Iran and sceptical about how long any suspension would last.

UK diplomats, who are keen to keep the US on board and maintain a common international front, are also upset by Mr Chirac's comments. The UK fears that, by accepting an Iranian compromise before it has even been made, the international community could weaken its hand, so reducing the ultimate chances of a deal.

Mr Chirac is also thought to be furious about Mr Sarkozy's speech in Washington last week. The interior minister criticised French "arrogance" and suggested that Paris had gone too far in 2003 by threatening to use its UN security council veto to block a US-led invasion of Iraq.

The 73-year-old president distanced himself from his interior minister, saying: "We have relations (with the US) that can only be between equals, which cannot be a relationship of submission." His comments were a clear rejection of Mr Sarkozy's call for Franco-US relations to be "rebuilt".

Last week, David Cameron, the leader of Britain's opposition Conservative party, struck a similar note, by saying that the UK should not have a "slavish" relationship with the US.

Mr Chirac defended his opposition to the war in Iraq. "When I look at the situation, I do not fell I have committed an error," he told Europe 1, before flying to New York for Tuesday's meeting of the UN General Assembly, where he will meet George W. Bush, US president.

In a private conversation with aides, Mr Chirac went much further, slamming Mr Sarkozy's speech as "irresponsible" and a "lamentable… error" that was "a danger for France", according to Monday's Libération newspaper.

The fierce criticism exposes deep ideological divisions between the two men over foreign policy, which many observers judge to have been one of the more successful areas of Mr Chirac's rule.

France's president believes France should act as a counter-weight to US hegemony wherever possible. But Mr Sarkozy last week argued for much closer relations between the two countries, declaring: "Never again should we turn our disagreements into a crisis."

The animosity between the two men could influence next April's presidential election. Mr Chirac still has not ruled out standing for a third term as president. But even if he steps aside, as most expect him to do, he could still become a serious nuisance for Mr Sarkozy during the campaign.

French Leader Proposes Iran Compromise (AP)

By Elaine Ganley, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

President Jacques Chirac proposed a compromise Monday to kickstart talks between Iran and the international community, suggesting the threat of U.N. sanctions be suspended in exchange for Tehran halting its uranium enrichment program.

"I don't believe in a solution without dialogue," Chirac said in an interview with Europe-1 radio. He suggested the international community suspend the threat of U.N. sanctions and that Iran, in turn, suspend enrichment while the two sides talk.

"I am not pessimistic," Chirac said. "I think that Iran is a great nation, an old culture, an old civilization, and that we can find solutions through dialogue."

Upbeat about the standoff with Iran over its nuclear program, Chirac said in the wide-ranging radio interview that he was pessimistic about the outcomes in Iraq and Sudan's war-ravaged Darfur region.

Chirac spoke before leaving for New York to attend the annual U.N. General Assembly, which opens Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0065426

Asked about Iran, the French president noted that "Iran for years developed a clandestine nuclear program." However, "I am never favorable to sanctions" and, should they be unavoidable, they should be "moderate and adapted," he said.

In Vienna, Iranian Vice President Reza Aghazadeh said his country was "ready for negotiations and political compromise." However, he coupled that remark with a warning that "any hostile action by the U.N. Security Council would lead to limitation of cooperation" with the International Atomic Energy Agency.

The IAEA's inspectors are trying to determine whether Tehran is using its nuclear program to make weapons, as the United States and other countries fear. Iran assures it is for civilian use.

At an IAEA conference, where Aghazadeh spoke, nations called on Iran to freeze enrichment in accordance with a Security Council demand. The U.N. Security Council has passed a resolution providing for possible economic and diplomatic sanctions against Iran for its refusal to halt uranium enrichment.

Chirac suggested Iran and the six nations involved in the issue — France, Germany, Britain, Russia, China and the United States — set an agenda for talks, then move ahead, with both sides removing the burden of threats.

"We must, on the one hand, together, Iran and the six countries, meet and set an agenda, then start negotiations. Then, during these negotiations, I suggest that the six renounce referring (Iran to) the U.N. Security Council and that Iran renounce uranium enrichment during negotiations," Chirac said.

European and U.N. officials said Monday that senior EU and Iranian negotiators planned to meet in New York later this week to try to establish enough common ground to spark negotiations.

The French president said he has no plans to meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad while in New York, saying he "deplores" the anti-Israeli remarks of the Iranian leader. Ahmadinejad has said Israel should be "wiped off the map."

"I have very clearly stated that ... the conditions for a personal dialogue have not been fulfilled," Chirac said.

The United States and Britain have backed moving quickly to sanctions if Iran does not comply with demands that it cease its enrichment program.

Russia and China have appeared most hesitant to call for sanctions, while French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said earlier this month that a "gradual approach" was needed.

Chirac, responding to questions on other international issues, said:

• On Iraq: "I am not sure we can ever really get out of this, in any case as long as there is no known goal for Iraqis concerning the departure of foreign troops." Asked by CNN, in a separate interview, whether France would help the United States in Iraq, Chirac said, "If the United States and President Bush ... asks me any question on this topic, well of course I will welcome anything he asks and I will answer him."

• On Darfur: Chirac urged Sudan to accept the deployment of U.N. peacekeepers. He told CNN he foresaw "millions" more displaced persons and "possibly even hundreds of thousands" more dead as the rainy season ends.

• On Lebanon, Chirac said the U.N. peacekeeping resolution for Lebanon must be carried out "without reservations" so the government can regain control of its territory. He suggested there is a place for Hezbollah — but in politics, not as an armed militia.

• On French-U.S. ties, Chirac said he has very good relations with Bush, but added, "In our relations we can only be equals. It cannot be a relationship of submission."

In Turnaround, US Sees Two-track Approach To Iran Nuclear Crisis (AFP)

AFP, September 19, 2006

The United States, faced with a growing reluctance among its allies to impose sanctions on Iran, showed a new readiness to accept a two-pronged approach in their bid to end Tehran's suspected nuclear weapons program.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in New York Monday for the UN General Assembly, said the United States was continuing to press for a UN Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on Iran over its refusal to stop enriching uranium.

DOJ_NMG_0065427

Rice has insisted the sanctions are an essential first response to Iran's refusal to heed an earlier Security Council resolution that gave Tehran until August 31 to freeze its enrichment program -- which can produce fuel for nuclear power generation but also provide the material for atomic weapons.

But the Americans softened their approach Monday after French President Jacques Chirac broke ranks and called for continued negotiations with Iran prior to taking any steps towards sanctions.

It was the first time a European leader has clearly stated that suspending uranium enrichment was not a precondition for opening negotiations on the nuclear dossier -- a stance fiercely defended until now by the United States.

Friday, US President George W. Bush assailed similar suggestions that Tehran be given more time and said he would be seeking to convince fellow leaders on the sidelines of the General Assembly this week that "stalling shouldn't be allowed."

But when asked Monday about ongoing European efforts to negotiate with Iran, Rice declined to repeat her boss's hardline stance, saying only that discussions were continuing with the four other permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany.

"We have a meeting of the P5-plus-1 tomorrow night and we will talk about it," she said.

Her spokesman, Sean McCormack, went further in acknowledging the existence of a two-track approach where the US pursues its campaign for sanctions in parallel with the European negotiating effort.

"It's a strategy to try to do everything possible to convince Iran to take a positive pathway," he said.

Rice discussed the Iran issue Monday with Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing of China, which has been among the most reticent allies on the sanctions issue.

Bush is scheduled to meet here with Chirac on Tuesday ahead of Rice's evening meeting with her counterparts from Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia, known as the P5-plus-1, as well as Italy's foreign minister.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will also be in New York, although Bush and Chirac both ruled out meeting the hardline leader.

Chirac Looks To Avoid Iran Standoff (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, September 19, 2006

NEW YORK — French President Jacques Chirac on Monday offered a way around a diplomatic standoff over Iran's nuclear program by saying negotiations could begin before Tehran suspends its uranium enrichment program.

The United States has demanded suspension of the program as a precondition for talks. Chirac, however, said Europe, Russia and China could open negotiations with Iran first and bring the United States into the talks only if Iran agrees to halt its nuclear fuel program.

Iran says its program is for energy purposes and refuses to end its research. The United States has said Iran is trying to make a nuclear bomb.

“I think we should be able to reach a solution,” Chirac said in an interview with USA TODAY. “It's in my nature to be optimistic.”

Chirac made the remarks on the eve of the annual meeting of the United Nations General Assembly, where President Bush has said he will confront Iran about its nuclear program. Chirac will also address the annual meeting of the General Assembly and meet with Bush today. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is scheduled to address the U.N. today as well.

The United States has said it will talk with Iran only if it suspends nuclear enrichment. The United States is pushing the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran.

Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, said “our views haven't changed.”

Clifford Kupchan, an Iran expert at the Eurasia Group, a New York-based consulting firm, said the proposal is “a potentially promising way to get from here to there diplomatically.”

The United States would not have to change its position and would enter talks only if its conditions were met.

Chirac said he didn't rule out sanctions against Iran but doubted they would work. “Experience has shown us that sanctions never lead to anything positive,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0065428

Chirac, 73, who sat for a 45-minute interview at the Mandarin Hotel, also said:

• He would use his U.N. speech to propose an international peace conference to revive the Middle East peace process.

•The Bush administration should give Iraqis "the sense that there is a cutoff point to the presence of foreign troops." The administration has opposed setting deadlines for troop withdrawal. Chirac expressed support for Iraqi Prime Minster Nouri al-Maliki, but added, "I wouldn't say I'm highly optimistic about his chances of success."

U.S. Encounters EU Opposition To Iran Sanctions (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

NEW YORK -- The Bush administration faces stiffening opposition in Europe to its effort to impose sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program, a topic that will be the center of debate this week as world leaders gather at the United Nations.

In another sign that Europe strongly backs further talks with Tehran rather than threats of economic punishment, French President Jacques Chirac said he is "never in favor of sanctions" and believes that "nothing is as good as dialogue."

His remarks in a radio interview dovetail with a growing sentiment among the leaders of Germany, France, Russia and China that the U.S.-led quest for sanctions -- as laid out in a U.N. Security Council resolution in July -- are counterproductive and should be set aside for now as Europe tries to engage Iran in a series of informal talks.

Washington is also showing signs of increased flexibility on the Iran front, largely because it has gained so little support among key countries for imposing sanctions. Instead, the Bush administration is now quietly supporting efforts by the European Union's foreign-policy chief, Javier Solana, to engage Iran in negotiations before Tehran agrees to suspend uranium-enrichment work.

A July U.N. resolution threatened to slap sanctions on Iran if it didn't suspend its controversial enrichment work by Aug. 31 as a precondition to international talks on the future of its nuclear program. Iran insists its enrichment work is for peaceful purposes, but highly enriched uranium is also a key ingredient for making nuclear weapons. President Bush in recent weeks has repeatedly described a potential nuclear Iran as a "grave threat" to Israel and the Middle East.

Iran has since refused to stop its enrichment program while continuing to offer vague hints that it is open to broad nuclear talks.

Mr. Bush's national-security adviser, Stephen Hadley, told reporters on the way to New York yesterday that the U.S. hopes Mr. Solana can broker a deal with Iran's main negotiator, Ali Larijani, in which Tehran agrees to a verifiable suspension of its enrichment program. At that point, he said, the U.S. would be prepared to join a round of larger talks on the future of Iran's nuclear program.

The U.S. and its partners are basically offering Tehran a concession by setting aside the threat of sanctions and agreeing to negotiate over what was just a month ago a hard-and-fast precondition for negotiations.

Mr. Bush endorsed this approach on Friday, when he said he expects Iran to "negotiate with the EU in good faith. And should they choose to verifiably suspend their program -- their enrichment program -- we'll come to the table."

European diplomats are now hailing what they call "dual-track diplomacy" with Iran, in which the U.S. and others talk quietly about a possible sanctions resolution while the EU attempts to hash out a suspension deal with the Iranians. In his remarks to Europe 1 radio, Mr. Chirac said he didn't rule out future sanctions but said that if they come to pass, they should be "moderate and adapted."

Mr. Solana had expected to meet Mr. Larijani in New York this week, although there was no sign that the Iranian negotiator had arrived in the U.S. European officials say there is some chance of broader talks in the next week between the EU and Iran.

Mr. Bush, who is in New York until tomorrow, plans to stress the need for international cohesion toward Iran in his speech before the U.N. today. He will also meet privately with Mr. Chirac, the only other head of state among the five permanent U.N. Security Council members who has come to the annual session. Russia, China and Britain sent their foreign ministers.

European diplomats familiar with the past week's talks between Messrs. Solana and Larijani say the Iranians continue to move exceedingly slowly, making it impossible to predict if they are willing to offer important concessions. A big indication, they say, will come late today when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad gives his speech to the U.N.

Chirac Hits At Sarkozy Over Pro-US Stance (FT)

By Martin Arnold

Financial Times, September 19, 2006

Jacques Chirac, France's president, on Monday exposed deep ideological divisions at the top of the French government by rebuking Nicolas Sarkozy, his rebellious interior minister and likely successor, for toeing an overly pro-US line.

Mr Chirac also set up another possible clash with the US over the Middle East by urging the UN Security Council to scale down its threat of sanctions against Iran, ahead of Tuesday's General Assembly meeting in New York.

The French president, widely expected to step down next year, is thought to be furious about Mr Sarkozy's speech in Washington last week, when the interior minister criticised France's "arrogance" in its relations with the US.

Mr Sarkozy struck at the heart of Mr Chirac's foreign policy legacy by suggesting Paris went too far in 2003 by threatening to use its UN veto to block a US-led invasion of Iraq.

In a rare radio interview, the French president distanced himself from his interior minister, saying: "We have relations [with the US] that can only be between equals, which cannot be a relationship of submission."

The 73-year-old Mr Chirac defended his opposition to the war in Iraq. "When I look at the situation, I do not feel I have committed an error," he told Europe 1, before flying to New York for today's UN meeting, where he will meet US President George W. Bush.

In a private conversation with aides, Mr Chirac went further, slamming Mr Sarkozy's speech as "irresponsible" and a "lamentable . . . error" that was "a danger for France", according to yesterday's Libération newspaper.

The president sees France as a natural counter-weight to US hegemony. But Mr Sarkozy wants closer relations, declaring last week: "We must rebuild the transatlantic relationship on the basis of trust and shared responsibility. I don't want to see an arrogant France with a diminished presence."

Mr Sarkozy's pro-US stance has drawn flak from leftwing opponents. Laurent Fabius, former Socialist premier and presidential hopeful, described Mr Sarkozy as "Mr Bush's future poodle".

The animosity between Mr Chirac and Mr Sarkozy could influence next April's election. Mr Chirac still has not ruled out standing for a record third term, hinting yesterday he would wait until March before announcing his decision.

Venezuela Tightens Iran Links With Trade Pacts (FT)

By Phil Gunson

Financial Times, September 19, 2006

Hugo Chávez's efforts to build an anti-US coalition received a boost on Monday following a visit by Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's president, to Venezuela and the signing of trade agreements between the two countries.

The two presidents are due to arrive in New York on Tuesday, where both are expected to address the UN General Assembly.

Mr Chávez has been lobbying intensively to win a two-year term on the Security Council. Next month's vote on the seat, which will pit Venezuela against US-backed Guatemala, will be a "thermometer reading of how anti-US the member nations of the UN are", according to Alberto Garrido, a political analyst.

Mr Chávez, who supports Iran's nuclear programme, reiterated with Mr Ahmadi-Nejad their opposition to "US imperialism" and their support for a "multipolar" world order, free of the hegemony of what Mr Ahmadi-Nejad called "the tyrants of the world – above all, the Americans".

The two leaders signed 29 bilateral agreements in areas as diverse as petrochemicals, health, mining and agriculture.

In a series of international tours this year, the Venezuelan leader has secured support for his Security Council seat candidacy from much of Latin America and Africa, along with Russia, China and a large part of the Muslim world.

However, doubts remain as to whether he will obtain the required two-thirds of votes on the first ballot, not least because voting is secret. "Some governments may not be telling the truth," said a European diplomat, "especially among the small Caribbean nations."

DOJ_NMG_0065430

Failure to win outright could lead to a protracted series of inconclusive votes, and possibly the emergence of a compromise candidate.

Venezuela, along with Cuba and Syria, voted in the International Atomic Energy Authority against the referral of Iran's nuclear programme to the Security Council this year.

Mr Chávez has also raised the possibility of collaboration between Iran and Venezuela in the nuclear field, and has vowed to stand with both Iran and Cuba under any circumstances. At last week's meeting of the Non-Aligned Movement in Havana, he reiterated this stance. "We will accompany Iran as we will accompany Cuba," he said. "If the United States were to invade Cuba, Venezuelan blood would flow."

More than the flow of blood, it is the flow of oil that has Washington worried. Between them, Iran and Venezuela produce almost 7m barrels a day, and both have threatened a boycott in the event of US aggression.

U.S., Israel Reach Out To Mahmoud Abbas (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 19, 2006

The United States and Israel sought on Monday to shore up a sometimes strained relationship with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who is trying to form a working alliance with Hamas officials who refuse to recognize the Israeli government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held a private meeting with Abbas without their usual retinue of aides, on the sidelines of the United Nations opening session. Rice's spokesman, Sean McCormack, would not detail U.S. goals for the meeting or say whether Rice carried a warning for Abbas about the consequences of a cozier relationship with Hamas. Her Israeli counterpart, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, was meeting with Abbas separately Monday night.

President Bush is to see the Palestinian leader Wednesday, the same day that the United States and other would-be Mideast peacemakers hold their first session since Israel's summer war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon. The U.N. Security Council also plans an open meeting Thursday that is intended to revive the Mideast peace process.

Meanwhile, U.S. officials said little about reports of an impending release of an Israeli solider captured by Palestinian militants in June. Release now would give all sides some good news to announce during a round of Mideast meetings in New York this week that had been expected to focus on the continued standoff between Hamas and the West.

Egypt has been trying to broker a deal for the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit. U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan also has pushed for the release of Shalit and two other Israeli soldiers.

"I will simply restate what the United States has stated time and time again," Rice said when asked about a possible release as she began a meeting with Livni. "Those prisoners, both the two in Lebanon and the one in the Palestinian territories, should be released and released unconditionally."

Rice's morning session with Livni was their third meeting in a week. Bush saw the Israeli diplomat in Washington last week. Rice and Livni have said they want to work with Abbas, the only senior Palestinian leader their nations will deal with, but are wary of his attempts to form a unity government with Hamas.

Hamas defeated Abbas' Fatah Party in legislative elections in January, although Abbas retains his position as president.

"We support voices of moderation. Obviously, President Abbas is one," national security adviser Stephen Hadley said Monday. "He's committed to peace, and we have worked with him and would continue to work with him. That's why the president is going to see him."

In the past, U.S. officials have made little secret of frustration that Abbas has not shown greater leadership, while Fatah leaders complain that the United States has done next to nothing to support Abbas.

After the Hamas-led Cabinet took office in late March, the United States and European Union, the two biggest donors to the Palestinian Authority, cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in aid. Abbas wants to resolve the political stalemate in hopes of restarting the flow, but discussions have stalled over the U.S. demand that Hamas fully renounce violence, recognize Israel and agree to abide by commitments made by the previous secular Palestinian leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0065431

While stressing that decisions about their political future rests with the Palestinians, McCormack noted mounting unrest and dissatisfaction with the Hamas-led government. He would not say how the United States would respond if Abbas and Hamas forged a new government arrangement without any accommodation by Hamas. "The details matter here," McCormack said.

Hamas has rejected the demands from the U.S. and others, despite the financial crunch that has left the treasury unable to pay the salaries of 165,000 government workers. The government is the largest employer in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and many families are scraping by on dwindling savings, loans and handouts.

In Cairo, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak told state media that Israel may be willing to free Palestinian prisoners in exchange for Shalit.

Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin refused to comment on Mubarak's statement.

"We have nothing to say. We respect Mubarak, and Israel does not talk about any of these issues," she said.

Israeli government and security officials said Sunday there was progress in the talks in the first sign of optimism from Israel regarding a possible deal. But the officials said a deal could take a week or more to complete.

Shalit was snatched on June 25 outside the Gaza Strip by Palestinian militants, sparking a military offensive against Gaza. Palestinians affiliated with the ruling Hamas group demanded the release of hundreds of prisoners in exchange for the soldier's release.

Days later, Hezbollah guerrillas abducted two soldiers in northern Israel, triggering a larger assault against Lebanon that lasted a month. A U.N.-brokered cease-fire called for the release of the two Hezbollah-held soldiers, but did not require it as a condition to stop the fighting.

Rice Meets Palestinian Leader Abbas In New York (AFP)

AFP, September 19, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmud Abbas conferred with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a New York hotel shortly after his arrival to attend the UN General Assembly debate.

Abbas, who is to address the Assembly Thursday, was later Monday to meet with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who is also in New York.

The Palestinian leader's meeting with Rice came two days before he was due to hold talks with US President George W. Bush here.

"We support voices of moderation. Obviously, President Abbas is one. He's committed to peace, and we have worked with him and would continue to work with him," US national security adviser Stephen Hadley told reporters.

Bush was to meet with Abbas at 9:30 am (1330 GMT) Wednesday. It was to be their first meeting since October 2005.

Abbas froze talks with Hamas Sunday over forming a new unity government in a move that threatens Western aid returning soon to the beleaguered territories.

Meanwhile, Arab countries are pushing for a new mechanism to relaunch the stalled Middle East peace process in the wake of the UN-brokered truce that ended a month-long war between Israel and Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon last month.

At their request, the Security Council has tentatively scheduled a ministerial session on Thursday to discuss a "mechanism" based on a 2002 Arab initiative which proposed a full normalization of relations with Israel in exchange for the return of all land occupied by the Jewish state since 1967.

Palestinian PM's Guards Disperse Protest (AP)

By Diaa Hadid, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's bodyguards opened fire outside the parliament building Monday to disperse a crowd of protesters angry over the government's failure to end a growing economic crisis in the Gaza Strip.

One woman was wounded in the violence, which was sparked after protesters tried to block Haniyeh's motorcade as it arrived at the parliament building in Gaza.

The demonstration was the latest expression of discontent with the Hamas-led government, which has been unable to pay tens of thousands of civil servants because of international sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0065432

Yielding to the pressure, Hamas agreed last week to form a coalition with President Mahmoud Abbas' moderate Fatah party in hopes of lifting the boycott imposed by Western countries. The coalition talks have stalled in recent days as the U.S. seeks assurances that Hamas will renounce violence and recognize the Jewish state.

Israel offered its own incentive to the Islamic militant group Monday, saying it would consider releasing millions of dollars and freeing Palestinian prisoners if the government moderates its hard-line views and an Israeli soldier captured in June by Hamas-linked militants is freed.

"If they do that, then the Israeli commitment is to immediately follow through with substantial confidence-building measures that would reinforce a positive momentum," Foreign Ministry Mark Regev said ahead of a meeting in New York between Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Abbas.

Israel and Western donors cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in funding to the Palestinians after Hamas won elections in January. The sanctions have made it impossible for the government to pay its 165,000 workers, causing poverty and unemployment to skyrocket in Gaza.

Several hundred protesters — including unpaid civil servants and laborers who have lost jobs in Israel — greeted Haniyeh's motorcade as it arrived at the parliament building. They had set up a tent about two weeks ago and said they were angry that no government official has talked to them.

When some of the protesters blocked Haniyeh's car, his bodyguards fired in the air to disperse the crowd, setting off a wild scene.

Protesters said one of the demonstration leaders, Jihan Sirsawi, was injured.

"One of the executive forces hit her with his gun on the back of her neck. She was also injured in her leg and foot during the chaos," said Wafa Hasanein, another protester.

More gunfire broke out as Haniyeh stepped out of the car and moved slowly up the steps of the building under heavy guard. He smiled and waved but did not speak to the protesters.

The parliamentary session was canceled after angry Fatah lawmakers boycotted the meeting to protest the violence outside.

Abbas is trying to use a meeting in New York with President Bush this week to try to win support for the prospective coalition and move it along.

The so-called Quartet of Mideast peacemakers — the U.S., European Union, Russia and United Nations — say Hamas must renounce violence, recognize Israel and accept past peace agreements before aid can resume. Abbas has been pushing Hamas to accept those demands.

A copy of the platform for the planned unity government was released Monday. Among its key points are calling for a Palestinian state in areas captured by Israel in 1967. That stance implies recognition of Israel.

It also calls for acceptance of past agreements between the PLO and Israel that "protect the higher interests of our people." The vague language appears to fall short of the Quartet demands.

Hamas leaders have said they will not compromise any further, infuriating Abbas.

Separately Monday, an Israeli military court held off on deciding whether 18 Hamas lawmakers should be released from prison. The court, which ordered the lawmakers freed last week, made no decision on the army prosecutor's appeal and did not say when a ruling would be made.

Israel arrested the lawmakers after Hamas-allied militants captured the Israeli soldier in June. In recent days, officials have reported progress in Egyptian-mediated negotiations to arrange a prisoner swap between Israel and Hamas.

U.N. Commander: Won't Disarm Hezbollah (AP)

By Henry Meyer, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

The French general commanding U.N. peacekeeping forces in Lebanon said Monday his troops would not intervene to disarm Hezbollah, even as French President Jacques Chirac said the militant group should not keep a military wing.

DOJ_NMG_0065433

Maj. Gen. Alain Pelligrini told reporters the main task of his U.N. force is to ensure southern Lebanon cannot be used as a base for attacks on Israel.

"The disarmament of Hezbollah is not the business of UNIFIL. This is a strictly Lebanese affair, which should be resolved at a national level," he said.

Pelligrini's assessment underscored the constraints facing the beefed-up U.N. mission despite a tougher mandate and far greater manpower.

It came as French Defense Minister Michele Alliot-Marie visited hundreds of her country's soldiers about to deploy to southern Lebanon, where they will join the U.N. force that is to maintain the cease-fire between Israel and Hezbollah.

In Paris, Chirac said it was important for the Lebanese government to assert control over its entire territory.

"It is totally normal there be a wing that expresses politically what the Hezbollah think .... What is questionable, is to express this by force, by armed militias," the French leader said in an interview on Europe-1 radio.

U.N. peacekeepers for the first time began checking security measures Monday on Lebanon's border with Syria, part of efforts to help the Lebanese army in monitoring sea and land borders to prevent arms shipments to Hezbollah.

The bulk of the 15,000-strong U.N. force is deploying in the south, and France — contributing the second-largest contingent of 2,000 soldiers — will command it until early next year, when Italy is to take over.

The U.N. cease-fire resolution that ended the 34-day war Aug. 14 stipulated Hezbollah eventually be disarmed, and Chirac said he wanted to see the resolution implemented "without reservations."

But in practice, neither the Lebanese army nor U.N. soldiers want to provoke a confrontation with the well-trained guerrillas in their southern heartland.

Along with the U.N. troops, who currently number 5,000, Lebanon's army is deploying 15,000 soldiers in the southern area that borders Israel.

"Our mission is to have a zone between the Blue Line and the Litani (River) where there is no illegal army and from which you cannot launch hostile acts," Pelligrini said, referring to the area between the U.N.-demarcated border with Israel and the river.

Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, said in an interview last week that Israel's monthlong offensive had failed to dismantle Hezbollah and boasted that his armed guerrillas were still in the towns and villages near the Israeli border.

Hezbollah fighters, who have controlled parts of southern Lebanon for years, are believed to be lying low and blending in with the local population — as they did before the war.

The weak central government in Lebanon has vowed to re-establish its authority over the Hezbollah stronghold in the south. But Western-backed Prime Minister Fuad Saniora has also made clear the Lebanese troops would not actively hunt for hidden Hezbollah arsenals.

Alliot-Marie told the French soldiers at a temporary base housing them in Beirut that they would be carrying out a mission "whose difficulties and risks I am aware of."

But she said their robust mandate and heavy armor, which includes Leclerc tanks, sophisticated Cobra radar systems and 155 mm howitzers, would deter aggression.

"To avoid clashes sometimes you have to dissuade (the other side) by demonstrating you are stronger," the minister said.

Some 900 French soldiers who have been staying in Beirut are to begin moving Tuesday to a base in Deir Kifa, east of the port of Tyre. The French deployment to southern Lebanon will take about a week; the first convoy will consist of 150 soldiers and four tanks.

China, meanwhile, said it will increase its peacekeeping force in Lebanon to 1,000.

More than 1,000 people died in the fighting between Hezbollah and Israel, most of them Lebanese civilians.

China Plans Peacekeeper, Aid Increases In Lebanon (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

BEIJING -- Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao said yesterday that China will increase its peacekeeping force in Lebanon to 1,000 and double its pledge of humanitarian aid to the Middle Eastern country.

DOJ_NMG_0065434

The peacekeeping commitment represents a substantial increase in China's presence in the United Nations force in Lebanon and underscores Beijing's growing strategic interest in the oil-rich Middle East.

Mr. Wen made the remarks at a news conference with visiting Italian Premier Romano Prodi, who also said his country was leaning toward supporting the end of a 17-year-old European Union ban on arms sales to China.

China's move to send more peacekeepers, Mr. Prodi said, "shows that China is assuming more and more international responsibility."

A permanent member of the U.N. Security Council for more than three decades, China has been slow to assume an active role in world politics and peacekeeping. The U.S. in particular has urged China to take a diplomatic profile that matches its growing economic clout world-wide.

China sent 182 peacekeepers to Lebanon at the start of the year -- its first peacekeeping contingent to the Middle East -- before the clashes in July and August between Israel and the Lebanon-based militant group Hezbollah.

In announcing the increase in peacekeepers, Mr. Wen said China hoped to see Lebanon achieve stability. Mr. Wen also said China would increase its humanitarian assistance to 40 million yuan ($5 million), half of which has already been provided to Lebanon.

Mr. Prodi's visit indicates a shift in Italian policy toward China from his predecessor, Silvio Berlusconi, who often blamed Chinese imports for Italy's weak economy. The two sides signed 15 agreements on trade, agriculture, medical care and cultural preservation. Details weren't available.

The weapons embargo, imposed after China's 1989 crackdown on the Tiananmen Square pro-democracy protests, has become a political sticking point in China's generally robust relations with the EU.

Poland's President Wants Peace Role (AP)

By Monika Scislowska, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

Poland's president said Monday he wants his country to be an active broker of world peace and his government could send hundreds more troops than it has already pledged to a U.N. force in Lebanon.

Last week, Poland said it would increase its troop contribution to a NATO-led force in Afghanistan from about 100 now to 1,000 in February.

In an interview with The Associated Press in New York, President Lech Kaczynski criticized the European Union, which Poland joined in 2004, for its reluctance to commit more forcefully to peacekeeping missions around the world.

He said it was "one of Europe's maladies" that it was not able to muster the number of troops needed to quell conflicts.

"A union of 25 rich nations should not have trouble getting ready 100,000 well-trained and well-equipped troops," said Kaczynski, who was in New York to attend the U.N. General Assembly this week.

European nations were reluctant to heed the call of NATO's top commander, U.S. Gen. James L. Jones, for extra troops in Afghanistan. NATO has about 20,000 forces in Afghanistan, with almost half deployed in the southern provinces that are the heartland of the Taliban and Afghanistan's powerful opium gangs. Earlier this month, Jones called for extra troops to support the 8,000 British, Canadian, Dutch and American soldiers fighting in that region.

European countries were also slow to commit large forces to a beefed up U.N. peacekeeping force of 15,000 to patrol south Lebanon as part of a U.N.-brokered cease-fire that ended 34 days of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah this summer. France, which leads the force known as UNIFIL, initially disappointed the U.N. and other countries by saying it would merely double its contingent of 200 troops. Later, it committed to send 2,000 troops.

Poland now has about 200 troops in UNIFIL and has said it will raise that number to 500.

"In Lebanon, I do not exclude a possibility of increasing the mission by another 200, 300 troops in 2007," Kaczynski said in the interview. That could boost Poland's total forces in Lebanon to 800, he said.

Noting the strain the various conflicts are placing on the armed forces of this nation of 38 million, Kaczynski reiterated that the 900 Polish troops in south-central Iraq will serve in the U.S.-led coalition there until the end of 2007 "and no longer."

DOJ_NMG_0065435

Despite NATO's call for reinforcements in Afghanistan, Kaczynski said Poland, an alliance member since 1999, cannot commit more than the 1,000 troops already pledged.

"No more troops can be sent to Afghanistan. We have declared the maximum that was taken into consideration," he said.

"We are everywhere where they need us," he added.

Kaczynski, whose identical twin brother, Jaroslaw Kaczynski, is the prime minister, also touched on other topics, noting that in Europe his views on issues like national values are sometimes misunderstood.

"I am aware that often, the things I say are not in line with the European correctness," he said. "Even more: I am ascribed views that are not really mine."

Kaczynski took office in December with a plege to ensure that Poland's traditional Roman Catholic values are not overshadowed by what he called the more liberal trends in Europe.

He has also been criticized for speaking against gay marriage. He says property and inheritance issues of gay couples can be settled by lawyers.

"I do not support the turning back of the wheel of history," Kaczynski said, adding that he is "not an enemy" of gay people.

Iranian Leader Urges More Papal Protests (AP-Y)

By Lee Keath, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

Al-Qaida in Iraq warned Pope Benedict XVI on Monday that its war against Christianity and the West will go on until Islam takes over the world, and Iran's supreme leader called for more protests over the pontiff's remarks on Islam.

Protests broke out in South Asia and Indonesia, with angry Muslims saying Benedict's statement of regret a day earlier did not go far enough. In southern Iraq, demonstrators carrying black flags burned an effigy of the pope.

Islamic leaders around the world issued more condemnations of the pope's comments, but some moderates in the Middle East appeared to be trying to put a damper on the outrage, fearing it could spiral into attacks on Christians in the region.

On Sunday, Benedict said he was "deeply sorry" over any hurt caused by his comments made in a speech last week, in which he quoted a medieval text characterizing some of the Prophet Muhammad's teachings as "evil and inhuman" and calling Islam a religion spread by the sword.

Benedict said the remarks came from a text that didn't reflect his own opinion, but he did not retract what he said or say he was sorry he uttered what proved to be explosive words.

The Vatican on Monday sought to defuse the anger, ordering papal representatives around the world to meet with leaders of Muslim countries to explain the pope's point of view and full context of his speech.

Roman Catholic leaders stepped forward to defend the pontiff. At an Italian bishops' conference, Cardinal Camillo Ruini underlined the bishops' "total closeness and solidarity to the pope" and said they deplored interpretations of the pope's comments "which attribute to the Holy Father ... errors that he has not committed and aim at attacking his person and his ministry."

Few in the Islamic world were satisfied by Benedict's statement of regret.

"The pope's words have caused a deep wound in the hearts of Muslims that won't heal for a long time, and then only after a clear apology to Muslims," Egypt's religious affairs minister, Mahmoud Hamdi Zaqzouq, wrote in a column in the government daily Al-Ahram on Monday.

An influential Egyptian cleric, Sheik Youssef al-Qaradawi, called for protests after weekly prayers on Friday, but maintained they should be peaceful.

Extremists said the pope's comments proved that the West was in a war against Islam.

Al-Qaida in Iraq and its allies said Muslims would be victorious and addressed the pope as "the worshipper of the cross," saying "you and the West are doomed as you can see from the defeat in Iraq, Afghanistan, Chechnya and elsewhere. ... We will break up the cross, spill the liquor and impose the 'jizya' tax, then the only thing acceptable is a conversion (to Islam) or (being killed by) the sword."

DOJ_NMG_0065436

Islam forbids drinking alcohol and requires non-Muslims to pay the "jizya" tax, though those who convert are exempt. The tax, sometimes called a head tax, has not been imposed in Muslim nations in about 100 years, though Islamic militant groups have tried to force non-Muslims to pay it on a local level in some countries.

"You infidels and despots, we will continue our jihad (holy war) and never stop until God avails us to chop your necks and raise the fluttering banner of monotheism, when God's rule is established governing all people and nations," said the statement by the Mujahedeen Shura Council, an umbrella organization of Sunni Arab extremist groups in Iraq.

Al-Qaida in Iraq said Muslims would be victorious and addressed the pope as "the worshipper of the cross" saying "you and the West are doomed as you can see from the defeat in Iraq, Afghanistan, Chechnya and elsewhere. ... We will break up the cross, spill the liquor and impose the 'jizya' tax, then the only thing acceptable is a conversion (to Islam) or (being killed by) the sword."

Islam forbids drinking alcohol and requires non-Muslims to pay the 'jizya' tax, though they were exempt if they converted to Islam.or early 20th century, though Islamic militant groups have tried to force non-Muslims to pay it on a local level in some countries.

Another Iraqi extremist group, Ansar al-Sunna, challenged "sleeping Muslims" to prove their manhood by doing something other than "issuing statements or holding demonstrations."

"If the stupid pig is prancing with his blasphemies in his house," the group said in a Web statement, referring to the pope, "then let him wait for the day coming soon when the armies of the religion of right knock on the walls of Rome."

In Iran, supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei used the comments to call for protests against the United States. He argued that while the pope may have been deceived into making his remarks, the words give the West an "excuse for suppressing Muslims" by depicting them as terrorists.

"Those who benefit from the pope's comments and drive their own arrogant policies should be targeted with attacks and protests," he said, referring to the United States.

The anger recalled the outrage earlier this year over cartoons depicting the prophet published by a Danish paper. The caricatures, which Muslims saw as insulting Muhammad, set off large, violent protests across the Islamic world.

So far, protests over the pope's comments have been smaller. However, there has been some violence: Attackers hurled firebombs at seven churches in the West Bank and Gaza Strip over the weekend, and a nun was shot to death in Somalia.

Some 200 Khamenei loyalists in the Syrian capital, Damascus, held a protest Monday at an Islamic shrine, dismissing the pope's apology. "The pope's sorrow was equivocal," read one banner.

Dozens protested outside the Vatican Embassy in Jakarta, Indonesia, and schools and shops in the Indian-controlled section of Kashmir shut their doors in protest.

"His comments really hurt Muslims all over the world," Umar Nawawi of the radical Islamic Defenders' Front said in Jakarta. "We should remind him not to say such things which can only fuel a holy war."

Islamic countries also asked the U.N. Human Rights Council to examine the question of religious tolerance. Malaysia's foreign minister, Syed Hamid Albar, said Benedict's apology was "inadequate to calm the anger."

In Egypt, the Muslim Brotherhood said the anger should not be allowed to hurt ties with the Middle East's Christian minorities. But worries among Christians in the region are high.

Guards have been posted around some churches, and the head of Egypt's Orthodox Coptic Church, Pope Shenouda III, disassociated himself from Benedict's statements.

The Dominican mission in Cairo also criticized Benedict's words, saying he chose a text for his speech that "revived the polemics of the past."

"These comments, seen by many Muslims as hurtful, risk encouraging extremists on all sides," it said in a statement, "and put in danger all the advances in dialogue made in recent decades."

Muslim Anger Spreads To South Asia (WT)

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065437

Extremists called yesterday for an Islamic army to march on Rome because of remarks by Pope Benedict XVI, while a well-known Muslim firebrand said in London that the pontiff should face "capital punishment."

Elsewhere, Iran's supreme leader called for more protests over the pontiff's remarks and protests broke out in South Asia and Indonesia, with angry Muslims saying Benedict's statement of regret a day earlier did not go far enough. In southern Iraq, demonstrators carrying black flags burned an effigy of the pope.

In London, police increased patrols near churches and began an inquiry into remarks by Anjem Choudhary, a well-known extremist who had called at a rally outside Westminster Cathedral on Sunday for the pope to be "executed."

The 39-year-old lawyer also had organized a rally earlier this year sparked by cartoons in a Danish newspaper at which some protesters carried placards declaring "Behead Those Who Insult Islam."

"Non-Muslims must ... understand that there may be serious consequences if you insult Islam and the prophet," Mr. Choudhary was quoted as saying on Sunday by the Daily Mail. "Whoever insults the message of Muhammad is going to be subject to capital punishment."

In Iraq yesterday, the extremist group Ansar al-Sunna challenged "sleeping Muslims" to prove their manhood by doing something other than "issuing statements or holding demonstrations."

"If the stupid pig is prancing with his blasphemies in his house," the group said of the pope in a Web statement, "then let him wait for the day coming soon when the armies of the religion of right knock on the walls of Rome."

The protests over the pope's comments have been smaller than those that broke out over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad, but there have been several instances of violence.

Attackers hurled firebombs at seven churches in the West Bank and Gaza Strip over the weekend. The fatal shooting of a nun Sunday in Somalia also could be linked to the dispute.

Extremists said the pope's comments proved that the West is waging a war with Islam.

Al Qaeda in Iraq and its allies issued a statement calling the pope "a cross-worshipper" and warning, "You and the West are doomed, as you can see from the defeat in Iraq, Afghanistan, Chechnya and elsewhere.

"You infidels and despots, we will continue our jihad [holy war] and never stop until God avails us to chop your necks and raise the fluttering banner of monotheism, when God's rule is established governing all people and nations," said the statement by the Mujahedeen Shura Council, an umbrella organization of Sunni Arab extremist groups in Iraq.

In Iran, supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei called for anti-U.S. demonstrations. He argued that although the pope may have been deceived into making his remarks, the words give the West an "excuse for suppressing Muslims" by depicting them as terrorists.

"Those who benefit from the pope's comments and drive their own arrogant policies should be targeted with attacks and protests," he said, referring to the United States.

President Bush yesterday tried to calm the Muslim world during a 50-minute meeting in New York with Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi.

"The president noted that the pope had made some apologies for his remarks, and the president believed that the pope was sincere in those remarks," said Dennis Wilder, senior director for East Asian affairs at the National Security Council.

Mr. Badawi "accepted the president's position on the subject," Mr. Wilder added. Malaysia's foreign minister has said the pope's words of explanation had been insufficient.

On Sunday, Benedict said he was "deeply sorry" about any hurt caused by a speech last week in which he quoted a medieval text characterizing some of the prophet Muhammad's teachings as "evil and inhuman" and calling Islam a religion spread by the sword.

The Vatican yesterday ordered papal representatives around the world to meet with leaders of Muslim countries to explain the pope's point of view and the full context of his speech.

Pope’s Regrets Over Statement Fail To Quiet A Storm Of Protests (NYT)

ROME, Sept. 18 — Many Muslims insisted Monday that Pope Benedict XVI did not go far enough in his apology on Sunday for the offense caused by a speech he gave last week that discussed Islam and holy war.

In the southern Iraqi city of Basra, protesters burned an effigy of the pope, and an Iraqi group linked to Al Qaeda posted a warning on a Web site threatening war against "worshipers of the cross."

The supreme leader in Iran, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, called the pope's remarks "the latest link" in the "chain of conspiracy to set off a crusade."

And, as a Vatican official said its ambassadors would seek to better explain the pope's statement, a Turkish man with a fake gun tried to storm a Protestant church in Turkey's capital, Ankara. He was arrested after worshipers trapped him in the church entryway.

Apart from the continuing anger at the pope's speech, in which he cited a medieval passage that called Islam "evil and inhuman," the debate on Monday seemed to turn on whether the pope had actually apologized.

Many Muslims — and some Catholics — noted that he had said only that he was sorry for the reaction that fanned out across the Muslim world. He did not say he had been wrong to have used the quotations.

"You either have to say 'I'm sorry' in a proper way or don't say it at all," said Mehmet Aydin, a state minister in Turkey, which Benedict is scheduled to visit in November in his first trip to a Muslim country.

But other Muslims either accepted the pope's statement or called it the best they would get.

"The pope has apologized, and that's enough, so let's calm down," said Hasyim Muzadi, head of Indonesia's largest Islamic organization, Nahdlatul Ulama. "If we remain furious, then the pope will be proved correct."

Turkey's most senior Muslim cleric, Ali Bardakoglu, who had been among the most strident in his criticism of the pope, said, "His expression of sadness is a sign that he would work for world peace."

The Muslim Council in Britain called the pope's words "exactly the reassurance many Muslims were looking for."

Benedict ignited a firestorm of protest last week in a speech he made at Regensburg University in Germany. The speech was largely a scholarly address criticizing the West for submitting itself too much to reason, and shutting belief in God out of science and philosophy.

But he began by recounting a discussion of Christianity and Islam between a 14th-century Byzantine Christian emperor, Manuel II Paleologus, and a Persian scholar.

"He said, I quote, 'Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached,' " the pope said.

Benedict also briefly considered the Islamic concept of jihad, which he defined as "holy war," and said that violence in the name of religion was contrary to God's nature and to reason.

In the speech, Benedict did not say whether he agreed with the quotations he cited. But on Sunday he delivered a rare papal expression of regret, saying, "These were in fact quotations from a medieval text, which do not in any way express my personal thought."

He said his address had been "an invitation to frank and sincere dialogue, with great mutual respect."

Several Christian leaders were quoted Monday defending the pope, saying that his words had been misunderstood by the news media.

"We are faced with a media-driven phenomenon bordering on the absurd," Cardinal Jean-Marie Lustiger, the former archbishop of Paris, told Le Monde. "If the game consists in unleashing the crowd's vindictiveness on words that it has not understood, then the conditions for dialogue with Islam are no longer met."

The Most Rev. Rowan Williams, who as archbishop of Canterbury is the leader of the world's Anglicans, told the BBC, "The pope has already issued an apology, and I think his views on this need to be judged against his entire record, where he has spoken very positively about dialogue" between faiths.

Bush Discusses Flap Over Pope's Remarks (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, September 19, 2006

President Bush on Monday tried to soothe Muslims' outrage over Pope Benedict XVI's remarks about Islam.

Bush addressed the issue during his meeting Monday with the prime minister of Malaysia.

"The president noted that the pope had made some apologies for his remarks and the president believed that the pope was sincere in those remarks and that's where the discussion was left," Dennis Wilder, senior director for East Asian affairs for the National Security Council, told reporters during a briefing on the meeting held on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly.

Benedict has said he "sincerely regrets" offending Muslims with his reference to an obscure medieval text that characterizes some of the teachings of Islam's founder as "evil and inhuman."

But the statement stopped short of the apology demanded by Islamic leaders around the globe, and anger among Muslims remained intense.

Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi, whose Southeast Asian nation has a large Muslim population, demanded that Benedict retract his remarks and not "take lightly the spread of outrage that has been created."

Asked how the prime minister reacted to Bush's comments, Wilder said only that the prime minister "accepted the president's position on the subject."

Pope Provocateur (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

Five days: That's how long it took Pope Benedict XVI to express regret for all the offense caused by his speech last week at the University of Regensburg, in his native Bavaria. But maybe his apology -- on Sunday, he said he was "deeply sorry for the reactions in some countries to a few passages in my address" -- was as sly as the speech itself.

That speech deserves to be read in its totality, and not simply as the spark that set fire to churches across the West Bank because some Muslim fanatics object to the suggestion that there is too much violence in their religion. And yes: Contrary to nervous Vatican disclaimers, Benedict plainly implies that Islam is a faith of the sword, though he makes the point abstrusely, in the form of an anecdote about the late-14th-century Byzantine emperor Manuel II Paleologus.

But that is neither the central theme of the address nor the main purpose of the anecdote. Benedict begins by recalling his own days as a professor at the university, when every semester faculty members from every department would convene before the student body, "making possible," he says, "a genuine experience of universitas." He goes on to note that the faculty included believers and unbelievers alike: "This profound sense of coherence within the universe of reason was not troubled even when it was once reported that a colleague had said there was something odd about our university: It had two faculties devoted to something that did not exist -- God."

That is the immediate prologue to the story he tells about a conversation between the "erudite" Byzantine emperor and an "educated Persian" in the winter of 1391. In it, the emperor condemns the notion of holy war, calling it "evil and inhuman." This is the line in the speech that inspires the current controversy. Yet the emperor's point -- and the Pope's -- is that "God is not pleased by blood. . . . Whoever would lead someone to faith needs the ability to speak well and to reason properly, without violence and threats."

This story, and Benedict's personal recollections that precede it, have something in common: Both involve dialogue between men of radically different beliefs. The dialogue is possible, Benedict suggests, because despite their differences the respective sides are bound by a "single rationality," capable of inquiring broadly into all fields of knowledge, including the "reasonableness of faith." The more important point for Benedict, however, is that genuine dialogue is possible only if there is a shared conviction among the speakers that the alternatives to dialogue -- violence, forced conversion and so on -- are "contrary to God's nature."

These reflections lead Benedict to a much graver indictment of Islam: "For Muslim teaching," he says, "God is absolutely transcendent. His will is not bound up with any of our categories, even that of rationality." Citing the 11th century polymath Ibn Hazm, Benedict adds that in Islam, "God is not bound even by his own word."

Let's play that again, since the rest of the media failed to notice: Pope Benedict suggests that the God of Mohammad is, or may seem to humans to be, "not even bound to truth and goodness." Who knows whether that really reflects a consensus view down the ages among Muslim theologians -- Benedict makes his case about Islam by citing one scholar who cites another scholar who cites another. The more interesting question is why Benedict goes out of his way to use Islam as an example, since he also warns against similar tendencies toward insisting on God's radical "otherness" within the Catholic tradition itself. So why can't he simply illustrate the controversies of faith without going outside the boundaries of his own?

In fact, Benedict saves his sharpest barbs for non-Muslim targets: Protestantism, which seeks a "primordial" form of faith; liberal theology, which reduces Jesus to "the father of a humanitarian moral message"; scientific rationalism, the ethics of which are "simply inadequate" to answer the "specifically human questions about our origin and destiny"; and what might be called Catholic pluralism, a culturally adaptive notion of the faith that Benedict denounces as "false" and "coarse."

These aren't mere provocations. There is an overarching philosophical architecture to Benedict's critique, expressed in the notion of the "de-Hellenization of Christianity." Christianity, in his view, is shaped and defined by the great dialogue between Athens and Jerusalem, reason and revelation. When the Apostle John says "In the beginning was the Word," the "word," literally, is logos -- which is reason, or argument. This, according to Benedict, expresses "the intrinsic necessity of a rapprochement between Biblical faith and Greek inquiry."

That rapprochement -- a triumph of dialogue -- lies at the heart of Benedict's theology: Strip faith from reason (as scientific rationalism does), or reason from faith (as Protestant literalism does), and "it is man himself who ends up being reduced."

There is a political subtext. Precisely in the middle of his speech, the Pope describes the convergence of faith and philosophy as decisive to the character of "what can rightly be called Europe." He does not mention Europe again, nor, except obliquely, Islam. But near the end of his speech he warns that the "exclusion of the divine from the universality of reason" may be seen by other cultures "as an attack on their most profound convictions." "Reason which is deaf to the divine," he adds, "is incapable of entering into the dialogue of cultures."

A Europe that cannot understand its own religion, except as a form of subjective irrationalism, cannot possibly engage another. A Christianity that voluntarily recuses itself from reason cannot sustain a belief in the goodness of its convictions, to say nothing of its truth. A West that abandons a critical dialogue between faith and rational inquiry ceases to be the West. It becomes, in a peculiar way, guilty of the same errors Benedict accuses Islam of making. This is the Pope's teaching, and it requires no apology. Notice that he offers none.

Benedict The Brave (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

It's a familiar spectacle: furious demands for an apology, threats, riots, violence. Anything can trigger so-called Muslim fury: a novel by a British-Indian writer, newspaper cartoons in a small Nordic country or, this past week, a talk on theology by the head of the Roman Catholic Church.

In a lecture on "Faith and Reason" at the University of Regensburg in Germany, Benedict XVI cited one of the last emperors of Byzantium, Manuel II Paleologus. Stressing the 14th-century emperor's "startling brusqueness," the pope quoted him as saying: "Show me just what Mohammed brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

Taken alone, these are strong words. However, the pope didn't endorse the comment that he twice emphasized was not his own. No matter. As with Salman Rushdie's "Satanic Verses," which millions of outraged Muslims didn't bother to read (including Ayatollah Khomeini, who put the bounty on the novelist's life), what Benedict XVI meant or even said isn't the issue. Once again, many Muslim leaders are inciting their faithful against perceived slights and trying to proscribe how free societies discuss one of the world's major religions.

Several Iraqi terrorist groups called for attacks on the Vatican. A cleric linked to Somalia's ruling Islamist movement urged Muslims to "hunt down" and kill the pope. In an apparently linked attack Sunday in Mogadishu, a nun was gunned down in a children's hospital. Pakistan's parliament unanimously adopted a resolution condemning the pontiff and demanding an apology.

Under pressure and no doubt to stop any further violence, the pope on Sunday did so. "I am deeply sorry for the reactions in some countries to a few passages of my address . . . which were considered offensive to the sensibility of Muslims," he told pilgrims at his Castelgandolfo summer residence. The quote doesn't "in any way express my personal thought. I hope this serves to appease hearts."

It was a gracious gesture on the pope's part, especially because his original argument deserves to be heard, not least by Muslims. The offending quotation was a small part in a chain of argument that led to his main thesis about the close relationship between reason and belief. Without the right balance between the two, the pontiff said, mankind is condemned to the "pathologies and life-threatening diseases associated with religion and reason" -- in short, political and religious fanaticism.

In Christianity, God is inseparable from reason. "In the beginning was the Word," the pope quotes from the Gospel according to John. "God acts with logos. Logos means both reason and word," he explained. "The inner rapprochement between Biblical faith and Greek philosophical inquiry was an event of decisive importance not only from the standpoint of history of religions, but also from that of world history. . . . This convergence, with the subsequent addition of the Roman heritage, created Europe."

The question raised by the pope is whether this convergence has taken place in Islam as well. He quotes the Lebanese Catholic theologist Theodore Khoury, who said that "for Muslim teaching, God is absolutely transcendent, his will is not bound up with any of our categories." If this is true, can there be dialogue at all between Islam and the West? For the pope, the precondition for any meaningful interfaith discussions is a religion tempered by reason: "It is to this great logos, to this breadth of reason, that we invite our partners in the dialogue of cultures," he concluded.

This is not an invitation to the usual feel-good interfaith round-tables. It is a request for dialogue with one condition -- that everyone at the table reject the irrationality of religiously motivated violence. The pope isn't condemning Islam; he is inviting it to join rather than reject the modern world.

By their reaction to the pope's speech, some Muslim leaders showed again that Islam has a problem with modernity that is going to have to be solved by a debate within Islam. The day Muslims condemn Islamic terror with the same vehemence they condemn those who criticize Islam, an attempt at dialogue -- and at improving relations between the Western and Islamic worlds -- can begin.

Pope: Wrong Words, Right Concern (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

CONTRARY TO POPULAR BELIEF, the Roman Catholic Church does not hold that the pope is infallible in everything he says. Pope Benedict XVI underscored that doctrinal fine point Sunday when he said he was "deeply sorry" about the controversy concerning his recent comments about Islam.

Attenuated as it was, the apology was in order because the pope's error was significant. Speaking last week in Germany, he quoted a 14th century Byzantine emperor who said that the prophet Muhammad was responsible for "things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached." On Sunday, Benedict insisted that such denunciations of Islam "do not in any way express my personal thought."

Then why cite them? At a time when Osama bin Laden and other Islamic militants are portraying the United States and other Western nations as Crusaders, the pope should have known better.

Forced conversions are not unique to Islam. Nobody on "Monty Python's Flying Circus" may have expected the Spanish Inquisition, but anyone familiar with the history of Christianity knew that the pope's comments would inspire tit-for-tat citations of that shameful institution and other examples of the traditional Christian view, repudiated by the Second Vatican Council, that "error has no rights."

Not just Roman Catholics but other Christians through the centuries have imposed the faith by the sword or through legal penalties. Catholics were persecuted by Protestant monarchs in England and remained second-class citizens until the 19th century. To this day England has an established church, though Christianity obviously doesn't govern public policy in that country the way Islam does in some Middle Eastern countries.

Intolerance is and always has been an occupational hazard for the preacher of any perceived divine revelation. That said, Christianity in many of its manifestations has moved beyond intimidation. In 1965, Vatican II declared that "the human person has a right to religious freedom" and must be "immune from coercion" in matters of faith.

Even some Muslims acknowledge that Islam often has not made the same accommodation to freedom of conscience. The pope may object to the portrait of Catholicism in "The Da Vinci Code," but he has not threatened the life of author Dan Brown. When Salman Rushdie's "The Satanic Verses" was published, the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini issued a fatwa calling on devout Muslims to kill the Anglo-Indian author. The armchair academic explanation for this disparity is that, however reluctantly, much of Christianity has made peace with the Enlightenment, while much of Islam has not.

That seems to have been the larger point that Benedict was trying to make in Germany, where he began his career as a university professor. The problem is that he isn't a professor now; he's the pope. And although they may be infallible when it comes to faith and morals, popes need to watch their words when they have political consequences.

We Need A Real Dialogue (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

I was tempted to defend Pope Benedict XVI's comments about Islam on the grounds that we journalists always profess to admire leaders who take risks to say what they really think. In a lecture last week in Germany, Benedict said what he really thought.

The irony is that the pontiff's comments came in an address that took Islam and all other religious faiths more seriously than do many of the pope's secular critics. The whole point of the talk, after all, was to defend the rationality of faith in God.

But there is no getting around it: The pope made a big mistake, creating problems for himself, his church and the West. He spoke in the voice of the academic theologian he once was and not as the leader of one of the world's great religions. Being pope is very different from being Professor Joseph Ratzinger.

In the controversial passage, Benedict recalls a dialogue between "the erudite Byzantine emperor Manuel II Paleologus and an educated Persian on the subject of Christianity and Islam."

The emperor -- "with a startling brusqueness, a brusqueness which leaves us astounded," the pope noted, according to the Vatican's translation -- had this to say: "Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

The pope didn't leave it there. He added that the "emperor . . . goes on to explain in detail the reasons why spreading the faith through violence is something unreasonable. Violence is incompatible with the nature of God and the nature of the soul."

What went wrong here? First, if you read his intellectually interesting lecture, you'll see the passage on Islam was not truly essential to the pope's argument. Indeed, he argued at least as strongly against a liberal Christianity in which "the subjective 'conscience' becomes the sole arbiter of what is ethical" and in which Jesus is reduced to being "the father of a humanitarian moral message." (Those quotation marks around the word "conscience" reflect the pope's skepticism of individual moral choice unguided by the church's teachings.) But then why did Benedict take his shot at Islam? And why didn't he pause to acknowledge that at various moments in history, Christians, including Catholics, have themselves been guilty of inappropriate uses of violence?

Pope John Paul II probably would have agreed broadly with Benedict's theological argument. But John Paul saw himself as a leader of a universal church with serious political responsibilities.

I suspect that John Paul, who was always keener on interreligious dialogue than Benedict, would either have cut the passage about Islam or developed it in a way that wouldn't have required the elaborate not-quite-an-apology Benedict issued on Sunday. (Benedict said the words of the "medieval text" he quoted "do not in any way express my personal thought.") John Paul understood that the growth of Christianity requires religious liberty in nations where Christians are a minority. No institution has more of an interest in religious toleration and a sense of interreligious comradeship than the Catholic Church.

Benedict's defenders have a point when they question whether his comments fully justify the explosion against him in the Muslim world. A significant number of Muslim religious leaders have said some harsh things about Christians, Jews and Western secularists in recent years. Would that all of Benedict's Muslim critics were as critical of anti-Christian or anti-Jewish statements from their own side.

But that is precisely why all who are hoping for a liberalized Islam should take Benedict to task, and why he needs to use that great intellect of his to move this discussion in a different direction.

The many Muslims who reject the idea that their faith should be "spread by the sword" will not see their cause advanced by Westerners who take us back to arguments rooted in an era when Christianity and Islam were literally at sword's point. We should all struggle to interpret our respective traditions in ways that enhance toleration and respect. Muslims who take risks on behalf of religious freedom need to know that non-Muslims are willing to engage with the best and not just the most extreme currents of Islamic thought.

Benedict made a good point when he said: "A reason which is deaf to the divine and which relegates religion into the realm of subcultures is incapable of entering into the dialogue of cultures."

It's true that Westerners who reject religion altogether may have trouble opening an authentic dialogue with Muslims. But religious dialogue will not progress very far if it starts off with a slap in the face.

Enough Apologies (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Already, angry Palestinian militants have assaulted seven West Bank and Gaza churches, destroying two of them. In Somalia, gunmen shot dead an elderly Italian nun. Radical clerics from Qatar to Qom have called, variously, for a "day of anger" or for worshipers to "hunt down" the pope and his followers. From Turkey to Malaysia, Muslim politicians have condemned the pope and called his apology "insufficient." And all of this because Benedict XVI, speaking at the University of Regensburg, quoted a Byzantine emperor who, more than 600 years ago, called Islam a faith "spread by the sword." We've been here before, of course. Similar protests were sparked last winter by cartoon portrayals of Muhammad in the Danish press. Similar apologies resulted, though Benedict's is more surprising than those of the Danish government. No one, apparently, can remember any pope, not even the media-friendly John Paul II, apologizing for anything in such specific terms: not for the Inquisition, not for the persecution of Galileo and certainly not for a single comment made to an academic audience in an unimportant German city.

But Western reactions to Muslim "days of anger" have followed a familiar pattern, too. Last winter, some Western newspapers defended their Danish colleagues, even going so far as to reprint the cartoons -- but others, including the Vatican, attacked the Danes for giving offense. Some leading Catholics have now defended the pope -- but others, no doubt including some Danes, have complained that his statement should have been better vetted, or never given at all. This isn't surprising: By definition, the West is not monolithic. Left-leaning journalists don't identify with right-leaning colleagues (or right-leaning Catholic colleagues), and vice versa. Not all Christians, let alone all Catholics -- even all German Catholics -- identify with the pope either, and certainly they don't want to defend his every scholarly quotation.

Unfortunately, these subtle distinctions are lost on the fanatics who torch embassies and churches. And they may also be preventing all of us from finding a useful response to the waves of anti-Western anger and violence that periodically engulf parts of the Muslim world. Clearly, a handful of apologies and some random public debate -- should the pope have said X, should the Danish prime minister have done Y -- are ineffective and irrelevant: None of the radical clerics accepts Western apologies, and none of their radical followers reads the Western press. Instead, Western politicians, writers, thinkers and speakers should stop apologizing -- and start uniting.

By this, I don't mean that we all need to rush to defend or to analyze this particular sermon; I leave that to experts on Byzantine theology. But we can all unite in our support for freedom of speech -- surely the pope is allowed to quote from medieval texts -- and of the press. And we can also unite, loudly, in our condemnation of violent, unprovoked attacks on churches, embassies and elderly nuns. By "we" I mean here the White House, the Vatican, the German Greens, the French Foreign Ministry, NATO, Greenpeace, Le Monde and Fox News -- Western institutions of the left, the right and everything in between. True, these principles sound pretty elementary -- "we're pro-free speech and anti-gratuitous violence" -- but in the days since the pope's sermon, I don't feel that I've heard them defended in anything like a unanimous chorus. A lot more time has been spent analyzing what the pontiff meant to say, or should have said, or might have said if he had been given better advice.

All of which is simply beside the point, since nothing the pope has ever said comes even close to matching the vitriol, extremism and hatred that pour out of the mouths of radical imams and fanatical clerics every day, all across Europe and the Muslim world, almost none of which ever provokes any Western response at all. And maybe it's time that it should: When Saudi Arabia publishes textbooks commanding good Wahhabi Muslims to "hate" Christians, Jews and non-Wahhabi Muslims, for example, why shouldn't the Vatican, the Southern Baptists, Britain's chief rabbi and the Council on American-Islamic Relations all condemn them -- simultaneously?

Maybe it's a pipe dream: The day when the White House and Greenpeace can issue a joint statement is surely distant indeed. But if stray comments by Western leaders -- not to mention Western films, books, cartoons, traditions and values -- are going to inspire regular violence, I don't feel that it's asking too much for the West to quit saying sorry and unite, occasionally, in its own defense. The fanatics attacking the pope already limit the right to free speech among their own followers. I don't see why we should allow them to limit our right to free speech, too.

A Challenge, Not A Crusade (NYT)

By John L. Allen Jr.

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

SEEN in context, Pope Benedict XVI's citation last week of a 14th-century Byzantine emperor who claimed that the Prophet Muhammad brought "things only evil and inhuman" to the world was not intended as an anti-Islamic broadside. The pope's real target in his lecture at the University of Regensburg, in Germany, was not Islam but the West, especially its tendency to separate reason and faith. He also denounced religious violence, hardly a crusader's sentiment.

The uproar in the Muslim world over the comments is thus to some extent a case of "German professor meets sound-bite culture," with a phrase from a tightly wrapped academic argument shot into global circulation, provoking an unintended firestorm.

In fact, had Benedict wanted to make a point about Islam, he wouldn't have left us guessing about what he meant. He's spoken and written on the subject before and since his election as pope, and a clear stance has emerged in the first 18 months of his pontificate. Benedict wants to be good neighbors, but he's definitely more of a hawk on Islam than was his predecessor, John Paul II.

The new pope is tougher both on terrorism and on what the Vatican calls "reciprocity" — the demand that Islamic states grant the same rights and freedoms to Christians and other religious minorities that Muslims receive in the West. When Benedict said in his apology on Sunday that he wants a "frank and sincere dialogue," the word "frank" was not an accident. He wants dialogue with teeth.

Roman Catholicism under Benedict is moving into a more critical posture toward Islamic fundamentalism. That could either push Islam toward reform, or set off a global "clash of civilizations" — or, perhaps, both.

Personally, Benedict's graciousness toward Muslims is clear. For example, when Ayatollah Mohammad Emami Kashani, a member of the powerful Guardian Council in Iran, wrote a book comparing Islamic and Christian eschatological themes in the 1990's, Benedict, then Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, swapped theological ideas with him in the Vatican.

Immediately after his installation Mass last year, Benedict thanked Muslims for attending an inter-faith meeting. "I express my appreciation for the growth of dialogue between Muslims and Christians," he said. "I assure you that the church wants to continue building bridges of friendship with the followers of all religions."

Yet Benedict has also challenged what he sees as Islam's potential for extremism, grounded in a literal reading of the Koran. In a 1997 interview with me, he said of Islam, "One has to have a clear understanding that it is not simply a denomination that can be included in the free realm of pluralistic society."

In the same interview, he accused some Muslims of fomenting a radical "liberation theology," meaning a belief that God approves of violence to achieve liberation from Israel. He also said he opposed Turkey's candidacy to enter the European Union, arguing that it is "in permanent contrast to Europe" and suggesting that it play a leadership role among Islamic states instead.

Thus it's no surprise that Benedict has struck a different tone from his predecessor. John Paul met with Muslims more than 60 times, and during a 2001 trip to Syria became the first pope to enter a mosque. He reached out to Islamic moderates. He talked of Muslims and Jews along with Christians as the three "sons of Abraham." And he condemned injustices thought to be at the root of Islamic terrorism.

Desire for a more muscular stance, however, has been building among Catholics around the world for some time. In part, it has been driven by persecution of Christians in the Islamic world, like the murder of an Italian missionary, the Rev. Andrea Santoro, in Trabzon, Turkey, in February. A 16-year-old Turk fired two bullets into Father Santoro, shouting "God is great." But perhaps the greatest driving force has been the frustrations over reciprocity. To take one oft-cited example, while Saudis contributed tens of millions of dollars to build Europe's largest mosque in Rome, Christians cannot build churches in Saudi Arabia. Priests in Saudi Arabia cannot leave oil-industry compounds or embassy grounds without fear of reprisals from the mutawa, the religious police. The bishop of the region recently described the situation as "reminiscent of the catacombs."

The pope is sympathetic to these concerns, as several developments at the Vatican have made clear.

At a meeting with Muslims in Cologne, Germany, last summer, Benedict urged joint efforts to "turn back the wave of cruel fanaticism that endangers the lives of so many people and hinders progress toward world peace."

On Feb. 15, he removed Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald, who had been John Paul's expert on Islam, as the president of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, sending him to a diplomatic post in Egypt. Archbishop Fitzgerald was seen as the Vatican's leading dove in its relationship with Muslims.

That same month, Bishop Rino Fisichella, the rector of Rome's Lateran University and a close papal confidant, announced it was time to "drop the diplomatic silence" about anti-Christian persecution, and called on the United Nations to "remind the societies and governments of countries with a Muslim majority of their responsibilities."

In March, Cardinal Camillo Ruini, the pope's vicar for Rome, voiced doubts about calls to teach Islam in Italian schools, saying he wanted assurance that doing so "would not give way to a socially dangerous kind of indoctrination."

And on March 23, Benedict summoned his 179 cardinals for a closed-doors business session. Much conversation turned on Islam, according to participants, and there was agreement over taking a tougher stance on reciprocity.

Through his statements and those of his proxies, Benedict clearly hopes to stimulate Islamic leaders to express their faith effectively in a pluralistic world. The big question is whether it will be received that way, or whether it simply reinforces the conviction of jihadists about eternal struggle with the Christian West.

Bush To Name Envoy For Darfur (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Natsios Will Lead U.S. Effort to Quell the Violence in Sudan

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 18 -- President Bush has decided to name Andrew Natsios, a former administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development, as his special envoy for Darfur in the hope of reviving a diplomatic effort to end a 3 1/2 -year spree of violence in Sudan that has left hundreds of thousands dead, according to senior administration officials.

Bush is expected to announce Natsios's appointment Tuesday in a speech to world leaders at the U.N. General Assembly. The initiative follows increasing pressure from Congress and human rights advocates to do more to halt what the Bush administration has termed the world's only ongoing case of genocide.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Danish Foreign Minister Per Stig Moller on Monday invited counterparts from nearly two dozen governments to participate in a high-level meeting on Darfur at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel on Friday afternoon.

Rice and British Prime Minister Tony Blair also have appealed to senior Chinese officials in recent days to pressure the Sudanese capital, Khartoum, to allow a U.N. peacekeeping force of nearly 20,000 troops into the Darfur region. China, a major consumer of Sudanese oil, has routinely resisted efforts by the United States to persuade the U.N. Security Council to punish Khartoum for its role in the violence.

DOJ_NMG_0065446

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said the United States is planning to introduce a new Security Council resolution aimed at expanding a U.N. peacekeeping force in southern Sudan into Darfur. The U.N. group would replace 7,000 African Union peacekeepers who have struggled with few resources and limited success to stem the bloodshed in Darfur.

African leaders will meet Wednesday in New York to decide whether to extend the AU's mandate, which is set to expire on Sept. 30. The United States and the United Nations are pressing the Africans to remain in Darfur in the hope that Khartoum will ultimately agree to invite the U.N. blue helmets.

The conflict in Darfur began in February 2003 when two Darfurian rebel groups took up arms against the Islamic government in Khartoum, claiming mistreatment of the region's primarily black tribes.

Sudan responded by arming, equipping and supporting Arab militias, known as the Janjaweed, that attacked thousands of villages suspected of supporting the rebels. The attacks have driven more than 2 million people from their homes.

The U.N. special representative to Sudan, Jan Pronk of the Netherlands, declared Monday that the U.S.-brokered peace agreement "is nearly dead. It is in a coma. It ought to be under intensive care, but it isn't." He said fighting has flared up again, with the Sudanese government again launching a major military offensive and a growing number of rebel factions vying for power.

The spiraling violence has heightened criticism of the Bush administration's handling of the Darfur crisis two years after then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell first called the killing there a genocide.

It has also spurred bipartisan congressional support for greater international action in Darfur. Sens. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) and Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) visited the United Nations on Monday, meeting with Sudan's ambassador to press for greater international scrutiny of the atrocities in Darfur.

But Bush had resisted international calls for a special envoy. By selecting Natsios, the administration has chosen a blunt representative with considerable backing among the American aid community and a long record of butting heads with the Sudanese over the delivery of humanitarian assistance.

When Powell traveled to Darfur in July 2004, he was accompanied by Natsios, then USAID administrator. As the plane flew over the blackened remains of ravaged villages, Natsios described his dismay at the Sudanese government in a stream of expletives.

"I think he won't be fooled by these guys," said John Prendergast of the International Crisis Group, a sharp critic of the Bush administration's Darfur policy.

Still, some U.N. officials privately expressed concern that Natsios may pursue a confrontational approach that will harden Khartoum's opposition to a U.N. force in Darfur.

Pronk, meanwhile, joined the British government in proposing that the international community consider offering Sudan a series of incentives -- including debt relief, the lifting of sanctions and greater trade access to Western markets -- in exchange for cooperating with U.N. peace efforts. He also scolded Sudan's leaders for describing U.N. peacekeepers as a Western invasion force. "We do not intend to recolonize, nor are we laying the carpet for others to do so," he said.

Take The Lead On Darfur (NYT)

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

President Bush will face a tough, and in many cases hostile, crowd when he addresses the United Nations General Assembly today. The mayhem in Iraq, his flouting of the Geneva Conventions, the hectoring tone of his previous appearances will all make it much harder for him to elicit the respect or even the full attention that any American president should command.

Still, Mr. Bush could make a difference if he threw aside his usual script, devoted this speech to the horrors of Darfur, and committed himself personally to stopping the genocide.

The tally of human suffering should make even the most jaded listener take notice: at least 200,000 dead and two million more driven from their homes by three years of rape and mutilation led by Sudanese troops and their proxy Arab militias.

Mr. Bush must leave no doubt who is most responsible. Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, is blocking the Security Council from sending some 20,000 peacekeepers to Darfur, saying that would insult Sudan's sovereignty. Mr. Bush should call on all countries — including those like China that have been shielding Mr. Bashir — to demand that Sudan drop its opposition. He should also say that he will press for broad international sanctions if Mr. Bashir does not quickly reverse his position.

But Mr. Bush cannot stop there. A credible presentation would include an assumption of responsibility. His administration was the first to label the Darfur killing genocide, and he can be proud of that. But that was two years ago, and U.S. officials have paid only intermittent attention since then.

Mr. Bush would begin to set that right if he announced that ending the killing in Darfur was now a first-tier foreign policy concern, one on which Washington would judge its relations with other states. Yesterday's news that Mr. Bush would name a special envoy for Darfur was a good start. That message would be even stronger if Mr. Bush said the U.S. would take the lead in soliciting troops for the U.N. and recommended making NATO planners available to help draw up contingency plans for a possible forced entry. If nothing else does, that implicit threat should grab the attention of Khartoum — and Mr. Bush's audience.

Last week, Mr. Bush said he was frustrated with the lack of action in Darfur, calling it an example of why "a lot of Americans" are frustrated with the United Nations. He has a chance to change that.

The Genocide Test (WP)

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Surely China does not believe Sudan's brazen lies.

THE NEXT FEW days will show whether China means to let Sudan's dictatorship get away with genocide. A series of meetings at the United Nations in New York offers the best and possibly the last chance to persuade the Sudanese to allow U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur. The deployment is required by a Security Council resolution passed last month. It is supported by nearly all the leading powers and even by factions within Sudan's government. But China has so far refused to tell Sudan's isolated leaders to drop their opposition to a U.N. contingent, even though its extensive investments in Sudan give it the power to do so. If it wants to be regarded as a responsible power, China should use its leverage.

Consider the arguments for not doing so, as presented by Sudan's spokesmen. Yesterday, Sudan's deputy ambassador to the United Nations protested that blaming hundreds of thousands of deaths on his government was unfair: "The armed groups in Darfur are the real culprits," he asserted. But China's leaders surely know this is absurd: The leading murderers in Darfur are the Janjaweed militia, which has been equipped by Sudan's government. Meanwhile, at the World Bank-International Monetary Fund meetings yesterday, Sudan's finance minister argued that "what Darfur needs is not peacekeepers. . . . What Darfur needs most is resources for water, resources for schools, for hospitals."

But Sudan's air force has strafed Darfur's hospitals and schools, and its Janjaweed allies have addressed the region's water scarcity by poisoning wells with corpses.

Sudan's president asserts that "the U.N. forces have a hidden agenda in Sudan because they are not coming for peace in Darfur. They want to recolonize Sudan." His henchmen have indicated that, in place of U.N. peacekeepers, they might be willing to extend the mandate of the African Union force, which is due to leave at the end of this month. Before China accepts this preposterous description of the United Nations and embraces the supposed concession of a renewed African Union mandate, it should read the recent dispatches from journalists inside Darfur. The Post's Craig Timberg reports that Sudan's government has seized A.U. jet fuel and used it to fill its own military aircraft; indeed, the airstrip used by the African Union in North Darfur is controlled by Sudanese government forces at night, so fuel is regularly looted. Meanwhile, Janjaweed fighters recently demonstrated their contempt for the A.U. forces by assaulting civilians who had gathered to speak to them.

In short, Sudan's government is presenting the extension of the African Union's mandate as a concession, even as it destroys the organization's ability to operate. The A.U. presence is not preventing the government from mounting bombing raids on civilians with a frequency not seen since the height of the genocide in 2003; nor is it preventing the obstruction of humanitarian efforts in North Darfur, where more than 300,000 people have been cut off from food aid. The African Union has become almost irrelevant, and no responsible government can accept an extension of its mandate as an alternative to a real peacekeeping force.

Is China's a responsible government?

Darfur's Need For Help Can Be Seen In Refugees' Eyes (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0065448

By Mia Farrow

USA Today, September 19, 2006

I returned recently from my second visit to the Sudanese region of Darfur, where I traveled to refugee camps, villages and rebel-held territories. While the Middle East and Iraq grab headlines, beneath the media radar screen "something very ugly is brewing" in Darfur, United Nations Deputy Secretary-General Mark Malloch Brown has warned.

Since 2003, the Sudanese government and the Janjaweed, a government-backed Arab militia, have killed hundreds of thousands in Darfur. Now the crisis has come to a terrible fruition. Large-scale military assaults have been launched recently by the genocidal Khartoum regime. Helicopters and warplanes are crossing the skies of north Darfur, bombing and burning villages without regard for human life and leaving crops destroyed, cattle killed and civilians dead and displaced.

The camps I visited, with seas of plastic sheets sprawled across the baked desert floor, are cauldrons of despair, terror and rage. Desperate pleas for protection singe my memories of my time among these increasingly abandoned people. At Zam Zam refugee camp, a woman holding a small child implored me, "Help us. We need help. We have nowhere else to go. We are going to die. We will all be slaughtered."

The need for a robust U.N. peacekeeping operation could not be more evident. The U.N. Security Council passed a resolution based on a proposal by Secretary-General Kofi Annan for 24,000 troops and security personnel.

But the government of Sudan has rejected the proposal, just as it has flouted a number of previous U.N. resolutions. Unless the U.N. can find the political will to deploy protection forces without the consent of Khartoum, the fate of Darfur will remain in the hands of those responsible for the immeasurable suffering and terror of 2.5 million displaced people.

The need to deploy such a force has been made clear to Sudanese President Omar el-Bashir. But he has brazenly asserted, "We are determined to defeat any forces entering the country, just as Hezbollah has defeated the Israeli forces."

While Bashir does not want U.N. intervention, the chorus in refugee camps and the remote rebel-held territories of Darfur was the same: "U.N., U.N., we need U.N. peacekeepers!" Rations of hope are meager in Darfur, but in those moments I did see eyes alight with hope.

Bashir's position is unwavering, yet the world continues to use Sudan's refusal of a U.N. force as an excuse for inaction.

"As long as the government of Sudan does not accept a (U.N.) mission, there will not be one. It's as simple as that," said Jean-Marie Guehenno, undersecretary-general for Peacekeeping Operations.

But I have looked into the eyes of despair itself. As world leaders continue their diplomatic wooing of the regime, conditions in Darfur have gone "from really bad to catastrophic," said Jan Egeland, the U.N.'s top humanitarian official.

Humanitarian organizations have no access to hundreds of thousands of helpless civilians. The badly under-equipped African Union, the only peacekeeping force on the ground, has ceased to function meaningfully. Still, the defiant Sudanese government last week ordered the AU force out of Darfur by Sept. 30 unless it agrees not to be part of the U.N. force.

To date, as many as 500,000 people have died. Hundreds of thousands more will surely die without international protection.

As time runs out for Darfur, we must demand that the international community provide all resources — including military — necessary to protect innocent civilians and courageous humanitarians.

In the face of the first genocide of this century, knowing full well what is required to halt continuing ethnic slaughter, we have been unwilling to take the necessary actions. This is a defining moment.

Even now, from the distance of more than a decade, we look back at Rwanda and despair at our abysmal failure to act.

In Sudan, when the history of this terrible episode in human destruction is written, will we have any less reason to despair about our acquiescence before the ultimate human crime?

Somali President Survives Suicide Bomb; 8 Others Are Killed (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065449

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Sept. 18 — The president of the transitional government of Somalia narrowly escaped an assassination attempt on Monday when a suicide car bomber rammed into his convoy and blew up outside the Parliament building in Baidoa.

President Abdullah Yusuf was not hurt, but at least eight people were killed, according to police officials. One of them was the president's younger brother, Dirie Yusuf Ahmed.

"We are safe," Mr. Yusuf announced on the radio several hours later. "But three of my colleagues were killed, including my brother."

Baidoa is increasingly tense as the transitional government struggles to hold itself together now that the Islamists in Mogadishu wield the real power in this country. Though Mogadishu, Somalia's capital, is notorious for violence and chaos, Baidoa, the seat of the transitional government about 150 miles away, seems to be even more insecure.

Mr. Yusuf went to Parliament on Monday morning to deliver a speech on unity. Afterward, he stepped into his car, the second in a long convoy, he said in his radio address. As his entourage drove off, a Toyota sedan slammed into the lead car and exploded.

Several cars were swallowed by flames, including the president's. Bodyguards yanked Mr. Yusuf out and rushed him to a fortified headquarters not far away, he said. The presidential guard then poured into the streets, cutting off highways to Baidoa and shutting down the city. His soldiers also arrested several journalists who tried to broadcast the news. They were later released.

Mr. Yusuf, a former warlord, is backed by the United Nations but supported by very few people in Somalia. His zone of authority barely extends past the city limits of Baidoa. The transitional government suffers from poisonous clan rivalries, and several government ministers have already been attacked. In July, the constitutional minister was shot to death leaving a mosque. Many people at the time believed that it was an inside job.

Mr. Yusuf immediately blamed Al Qaeda for the attack on Monday. American officials have said Qaeda cells operate out of Mogadishu, with the aid of the Islamist forces in control of the city. But some Somali officials have also worried that different factions within the transitional government in Baidoa have been plotting against each other.

The president said Monday evening that his militia had arrested several people, but he did not disclose who. For several hours on Monday, lawmakers were trapped inside the cavernous Parliament building, afraid to leave because they feared more booby traps, according to witnesses speaking on Somali radio.

As the news spread in Mogadishu, some people celebrated. "God is great!" yelled a pack of Islamist soldiers, sitting in the bed of a pickup truck and listening to the radio.

Ibrahim Hassan Addou, the foreign minister for the Islamists in Mogadishu, said the world needed to realize that the politicians in Baidoa were not very popular.

"But they are our friends and our brothers," he said. "We are concerned for them."

Somalia's President Survives Assassination Attempt (MCT)

By Shashank Bengali

McClatchy Newspapers, September 19, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya - Somalia braced for increasing violence on Monday after gunmen attempted to assassinate the president of Somalia's weak interim government.

The attack, in the town of Baidoa, where the interim government is headquartered, missed President Abdullah Yusuf, but killed 11 others, including the president's brother.

The attack seemed certain to deepen tensions between Yusuf's government and a federation of Islamic clerics that took control of the capital, Mogadishu, in June. The two groups have been battling for influence since, and U.S. officials worry that the Islamists could make Somalia a new haven and training ground for al-Qaida and other terrorist groups.

"It's a terrible danger," said Mario Raffaelli, Italy's special envoy to Somalia.

Government officials immediately blamed Islamist militias for the attack.

"That's the group that is intent on dismantling the transitional federal government," said Foreign Minister Ismail Hurre.

DOJ_NMG_0065450

Islamist leaders denied carrying out the attack, which came one day after an Italian nun and her Somali bodyguard were slain in an ambush in Mogadishu. Government officials also blamed Islamist militias for those killings.

Somalia's interim government, formed at an international conference in Kenya two years ago, was intended to create the country's first functioning central government since 1991, when the government of Mohamed Siad Barre collapsed, ushering in years of chaos and clan-based violence.

But the government has been too weak to extend its influence much outside of Baidoa. In contrast, Mogadishu's rising Islamist movement quickly took over much of southern Somalia within weeks of defeating armed groups that reportedly were backed by the CIA.

For several weeks the government and the Islamists have been negotiating over power sharing, seen as the best chance to avoid a return to the violence that made Somalia into what's commonly called the world's most failed state.

The two sides are deeply split over an African Union proposal to send peacekeeping troops to the country, with the Islamists vehemently opposed.

Monday's attack came as members of parliament met to endorse the talks and to approve a new Cabinet. After addressing the members, Yusuf's convoy pulled away from the converted grain warehouse that houses the parliament when a car bomb detonated, triggered by a timer or a remote control, Raffaelli said.

Five presidential bodyguards, including Yusuf's younger brother, were killed in the explosion.

Then, according to witnesses, several gunmen opened fire on government security forces. Six gunmen were killed and two captured, Hurre said.

The execution of the attack and the sophisticated trigger on the car bomb were unusual for Somalia, Raffaelli said, and they suggested the involvement of foreign forces. Somalia is nominally under an arms embargo, but since the Islamists took power, illicit shipments of weapons have continued.

"We know that in the last month, arms and sophisticated weapons have been sent inside," Raffaelli said.

Islamist leaders have been credited with restoring a measure of peace to Somalia after 16 years of rule by brutal warlords. But Sunday's murder of 70-year-old nun Leonella Sgorbati and her bodyguard in Mogadishu broke that calm.

Islamist security forces arrested two men in connection with the fatal shootings outside a children's hospital where Sgorbati had worked for the past four years. They said the killers would be punished, and that calm in Mogadishu wouldn't be disturbed.

Somali Leader Escapes Bombing (WP/AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

The Washington Post/AP, September 19, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Sept. 18 -- Somalia's interim president narrowly escaped an assassination attempt Monday when a suicide car bomber struck outside the parliament building, officials said. The blast and a subsequent gun battle left 11 people dead, including the president's brother.

There was no immediate assertion of responsibility for the attack in Baidoa, the only town controlled by the U.N.-backed interim government. But if it is linked to an Islamic militia that has seized control of much of southern Somalia, it could cause peace talks between the two sides to fall apart.

The Islamic group denied that it had any role. "The perpetrators of Baidoa blast are enemies of Somali people, and Islamic courts have no hand in it," said a spokesman, Abdirahman Mudey.

President Abdullahi Yusuf had given a speech in the parliament building about 10 minutes before the blast occurred, said Mohamed Adawe, a journalist.

Yusuf's bodyguards chased suspected accomplices of the bomber, killing six of them in a gun battle. The five other dead -- including the president's brother -- were in his convoy, officials said. Eight cars were burned in the blast, including three from Yusuf's convoy.

"This explosion was intended to kill the president, but he escaped," government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari said. Ismail Mohamed Hurre, a minister in the interim government, said it was the work of suicide bomber, the first ever to strike in Somalia.

DOJ_NMG_0065451

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew dictator Mohamed Siad Barre, pulling the country into anarchy.

The interim government was established two years ago with the support of the United Nations, but it has failed to assert any power outside its base in Baidoa. An Islamic militia seized control of Mogadishu and much of the south in recent months.

Somalia Leader Survives Attack (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia — The transitional president of Somalia narrowly escaped assassination Monday when a car bomb exploded as he left a converted grain silo that serves as the nation's makeshift parliament.

President Abdullahi Yusuf was unharmed. However, eight other people, including his brother and several security guards, were killed by the blast in Baidoa, the nation's provisional capital.

The attack marked the second consecutive day of bloodshed in the Horn of Africa nation, which has been without a functioning government since 1991. On Sunday, gunmen in Mogadishu shot to death an Italian nun and her bodyguard outside a children's hospital.

Despite years of instability and violence, car bombs have been rare in Somalia, and local officials quickly blamed foreign militants. One government minister described the bombing as an "Al Qaeda-type" attack. No one immediately claimed responsibility.

"We hear about this type of thing in Iraq, but not Somalia," said Abdul Fatah Ibrahim Rasheed, a member of parliament. "This is something that is very new for us."

The blast came at a particularly sensitive time for the government. Yusuf's administration is attempting to negotiate a power-sharing agreement with the Conservative Council of Islamic Courts, which seized control of Mogadishu earlier this year. Some officials in Baidoa accused the group of participating in the attack.

"It will jeopardize the peace process if it becomes very obvious that the Islamists are behind this terrorist act," Foreign Minister Ismail Hurre Buba Hurre said during a visit to Nairobi, the Kenyan capital.

Islamist officials denied any knowledge of the attack.

"We know nothing about it, but we are very sorry for anything that hurts the security of Somalia," said Sheik Mukhtar Robow, deputy security chief for the courts council, an alliance of religious leaders formed in an attempt to bring order to Mogadishu.

Both sides are to meet again in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital, next month to continue negotiations.

Witnesses said the bomb, apparently hidden in a small car outside the parliament compound, detonated as the president's motorcade was leaving the facility. Yusuf had just addressed lawmakers, urging them to put aside their differences and endorse his newly reshuffled Cabinet.

There were conflicting reports about whether the car was parked or was driven by a suicide bomber. In a radio address Monday night, Yusuf said authorities had recovered the remains of a person they believed might have been the suicide driver.

The blast ignited at least seven other cars and flung wreckage more than 100 yards to the doorstep of the parliament building, witnesses said. Inside, panicked lawmakers screamed and fled the building. Security guards fired into the air, adding to the sense of chaos, witnesses said.

"We thought we were under attack," said Ahmed Omar Gagale, a member of parliament. "It sounded like mortars, especially when some of the other cars began to explode from the fire."

After its formation at an internationally sponsored conference in 2004, the transitional government opted to reside in Baidoa rather than Mogadishu because of violence in the nation's traditional capital.

Since Islamists drove out the warlords who had carved up control of the city, security in Mogadishu has improved dramatically, while bloodshed in Baidoa has been rising. In July, gunmen shot a government minister as he left a mosque in Baidoa.

"It's getting very scary there," said Asha Ahmed Abdalla, a member of parliament.

Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi escaped two assassination attempts in 2005.

Paulson Hopes 'to Set Tone' In China (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 19, 2006

SINGAPORE — Preparing for his first official trip to China, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson sought to dampen hopes Monday that he might win early Chinese agreement on revaluing its currency.

"I am not looking for immediate solutions or quick fixes. … I am looking to set a tone and an expectation of working through issues and making progress," Paulson told reporters.

Paulson's reputation for China savvy, based on extensive work with Chinese leaders when he was head of Goldman Sachs, has raised congressional hopes that he might succeed where others have failed. But on the eve of a four-day China visit, he counseled "patience."

In recent years, the value of China's currency, the yuan, has fueled growing congressional irritation with Chinese trade practices. With the U.S. running an escalating annual trade deficit with China of more than $200 billion, U.S. manufacturers complain that China keeps the yuan's value artificially low as an effective export subsidy.

The Chinese government plans to gradually move to a freely trading currency but says it first needs to complete financial reforms.

In July 2005, China raised the yuan's value by 2% and has allowed a further rise of less than 2% since then. Chinese officials fear that a premature move to a floating currency could torpedo job growth in export-oriented factories, raising the prospect of social instability.

Paulson, who attended the annual meetings here of the International Monetary Fund and World Bank, spoke hours before IMF member countries approved a two-step reform. China, South Korea, Turkey and Mexico won an immediate increase in their share of internal IMF votes. A further realignment potentially affecting most of the fund's 184 members is to be worked out over two years.

Meanwhile, the Treasury secretary dined here Monday night with Zhou Xiaochuan, governor of China's central bank, who this weekend dismissed calls for an immediate currency move. "Chinese policy is clear: We are gradually moving toward a flexible exchange rate regime," he said.

Paulson argues that moving toward a freely traded currency is in China's interest. But he said it would take time to bring China around to that view.

"That doesn't mean I don't like results," he said. "I'll be judged by results and hopefully setting a tone and building upon what is already a good relationship."

Developing Nations To Gain More Power At I.M.F. (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

SINGAPORE, Sept. 18 — Member states of the International Monetary Fund, yielding to demands from China and leading Western countries, voted Monday to adopt a plan to modify the fund's power structure and take steps to expand the voice of China and other rapidly developing nations.

The modification of the governance of the monetary fund, the international agency that monitors the global economy and rescues countries from insolvency, was widely described as the biggest step since the fund was established in the 1940's, the era when the victors of World War II created the vast cooperative superstructure for the world economy.

China's share of the votes at the I.M.F., which has 184 members, would go up only slightly, to 3.719 percent, from 2.98 percent. The shares of South Korea, Turkey and Mexico, the other countries that gained more power from the vote on Monday, also rose a similarly modest amount. But the change was hailed by the United States and other nations as a decisive reform.

"It looks like a small step forward, but it's a large step," said Henry M. Paulson Jr., the United States Treasury Secretary, who was here for the annual meeting of the I.M.F. and the World Bank and participated in morning-until-night sessions assessing the global economy and possible steps to assure its health.

The proposal passed with 90.6 percent of the total vote, the I.M.F. said.

DOJ_NMG_0065453

In a separate development, a committee of finance ministers that oversees the World Bank endorsed in principle a plan by Paul D. Wolfowitz, the bank's president, to crack down on corruption in the bank's lending, but not unreservedly. The ministers added a proviso that the bank's board of executive directors, a separate group that oversees the day-to-day bank operations on behalf of donor and recipient nations, be able to override the way Mr. Wolfowitz carries out the plan.

Mr. Wolfowitz, a conservative intellectual who was an architect of the Iraq war as deputy secretary of defense in President Bush's first term, has stirred unease in the bank with his corruption policy. Many directors fear that it may be overly punitive and lead to cuts in aid to poor countries.

The finance ministers' committee also raised concerns, Mr. Wolfowitz said, about the standards to apply to various countries and the question of how much of the World Bank's resources should go to anticorruption plans.

The finance ministers' committee issued a statement that supported the anticorruption campaign but with what seemed to be muted wording. It supported the bank's "engagement" on the issue but demanded further information on how it would be carried out , and in a suggestion of unhappiness, "stressed the importance of board oversight of the strategy."

Some officials here indicated that the wording of the committee's statement reflected discomfort with Mr. Wolfowitz. But Mr. Wolfowitz said he was pleased the board had given him a green light to proceed with what has become a signature issue for him in his 15 months at the bank.

Throughout the meetings of the last few days in Singapore, much of the criticism of participating countries has focused less on the World Bank than on the overhaul of the I.M.F. The fund vote needed 85 percent of the 184 member countries' voting shares to be adopted.

The United States has about 17 percent of the vote and Europe, in aggregate, about 23 percent. Mr. Paulson and his European counterparts have spent much of their time here lobbying other countries to agree to the change. Japan has a 6.1 percent share.

The vote was not much in doubt, but many countries that voted in favor said they did so under protest and insisted that in a second round of discussions, scores of countries would be demanding a bigger voting share for themselves. India, Argentina, Brazil and Egypt were among those who had announced their opposition to the fund changes, fearing that they may be left out as the new structure is configured.

The change in the fund governance was advocated by the United States and many European countries as a way of getting China and other developing countries to feel more invested in the international economic system.

The I.M.F. is one of many institutions that American and European officials say are in need of change. There are fears of disaffection with the World Trade Organization, the successor of a global trade regime set up 60 years ago, after the collapse of trade talks this past summer.

Western leaders also want to change the composition of the United Nations Security Council, adding some countries to the roster of five permanent veto-bearing members. But they have been unable to agree on which countries to add. The United States wants to add Japan and one of several developing countries seeking membership.

Mr. Wolfowitz has said that the World Bank also needs to change its governance to give more say to China and other fast-growing countries in the developing world.

Under the surface of the I.M.F. vote was another objective of the United States: to engage China in the fund as it expands its role in monitoring currency flows and exchange rates. Washington hopes that the fund will become another voice urging China to let its currency fluctuate more freely in relation to the dollar.

If there is one overriding consensus among European and American finance ministers, it is that China is artificially keeping the value of its currency low in relation to the dollar, and that this is an unhealthy pattern also being followed by Japan and other Asian nations.

As a partial solution, the United States wants China to let its currency, the yuan, float more freely in the marketplace, where it would presumably rise in value and lead to fewer exports to the United States.

But many economists fear that if Asian currencies were to become stronger, that might create a new problem. If a decline in the dollar effectively reduces the hundreds of billions in dollar-denominated securities held overseas, it could lead to a panic-driven sell-off of dollars, driving up interest rates with possible damaging effects to the American economy.

DOJ_NMG_0065454

Mr. Paulson, meeting with reporters, said the monetary fund vote marked an incremental bit of pressure on China to do something about its currency, and he aimed to reinforce American concerns when he goes to China on Tuesday for his first visit as Treasury secretary.

IMF To Boost Growing Economies' Voting Power (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

SINGAPORE -- The International Monetary Fund agreed to give China, South Korea and other up-and-coming nations more say in deciding what rescue loans the controversial institution provides to troubled countries.

The overwhelming vote Monday by the lender's 184 member nations reflects a recognition that its voting shares are out of sync with the distribution of economic power around the world. It also reflects the concern of the U.S. and other major countries that the IMF won't be able to persuade borrowing nations to embrace painful economic overhauls if those borrowers don't feel their voices are being heard.

"It looks like a small step forward, but it's an important step because the global economy is always changing, and it's changing rather dramatically," U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson told reporters. "For institutions like the IMF to stay relevant, they have to change with the economy."

The proposal was supported by 90.6% of the available votes. To gain approval, proposed major IMF policy changes need 85% majorities. At the IMF, votes are allocated to member countries; the U.S., for example, has 17% of the total.

Monday's IMF decision means that China, South Korea, Mexico and Turkey -- the countries considered to be most severely shortchanged on the IMF board -- will quickly receive token increases in their voting power. In addition, the decision launched what is expected to be a two-year effort to redistribute votes more broadly in ways that will boost the poorest nations of Africa, as well as countries that account for a larger share of the world economy than their current IMF shares would suggest.

After the decision, China's share of votes will increase to about 3.7% from about 2.9%. For South Korea, the vote-share will rise to about 1.3% from about 0.8%. Among the difficult issues IMF members will have to resolve before that 2008 deadline is how to craft a formula that in the future will automatically assign IMF voting shares based on economic strength, openness to trade, foreign-currency reserves and other factors.

U.K. Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown, speaking at the IMF annual meetings in Singapore, called the decision "the biggest reform to the governance of the International Monetary Fund for 60 years."

Power within the IMF was initially set when the institution was established at the end of World War II and has been occasionally updated since then. But voting shares remain out of whack with countries' relative economic strength. Belgium, for instance, has three times the voting shares of South Korea, whose economy is twice as big. The U.S., while having 17% of the votes, accounts for 30% of global economic activity.

In a gesture to smaller countries, however, President George W. Bush's administration has vowed to forgo any increase in its voting power, as long as the U.S. maintains its existing share. The Treasury Department considers the 17% figure important because it allows the U.S. to veto major IMF policy changes.

Among countries that resisted Monday's changes were those worried they would lose power, those worried they wouldn't gain as much as they hoped, and those angry that some big countries, such as Japan and Germany, wouldn't forgo a share increase.

"The question is will the IMF change to reflect the world it needs to serve," Mr. Paulson said. In addition to strengthening the IMF, the U.S. Treasury team hopes expanding China's role will give Beijing a greater interest in embracing market-oriented policies of the sort the global organization recommends.

IMF Boosts Four Poorer Countries' Power (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065455

SINGAPORE, Sept. 18 -- The International Monetary Fund on Monday gave more influence over its decision-making to four developing countries and pledged to make further changes in the next two years to heighten the power of under-represented and poor nations.

Fund officials cast Monday's decision by the membership as a significant step in the IMF's efforts to gain credibility with poorer countries and to maintain relevance in a world that has recently had little need for an agency whose specialty is stabilizing troubled economies.

On its face, the makeover is largely symbolic. China, Mexico, Turkey and South Korea will gain slightly greater voting power. However, control of the fund will remain solidly in the hands of the United States and Europe, whose contributions to its coffers dwarf those of other countries. Most decisions in the institution's clubby environs are made by consensus.

But policymakers at the IMF argue that symbolic change matters. In leading bailout drives from Asia to Latin America and Russia, the fund gained a reputation for obsessing over austerity and budget-cutting at the expense of the poor. It pressured governments reliant on its largesse to cut subsidies and social services, say critics, generating unemployment while limiting the damage to major financial institutions.

Fund administrators chafe at this narrative, noting that during the Asian financial crisis in particular, the fund adjusted its programs to protect social spending. Yet in reserving a larger space at the table for emerging and poorer nations, fund officials and finance leaders from countries with the largest economies have labored to alter this perception, while making the institution more reflective of the global economy itself.

"For the first time, not only economic weight will be considered, but also the need for low-income countries to be strengthened in voice," said the fund's managing director, Rodrigo de Rato, during a meeting last week with members of anti-poverty groups.

The structure of the fund is closer to the way the world looked at the end of World War II than the way it looks today. China has less voting power than Italy, though its economy is far larger. The fund has 184 member countries, but with its headquarters in Washington, it has a decidedly American and European flavor.

"The world economy has undergone significant change over the last two decades, and the governance of the institution ought to reflect this," said John Lipsky, the fund's first deputy managing director.

The vote on the governance change, conducted here at a meeting of the IMF and the World Bank, was 90 percent in favor. But behind the scenes, the issue was controversial. Some poor nations said the change was too small to matter.

"The voice of poor countries is being lost," said a member of Nigeria's delegation, Amina Ibrahim. "This doesn't do it. The battle goes on."

Such large emerging economies as Brazil, India and Argentina opposed the way the refashioning occurred, asserting that they should be given greater rights.

"It further erodes the credibility and legitimacy of the IMF," these three nations, joined by Egypt, declared in a statement over the weekend.

The most immediate impact of the vote, held late Monday, is to slightly increase the power of four of the most under-represented countries. But it also commits the IMF to reapportion more votes later, with the idea that some will gain more shares, including such Asian nations as Singapore and Malaysia.

The U.S. Treasury says it has been lobbying for the change, partly in hopes that a greater role for China will make it more willing to increase the value of its currency, the yuan. Western manufacturers say undervalued Chinese money has made China's goods unfairly cheap on world markets.

Treasury and IMF policymakers hope that as China gains prominence within the institution, it will take on more responsibility for affairs beyond its borders and see its economic interests as intermingled with global prosperity.

But on the eve of a trip to China to discuss economic and trade policy, U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. minimized the potential impact of the IMF changes on Chinese thinking.

"It's incremental," he said. "China's going to play its role in the world whether the IMF reforms or not."

For the fund, the most contentious issue lies ahead: Under the plan adopted Monday, fund administrators must craft a formula for apportioning control in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0065456

The United States advocates focusing on the size of an economy to dictate voting power, while also increasing votes for the poorest countries. But European nations -- many of which would lose voting power under such a plan -- want to use additional criteria, including how much trade a country conducts and how open it is to capital flows.

In splitting the reapportioning into two phases, fund officials postponed that debate so they could get something accomplished.

"This reform must be done," said Finland's minister of finance, Eero Heinaluoma, who has coordinated fund policy positions for all nations of the European Union. "It will give more reliability and credibility to the voice of the IMF."

Departing Japanese Leader Shook Up Politics As Usual (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

TOKYO, Sept. 18 — Junichiro Koizumi swept to power in 2001 promising to "destroy" his ruling Liberal Democratic Party and, by extension, Japan's encrusted postwar order. To a remarkable extent, he succeeded — though hardly as radically as he had hoped. When Mr. Koizumi, 64, retires on Sept. 26, he will leave a Japan with new bearings: a smaller central government, greater faith in free markets and a new assertiveness in world affairs.

But his vision of a new Japan has already produced a backlash among Japanese who believe he has destroyed, along with the bad, much that was good of the old Japan.

Yet, while his policies were often unpopular, he has consistently drawn high approval ratings from voters hungry for charismatic, strong leadership. Even as Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain and other politicians have suffered for their endorsement of the war in Iraq, Mr. Koizumi — who to this day has expressed only the staunchest support for the war — has remained unscathed.

He retires with an approval rate hovering around 50 percent, the highest of any long-serving postwar prime minister, perhaps because voters believe that he has fulfilled his promise of shaking up the old Japan and that it will be up to his successors to lead them to a new one.

Clearly, though, there is no going back to the old ways, no matter who is elected as the leader of the Liberal Democrats on Wednesday and then chosen as prime minister next Tuesday.

"He's dramatically changed everything about how Japanese politics worked," said Park Cheol-hee, an expert in Japanese politics at Seoul National University in South Korea. "Future prime ministers will have to follow his path. I don't think they can go back to the good old days of relying on interest groups and bureaucrats. The public will expect prime ministers to take real policy initiatives. Things have fundamentally changed."

How much of that change is attributable to Mr. Koizumi's policies is constantly debated among experts.

The move away from the Liberal Democrats' politics of vested interests and patronage was inevitable, because Japan simply does not have the money it had before the collapse of its real estate-inflated "bubble economy" in the late 1980's, and after the succeeding years of little or no growth.

What's more, far-reaching electoral reforms pushed through by a coalition of minor parties during the Liberal Democrats' 10-month ouster from power in 1993 laid the foundation for the changes under Mr. Koizumi.

He pressed for painful economic reforms despite opposition from inside his own party. These changes included deregulating industries, cleaning up the banking industry's bad loans and slashing the enormous and frequently wasteful public spending that had won his party votes for decades.

But the revival of Japan's economy, many experts say, owes as much, if not more, to private companies' own restructurings and the booming trade with China's explosive economy.

Whatever his share of the credit, Mr. Koizumi articulated more than anybody else the need for Japan to change. In the decade before his election, Japan went through a succession of weak leaders bewildered as to how to even begin guiding the nation out of an all-encompassing malaise.

Mr. Koizumi was blunt. He told the Japanese, in some of his most famous slogans, to expect "pain to accompany structural reforms," and said he would carry out "structural reforms without exceptions."

DOJ_NMG_0065457

To the surprise of almost everyone, his blunt talk and actions won him widespread support.

"The conventional wisdom was that Japanese prime ministers were inherently incapable of exerting leadership," said Takeshi Sasaki, a political scientist at Gakushuin University and a former president of the University of Tokyo. "But Koizumi exercised leadership with great tenacity and tried many new things — things that prime ministers had not said or done until now."

Unlike his predecessors, Mr. Koizumi eschewed the compromises that had led to paralysis. In a society that values consensus, he was famous for making decisions on his own and seemed to excel in making political enemies. He was — in the words of his first foreign minister, Makiko Tanaka — a "weirdo."

And the public loved him. Each time voters had a chance to choose between him and Japan's old-fashioned politicians and bureaucrats, they backed him in large numbers.

Last year, for example, he could have been stymied after members of his own party voted down a bill to reform the country's massive postal savings system — effectively a savings bank that paid very low interest on deposits and had long lubricated the Liberal Democrats' political machine. But Mr. Koizumi responded by calling a snap election.

After winning a landslide, he easily won approval to privatize the post office, potentially freeing its enormous reserves to serve the economy rather than the politicians.

He extended his single-mindedness to foreign policy, cementing Japan's alliance with the United States after a decade in which the value of the alliance had been questioned. He pushed through a special law to deploy humanitarian troops to Iraq, in a move that many Japanese considered to be against the spirit, if not the letter, of the country's pacifist Constitution. He tied the Japanese Self-Defense Forces closer to the American military by participating in missile defense.

"The better our relations with the United States, the easier it will be for us to build good relations with China, South Korea, Asian and other countries in the world," Mr. Koizumi said during a visit to Japan by President Bush last November. "That's my basic belief."

Mr. Koizumi may have nurtured such an ironclad relationship with Mr. Bush that he was rewarded with a farewell road trip to Graceland. But he brought Japan's relations with China to their lowest point in decades, and presided over the rise of a narrow nationalism at home and Japan's diplomatic isolation in the region.

He made annual visits to the Yasukuni Shrine, the Shinto memorial where Japan's war dead and war criminals are enshrined. Most of his predecessors had avoided the shrine, regarded as a symbol of Japanese militarism in this region.

Because of the visits, China and South Korea have refused to hold summit talks with Japan.

Japan's hawks, though, say Mr. Koizumi's priorities were right.

"I give him a perfect score," said Hisahiko Okazaki, a former senior diplomat and a leading conservative commentator.

China's long-term strategy, Mr. Okazaki said, is to weaken the Japan-United States alliance. "If that's the case, Japan's grand diplomatic strategy toward China is obvious," he said. "What Mr. Koizumi did, as a strategy toward China, was correct."

But critics say Mr. Koizumi used foreign opposition to the shrine visits to rally nationalist sentiments among Japanese, who had lost their self-confidence because of the long economic slump and had grown fearful of China's rise.

Under Mr. Koizumi, nationalist politicians and scholars who would like to whitewash Japan's militarist past have found fertile soil and moved into the mainstream. Government-sanctioned school textbooks increasingly omit facts from Japan's wartime history, such as the use of slave labor and "comfort women" during the years it occupied Korea and Manchuria, or the massacre of 100,000 to 300,000 Chinese in Nanjing.

Japan's troubles with its neighbors, especially China, eventually grew so severe that policy makers and scholars in Washington in the past year began expressing worries that Mr. Koizumi's policy was hurting Japanese — and American — interests in Asia. But Mr. Koizumi's open appeals to nationalist symbols like Yasukuni won him and his party votes — a lesson that was absorbed by his likely successor, Shinzo Abe, the chief cabinet secretary.

At home, Mr. Koizumi diminished the role of the central government and the bureaucracy and gave local governments more authority. He deregulated industries, opened opportunities for entrepreneurs and freed big companies to hire a greater percentage of temporary workers.

Japan's economy has bounced back, though its long-term recovery is uncertain. In a backlash against Mr. Koizumi's pro-market policies, an increasing number of critics have said that the changes have favored the rich and corporations, and that they have contributed to a widening in income gaps and a fraying of Japan's vaunted egalitarianism.

Mr. Koizumi showed little interest in addressing these concerns. After passing the law to change the postal savings system last fall, which Mr. Koizumi had long regarded as the glue that held together the old Japan, he appeared to lose passion for his job. In June, he refused to extend a parliamentary session despite unfinished legislative business. He could not wait to leave the building, it was said, so that he could go to the United States and travel with Mr. Bush to Graceland.

Japan's Abe, Poised To Lead, Offers Nation Vision Of Pride (WP)

By Anthony Faiola, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

TOKYO -- To glimpse the brave new Japan of Shinzo Abe -- the hawkish 51-year-old poised to replace Junichiro Koizumi as prime minister next week -- take a peek inside the eighth-grade history classes at this city's prestigious Tamagawa Academy.

Using new textbooks with lessons hailed by Abe as the foundation of a more confident nation, junior high students at the elite private school are this year being taught something that has been largely taboo in post-World War II Japan -- to take pride in their country. The texts omit or soften references to atrocities committed by Japanese troops during the war, assure students that the war was waged primarily in self-defense and promote the ideal of a proud and independent Japan.

The controversial books, thus far adopted by only a handful of schools, have the support of the government and are set for wider distribution. But they are only part of Abe's vision for the future. He has vowed to push through a sweeping education bill, strengthening the notion of patriotism in public classrooms in a way not seen since the fall of Imperial Japan, and to rewrite Japan's pacifist constitution to allow the country to again have an official and flexible military.

Abe (pronounced ah-bay) may well get his way. Currently Japan's chief cabinet secretary, he is overwhelmingly favored to succeed the retiring Koizumi in ruling party elections on Wednesday, a win that would effectively guarantee him the prime minister's post after a full vote of parliament on Sept. 26.

Although his proposals have flustered Japan's neighbors in Asia, where war-related grievances linger just below the surface, Abe and others define the changes as a natural maturing of Japanese democracy. Perhaps more importantly, they say the changes reflect the need for Japan to transform itself in the face of new threats.

In the decades after World War II, most Japanese took pride in their country's role as the world's model pacifist society, which operated by the rules of "checkbook diplomacy" and left its defense largely to U.S. military might. But today Japan is confronting the prospect of a nuclear-armed North Korea and the reality of a China that has become a military and economic superpower.

The rise of Abe, an unabashed nationalist set to be Japan's youngest postwar prime minister and its first to be born after the conflict, underscores a profound shift in thinking that has been shaped by those threats.

"Rather than getting praised for wrestling a good round of sumo under the rules that foreign countries make, we should join in the making of the rules," Abe said in a televised debate this month. ". . . I believe I can create a new Japan with a new vision."

Japan's foreign minister, Taro Aso, and its finance minister, Sadakazu Tanigaki, are also competing for the leadership of the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, or LDP. But neither is as pedigreed as Abe to deliver on promises. His father, Shintaro Abe, served as foreign minister; his grandfather, Nobusuke Kishi, was initially arrested as a World War II criminal but escaped the gallows to become prime minister in 1957.

In Abe's latest book, "Toward a Beautiful Country," Japan's presumptive new leader casts doubt on the legitimacy of the Tokyo war crimes tribunal that convicted Japan's wartime leaders. Asked by a foreign journalist last September whether he regretted Japan's defeat in the war, Abe briskly replied, "You refer to me as rather nationalistic, but I say that the person who is not patriotic cannot be the leader of his country."

The handpicked successor of Koizumi, a charismatic leader who laid the groundwork for Japan's gradual emergence from its pacifist shell, Abe has crafted a comparatively ambitious vision. Although he is likely to maintain Koizumi's emphasis on the U.S.-Japan alliance as the basis of national defense, he has also suggested he wants Japan to be a more equal partner. Some analysts predict that he will strive for a version of Washington's relationship with Britain, which closely cooperates with the U.S. military but acts on its own as it sees fit.

Analysts also note that Abe is popular largely because of -- not despite -- his unusually hawkish stance. He has been particularly fierce on the subject of communist North Korea, now seen as Japan's greatest security threat. When North Korea launched a battery of new test missiles on July 4, Abe went far beyond the diplomatic talking points, calling for a debate on whether Tokyo could stage a preemptive strike on North Korean missile bases.

Ten years ago, analysts note, such boldness would have sparked a public outcry here for his resignation. Today, it has helped ensure his election as Japan's prodigal samurai returned.

"Abe recognizes that Japan can no longer be the country it has been. We cannot sit back in the face of new dangers," said Ichita Yamamoto, an LDP legislator and close Abe ally. "Under our current constitution, if a U.S. ship is attacked aside a Japanese ship, we cannot even fight to defend our American allies. What kind of partner does that make us? We are living in a more dangerous world and it calls for a strong leader."

Abe's popularity has buoyed conservatives, who see him as the natural heir to Koizumi as the Japanese regain their pride. Though Koizumi infuriated China and the Koreas by visiting a shrine that honors Japan's military dead, including convicted war criminals, he unambiguously upheld the government's landmark 1995 apology, which recognized World War II as an act of Japanese aggression. Abe, in contrast, has been less clear, saying he recognizes the "spirit" of the apology but suggesting that historians should be the final judges of Japan's past actions.

Japanese pacifists, whose shrinking ranks have made them a minority voice here, have become anxious. They point to the continuing influence of rightist groups with armored black vans, whose members use bullhorns to shout racist propaganda on the streets of major Japanese cities. They also cite the punishments meted out to teachers who have refused to comply with recent requirements to stand for the national anthem and bow to the Japanese flag at school graduation and entrance ceremonies.

"I have a sense that the postwar generation of politicians in Japan -- including Abe -- have lost the older generation's sense of war guilt," said Takayoshi Miyagawa, a political strategist and noted pacifist in Tokyo. "This is taking Japan down a path we should not be going down again. It is a path that is leading us back toward a wicked nationalism that the young have now forgotten about."

Advocates of rebuilding Japanese patriotism call such talk alarmist, saying six decades as Asia's leading democracy and dominant economy have earned Japan the right to pride. The movement, they add, is not going forward without caution. At Tamagawa Academy, for instance, students using the revised, and more flattering, history books have also been told to use the old ones as supplemental material to help them formulate their own conclusions.

"We are trying to strike a balance between our role as teachers and our desire to give young Japanese a chance to be proud of their country," said Kiyoaki Ishizuka, Tamagawa's junior high headmaster. "The youth of every other nation enjoys that right. Why shouldn't Japan's?"

Japan Sees Genes Of A Leader In A Grandson (LAT)

By Bruce Wallace

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

TOKYO — For a man who claims he likes to speak his mind, Shinzo Abe's ambiguity is making him a tough politician to label.

Some say the man poised to become Japan's next prime minister is a hawk, pointing to his hard-line stance on North Korea and his declared intention to rewrite Japan's pacifist constitution.

Others call him a realist, prepared to muffle his tough talk to soften Japan's image and improve its stone-cold relations with China.

Yet almost everyone here agrees there is one label that fits this career politician who is almost certain to be elected head of the governing Liberal Democratic Party, or LDP, on Wednesday and prime minister a week after that.

The grandson.

DOJ_NMG_0065460

To understand Abe, say friends and foes, you must understand his relationship with Nobusuke Kishi, his maternal grandfather, who died in 1987 and was once prime minister.

Kishi was no ordinary politician. He was a key architect of imperial Japan's expansion across Asia in the 1930s, a Cabinet minister who signed the declaration of war against the United States and who was arrested and jailed — though never charged — as part of the select company of about two dozen top war criminals after Japan's surrender.

His comeback as a powerful backroom political fixer, unflinching Japanese nationalist and eventually prime minister from 1957 to 1960 makes Kishi an example of what his grandson admiringly calls "fighting statesmen," the minority of politicians willing to take an unpopular stand and stick to their convictions.

That legacy weighs on Abe, who clearly sees himself in the fighting mold.

With a great-uncle, Eisaku Sato, who was also prime minister in the 1960s, and a father, Shintaro Abe, who was a respected foreign minister and perennial candidate for the top job, the incoming prime minister boasts a pedigree that has Japan's political class talking about his "political DNA."

"Sometimes Abe says he has the combined DNA of his grandfather, who was a very strong figure, and his father, who was softer," says Yoshihide Suga, Japan's senior vice minister for internal affairs who is a close Abe advisor. "But I think the DNA of his grandfather is strongest."

Kishi is more than just a spiritual guide to Abe. Like his grandfather, Abe chafes at living under a war-renouncing constitution written by American occupiers. And while Kishi was prime minister at a time when memories of war were fresh and rewriting the constitution was a political impossibility, Abe comes into office believing conditions are now right to put Japanese pen to the American paper.

"I seek to draft a constitution of our own that fits Japan in the 21st century," he said during one of the candidate debates in this month's leadership race to succeed outgoing Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi. "I represent the postwar generation."

But that generation's determination to stir up history makes some of Japan's neighbors nervous.

China and the two Koreas have been particularly unsettled by Abe's questioning of the legitimacy of the Tokyo war crimes trials and alarmed by his visits to Yasukuni Shrine, where war criminals are honored along with about 2.5 million other Japanese war dead.

Abe, who turns 52 this week, will be the first Japanese prime minister born after World War II. Every survey shows him with a commanding grip on about 70% of the party delegates who will elect their new leader. Many are young by Japanese political standards, and the hand-over from Koizumi to Abe will mark the ascendancy of these politicians prepared to change a country they believe is crippled by excessive war guilt.

The theme of Abe's campaign is sketched out in his book "Toward the Beautiful Country," a collection of musings on politics and his life published in July. The book contains numerous criticisms of postwar Japan's "masochistic teaching of history" and its collective aversion to anything having to do with the imperial era, which Abe says has left the Japanese with a "bent and narrow" psychology.

"Why not work up a good sweat and unlock the future by being proud of being Japanese rather than belittling ourselves?" he asks.

Abe says he has no plans to turn his back on Koizumi's path of economic liberalization, but will seek ways to deal with growing alarm here over increasing disparities of wealth.

But his ambitions go beyond amending the clauses of the constitution that prevent Japan from going to war unless attacked, even to defend an ally such as the United States. Although they see the alliance with Washington as the cornerstone of Japanese security — a position that his grandfather fought for as prime minister despite massive left-wing protests — Abe and supporters are less pleased with many Western values imported into Japan.

Their nationalism is cultural, not militaristic, they say. They complain that an overdose of "individualism" has been a virus weakening traditional Japanese bonds of family and community. And they blame that disintegration on a 1960s culture that led to more women in the workforce and an education system that is not only slack when it comes to discipline but that fails to raise students with a sense of pride in their country.

The Abe entourage already has made it clear that its first order of business is a radical overhaul of Japan's public education system, which they say is riddled with leftist teachers. Abe wants patriotism taught and has suggested sending students to do a year of volunteer work before entering university, even if it has to be made compulsory.

"We are not trying to go back to 1945; our conservatism is not the same as prewar politics or militarism," says Hakubun Shimomura, an LDP ally of Abe's and a leading critic of Japan's education system. "We have to educate children to understand that they are not alone, that they are part of a community. So they have to learn to respect the flag, respect the anthem, because they are the symbols of the country and you have to take them seriously."

Abe is the product of private schools. Raised in Tokyo, a second son and middle child, he has described a lonely youth in which his father was a remote figure, seldom home and obsessed with his political career. The two grew close only later, after the elder Abe insisted that his son quit his job at a multinational steel company to work as his secretary in the Foreign Ministry.

His father died of liver failure at 67 in 1991, having never reached the top job that so many had predicted would one day be his.

Abe ran for office two years later, winning his father's old seat, but had an uneventful career until he became an outspoken critic of the government's failure to pursue allegations that North Korea had abducted an unknown number of Japanese citizens during the Cold War.

"Nobody at the top of the party wanted to talk about it," says Abe advisor Suga, another early leader of the campaign to call North Korea to account over the disappearances. "Abe knows that the top duty of politicians is to protect their people and the national interest. He's a politician of strong beliefs who knows that politicians should speak their minds."

The swell of support over his stand on North Korea emboldened Abe, solidifying his belief in the political benefits of being a "fighting statesman," and he has already signaled he plans to tighten the economic screws on Pyongyang.

But he has also tempered some of his language while running for prime minister. Where he once defended his visits to Yasukuni Shrine on grounds of religious freedom, he has refused to say whether he will visit the memorial as prime minister.

Advisors hint that he plans to simply stay away from the shrine without promising to do so, a calculated ambiguity they hope will assuage Chinese fury over the visits while not appearing to bend to any outside pressure.

Another sign of the realist in Abe, perhaps. But it's that sort of muddied message that will make people look to the grandfather's record for clues about where Abe will take Japan.

"Yes, he is a hawk, but not out of a personal conviction forged in debates and discussion," says Akira Asada, an economist and philosopher based at Kyoto University.

"Abe simply wants to be a good boy, a loyal child to the memory of his father and grandfather. And his grandfather just happened to be a hawk."

From The Ground Up, Cuba Is Crumbling (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

HAVANA — At the intersection of Marina and Jovellar streets, more than 50 people wait along a potholed sidewalk and broken curb for a bus that wheezes up to the stop already full.

Somehow, a dozen or so manage to squeeze into the windowless contraption that dates to the days when Moscow provided much of the means to keep the Cuban economy moving. Today, the buses barely keep Cubans moving. Many people spend as much as two hours each night getting home from their jobs in the center of Havana.

Their homes are also in a sad state, with at least 500 buildings in the capital collapsing each year, by the government's own count. Their utilities are decrepit too: Water and power distribution systems are corroded patchworks predating the 1959 revolution, and olfactory evidence of the state of the sewer system wafts throughout the city.

Cuba is falling apart — literally.

Even as its economy booms thanks to a thriving tourism industry, brisk nickel exports and cheap oil from ideologically aligned Venezuela, the social benefits are difficult to see at street level. Except for a few high-profile historical restoration projects such as the Art Deco buildings of Old Havana, the country's structural decay seems to worsen with each month.

DOJ_NMG_0065462

"It's not a question of repairing anymore. Everything needs to be rebuilt," says Julio, a construction worker who spends more time as an unlicensed cabdriver than on state building sites. "There is no material and no money to buy it, so nothing has been maintained."

Some blame the decrepitude on the U.S. economic embargo that has blocked travel and the flow of goods to the island for nearly 45 years in an effort — through nine U.S. administrations — to starve Cuba into abandoning what Washington sees as a ruinous adherence to communism.

Few Cubans will talk openly about what might be wrong with a political and economic system that even in boom times can't keep the wheels of public transportation turning or the lights on — especially since President Fidel Castro turned over power to his brother six weeks ago for surgery deemed a state secret. But they complain quietly that there is more to their urban squalor than the embargo or the loss of Soviet aid 15 years ago can explain.

"The problem is that the government owns everything, and people only take care of what is their own," says another moonlighting cabdriver, Arturo, who buzzes his plastic-encased motorbike around basketball-sized craters in the asphalt where the Malecon seaside promenade meets 23rd Street. "Cubans are very clever and improvisational. We can fix anything. But there isn't the will to do it unless it is to improve your own conditions."

In self-improvement mode, city dwellers resort to pilferage to "resolve" their problems.

Resolver, Spanish for "to resolve," has long been a euphemism for getting around the system, be it a restaurant cook setting aside a few frozen French fries to take home from each tourist's order, or the filching of park bench planks to patch a gap in the deteriorating walls of an apartment.

The lack of available or affordable parts, tools and building materials has had a cancerous effect on the alreadydegraded infrastructure. Doorknobs disappear from public buildings, screws from wall-mounted shelves and dispensers. Along the Malecon, not a single storm-drain cover survives to prevent rubbish from clogging the sewers, the square metal grates apparently useful to screen windows.

Rampant theft has engendered more bureaucracy, with office workers having to lock their doors when they go for coffee out of fear someone will snatch the wastebasket, stapler, lightbulbs, pens and paper. Inventory lists are posted in government offices, a hedge against the contents disappearing.

But it is the buildings themselves, as well as vehicles and farm equipment, that are at risk of collapse from the pilfering. A tow-truck driver describes how the vehicles he pulls tend to lose their spark plugs, air filters, lug nuts and rear-view mirrors from the point of collection to delivery. Because most cars and trucks are state property, they are seen as fair game by Cubans hoping to make a few dollars by selling the purloined parts.

Even the tourism industry cash cow is vulnerable to widespread theft and minimal investment. Ancient air conditioners blow the smell of mold into "five-star" hotel rooms where renovations have been limited to the lobbies.

Rail tracks link most major cities, offering an affordable means of transportation, but the lines are rusted, engine breakdowns frequent and passenger service so primitive most travelers prefer to hitchhike.

Hope for repair of Cuba's housing, roads, transportation and utilities has risen with the multibillion-dollar investments made by Venezuela in the last few years, including a deal signed this year for Venezuelan engineers to complete the Cienfuegos oil refinery abandoned by the Soviets in the early 1990s.

That and other joint projects to upgrade the electricity grid, in addition to crude-oil-burning power plants, have had the effect of lowering the number of blackouts and power failures this year compared with the prolonged outages that left Cubans sweltering without fans or elevators the last two summers.

Decades of stoically making do with shortages and dysfunction have engendered a paralyzing passivity among Cubans, at least about the quality of their administrators and the political system that guides them.

"It's very tranquil here, very safe. We like it that way and don't want things to change, at least not suddenly," says Monica, a 30-something engineer asked if the conditions of urban life are frustrating. Like many asked about their expectations for the future, she claims not to have given it much thought, even with the only leader she has ever known now uncharacteristically in the background.

DOJ_NMG_0065463

While Cubans succumb to the daily demands of resolving their food, shelter and finance problems, their former countrymen across the Florida Straits say they expect to be called on to help when the next leadership takes on the massive task of reconstruction.

Frank Nero, head of the Beacon Council, a public-private consortium of 400 Miami-area businesses, says that Cuba's dearth of lumber, hardware, tools, flooring materials, paints, electrical supplies and other do-it-yourself materials could mean that U.S. construction firms "are going to be very much in demand post-embargo."

Cubans have been taught to fear economic overtures from the exile community in Miami, where some who lost property to the revolution nurture hopes of reclaiming it after the Castro regime comes to a close and — they believe — a more democratic and free-market society emerges.

But with every third family thought to have relatives among the 1.2 million Cuban exiles in the United States, the younger generation has expectations of cross-straits collaboration.

"My brother-in-law has a construction business in Florida. He would help us if it was allowed," says Julio, who would like to replace the broken, grimy tiles on the staircase leading to his Havana apartment and put glass in the windows. "It will be faster to rebuild if there is goodwill on both sides."

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Revises Terror Proposal (USAT)

USA Today, September 19, 2006

The White House plans to send lawmakers a revised proposal for trying terrorism suspects as President Bush's plan met more resistance among Republicans.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said Monday that the administration was sending the new language in hopes of reaching an agreement. Republican senators have written their own proposal giving terror detainees more rights than the administration wants.

Less than a week after a Republican-led Senate committee defied Bush and approved terrorism-detainee legislation that the president vowed to block, three more GOP senators said they oppose the administration's version.

GOP Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Olympia Snowe of Maine said they favor Virginia Sen. John Warner's alternative bill.

Official tells of nomineefor cybersecurity job

President Bush has chosen an industry information security specialist to be the Department of Homeland Security's assistant secretary for cybersecurity and telecommunications, a department official said.

Greg Garcia, vice president of the Information Technology Association of America, will be nominated for the post, the department official told the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the announcement is pending.

The cybersecurity job, created in July 2005, has been filled by acting director Donald Purdy who was on loan from Carnegie Mellon University under a two-year contract.

Last week, a test of mock Internet attacks found that government and industry officials were unable to fight back quickly and effectively against simulated hackings that sought to halt subways and cause power outages.

Ney to resign from twoHouse leadership posts

Rep. Bob Ney, who has agreed to plead guilty to federal corruption charges, stepped down from two House committee positions but did not say whether he would leave Congress.

Ney, R-Ohio, headed the Housing and Community Opportunity subcommittee, which oversees the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, and the Franking Commission, which governs lawmakers' use of public money to express opinions in mailings.

Ney agreed Friday to plead guilty to making false statements and conspiracy to commit fraud, make other false statements and violate U.S. lobbying restrictions. Soon after that announcement, Ohio Republican Party Chairman Bob Bennett called for Ney to resign.

David Popp, Ney's chief of staff, would not say whether the congressman would return to his duties before his term expires in January. He is not seeking re-election.

Republican NYC mayorto campaign for Lieberman

Republican New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg will host a fundraiser for Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., at the mayor's Manhattan town house, according to Lieberman's campaign. Lieberman is seeking re-election as an independent after losing the Democratic primary to Ned Lamont. Dan Gerstein, a spokesman for Lieberman's campaign, said the fundraiser will be held Nov. 1 and will be co-chaired by former senator Alfonse D'Amato, another New York Republican, and former Democratic New York mayor Ed Koch.

Poll shows Democrat aheadfor open Minn. Senate seat

Democrat Amy Klobuchar, county attorney in Minneapolis, led GOP Rep. Mark Kennedy, 56%-32% in the U.S. Senate race, a Star Tribune poll found. Klobuchar led 50%-31% in the same poll in July. The two seek the seat of Democrat Mark Dayton. The poll of 820 likely voters was conducted Wednesday through Friday and has a margin of error of +/-3.4 percentage points.

White House To Revise Terror Proposal (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, September 19, 2006

The White House said Monday it will send lawmakers a revised proposal for dealing with terrorism suspects as indications grew that President Bush's plan was meeting increased resistance among Republicans in both chambers of Congress.

White House Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino said the administration was sending the new language in hopes of reaching an agreement. A revolt by GOP senators, who have written their own proposal giving terror detainees more rights than the administration wants, has embarrassed the White House at a time when Republicans want to use their security policies as a main platform in November's congressional elections.

"Our commitment to finding a resolution is strong," Perino said.

DOJ_NMG_0065468

A week after a Republican-led Senate committee defied Bush and approved terror-detainee legislation that the president vowed to block, three more GOP senators said they now opposed the administration's version, joining the four Republicans who had already come out against it.

If all 44 Democrats plus the chamber's Democratic-leaning independent also vote for the alternative by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., as expected, that would give it a majority in the 100-member Senate.

In a further hint of problems for the administration, House officials said their chamber was postponing a vote planned for Wednesday on a bill mirroring Bush's proposal.

Republican officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said they have encountered resistance and were no longer certain they had enough votes to push the measure to passage through the GOP-run House.

Kevin Madden, spokesman for House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said the vote would be rescheduled to next week and blamed the delay on a request by the House Judiciary Committee to study the bill.

An administration official, who declined to be identified because of the sensitivity surrounding the negotiations, said the new language only addresses a dispute over the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, which set the standard for treatment of prisoners taken during hostilities.

No other details of the new administration plan were initially available.

"This legislation, once finished, will provide not only a way to bring the mastermind of 9/11 to justice, but also provide clarity to our men and women in the intelligence community who are interrogating these high-value detainees who helped provide information that allowed us to disrupt and prevent additional terrorist plots against America," the White House's Perino said.

The president's measure would go further than Warner's bill, allowing classified evidence to be withheld from defendants in terror trials and allowing coerced testimony. Bush also favors a narrower interpretation of the Geneva Conventions that would make it harder to prosecute U.S. interrogators for using harsh techniques.

Neither side is saying how an agreement can be achieved on whether to allow the CIA to use highly controversial methods such as disorientation, forced nakedness and waterboarding, in which a subject is made to think he is drowning. Without confirming any specific techniques used by the CIA, the Bush administration says the agency's program has foiled terror plots. Opponents say the techniques verge on torture.

Last week, Warner, normally a Bush supporter, pushed his measure through his Senate Armed Services Committee by a 15-9 vote. The White House argued that the Senate proposal would end the CIA program to interrogate terrorists.

Whether Bush would have enough votes to win on the Senate floor seemed in question. On Monday, Warner appeared to have the majority of support in the Senate, with at least 52 votes in his favor if Democrats backed him, as expected.

GOP Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Olympia Snowe of Maine said they favor Warner's bill, joining Warner and three others who voted for it during the committee meeting last week.

Neither side has been able to muster definitively the 60 votes necessary to prevent a Senate filibuster of their proposal. This uncertainty — along with hope that the White House and Warner would reach an agreement to stave off a Republican showdown on the Senate floor_ has kept the bill from being voted on.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., who supports the president's bill, has said he wants to pass it before lawmakers recess at the end of the month. Doing so would allow the president to proceed with prosecutions of 14 "high-value" terrorists before the midterm elections.

The president's plan has encountered resistance in the House as well, with Rep. Steve Buyer, R-Ind., urging Bush to heed the military's top uniformed lawyers, who have previously opposed some provisions of the president's plan.

An agreement would keep Republicans from having to choose between backing Bush, as they have done in the past on anti-terror issues, and three Republicans known as leaders on national security issues: Warner, R-Va., a former Navy secretary; John McCain, R-Ariz., a former prisoner of war who last year pushed through legislation banning mistreatment of detainees; and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., a reserve judge for the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals.

White House Offers New Proposal On Interrogations (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

White House officials sent Congress a revised proposal last night on rules governing the interrogation of detainees at secret CIA prisons, bending to the opposition of a growing group of Republicans who have balked at President Bush's proposal on military trials for suspected terrorists.

Senate aides and White House officials did not divulge the changes to the initial proposal, but they made it clear that negotiations were restarting after days of heated charges and countercharges. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), a central figure in the dispute, said there is now a "50-50 chance" of a deal being struck by week's end.

At issue is legislation authorizing the creation of "military commissions" that would try terrorist suspects. But the central dispute is whether language should be included to "clarify" the responsibilities that intelligence operatives have under the Geneva Conventions in the treatment of detainees in secret prisons.

A group of dissident Republicans, led by Senate Armed Services Chairman John W. Warner (Va.), Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and Graham, say that would be tantamount to abrogating the Geneva Conventions and would invite other countries to reinterpret the treaty as they wish.

"We appear to be moving towards a possible resolution," said a senior Bush aide, who, like others, spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss negotiations. Another official said both sides decided to cool down the debate after days of pitched rhetoric when they concluded they were getting nowhere.

Since the dispute burst into the open Wednesday, five other Republican senators -- Susan Collins (Maine), Olympia J. Snowe (Maine), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), John E. Sununu (N.H.) and Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) -- have indicated they will side with the dissidents, and the numbers were threatening to grow.

"Obviously, the debate has raised a couple decibel levels," the second White House official said. "We could block whatever they want, and they could block whatever we want. Nobody wants that kind of impasse." Congressional leaders had hoped that the commissions bill would be the centerpiece of a legislative month dedicated to national security issues.

After yesterday's talks, the official said, "there was a general tone of cautious optimism."

The dissidents' hand has only grown stronger. House Republican leaders decided yesterday to drop a vote planned for this week on Bush's bill on military trials, agreeing instead to refer it to the Judiciary Committee for further consideration. White House and GOP leaders had hoped an overwhelming vote in the House this week would increase the pressure on McCain, Graham and Warner to relent.

More troubling to the White House and GOP leaders, Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), chairman of the House International Relations Committee, indicated he may ask to examine portions of the bill pertaining to international treaties, leadership aides acknowledged.

GOP leaders are concerned that would open a second front on the debate over the Geneva Conventions. Hyde would also like to examine a section of the bill suspending detainees' right of habeas corpus, a provision that civil libertarians strongly criticize but that so far has not been controversial in Congress.

A White House official expressed confidence that House GOP leaders will bring to a vote a bill of the president's liking. Still, the delay in the House marked a fresh setback for Bush, who had demanded that Congress send him a bill this month authorizing the creation of the commissions.

Beyond the dispute over the Geneva Conventions, the White House and the dissidents are clashing on how and whether classified information should be divulged to commission defendants, and whether evidence obtained through coercive interrogations should be admissible at trials.

The White House would like more latitude to withhold classified information, but the dissidents say it is a fundamental rule of jurisprudence that defendants be able to confront the evidence being used against them. The dissidents are also concerned that the use of coerced evidence could open convictions to appeal.

White House and Senate officials indicated that yesterday's counterproposal from the Bush administration deals primarily with the Geneva Conventions issue. Once agreement can be reached on that, they said, the other matters should be resolved quickly.

Mark Salter, McCain's chief of staff, said the Arizona senator is hoping for assurances from the White House that CIA interrogators would abide by the standards of treatment for detainees codified last year after a fight with the White House over interrogation at military prisons. But such assurances would not be enough unless Bush agrees to drop any new definitions of treatment under the Geneva Conventions.

A third White House official said the administration would tone down its public discussion of the matter as long as talks proceeded. "As long as there's a sense that there's a deal to be had and everyone's trying to get there, you won't see much public chatter out there," the official said.

Bush Offers Concession On Terror Suspects' Rights (WT)

President Bush yesterday offered to compromise on his hard-line stance that Congress curb rights for terrorism suspects, as the White House announced it will send lawmakers a revised proposal intended to overcome increasing resistance from Republicans on Capitol Hill.

White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said the administration would send new language to the Hill in hopes of reaching an agreement and quell a Republican revolt. Last week, four Republicans, led by Chairman John W. Warner of Virginia, joined all Democrats on the Senate Armed Services Committee, voting 15-9 to expand the rights of terror suspects.

"Our commitment to finding a resolution is real and that's why we're going to be sharing some language, because we are eager to find a resolution," Mrs. Perino said.

DOJ_NMG_0065470

An administration official said last night that the new language offered by the White House pertains only to U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions, which govern treatment of prisoners of war. The president has questioned the conventions rule that prisoners not be subject to "outrages upon human dignity."

"That's a statement that is wide open to interpretation," Mr. Bush said in a press conference Friday. "And what I am proposing is that there be clarity in the law so that our professionals will have no doubt that that which they are doing is legal."

Mr. Bush said, "The piece of legislation I sent up there provides our professionals that which is needed to go forward."

The president also contends that without such clarity, the program cannot proceed. He said Friday, "If not for this program, our intelligence community believes al Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland."

Mr. Warner and fellow Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina were to get the latest proposal on the president's bill late last night, and Mr. Graham said that the outreach is appreciated.

"Like all negotiations, this is and will continue to be a back-and-forth exchange of thoughts and proposals," Mr. Graham said. "We share the president's goal of enacting legislation preserving an effective CIA program to make us safe, upholding Geneva Convention protections for our troops and passing constitutional muster."

A week after the Senate committee defied Mr. Bush, three more Republican senators said they oppose the administration's version, joining the four committee Republicans who voted against it. Republican Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine said they favor Mr. Warner's bill.

Although the Republican Party holds 55 seats in the 100-member Senate, Mr. Bush's proposal would fail if Democrats vote against the measure in a unified bloc, as expected.

In a further setback for the White House, the House announced yesterday that it would postpone a vote planned for tomorrow on a bill mirroring Mr. Bush's proposal.

White House Revises Plan For Detainees (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, September 19, 2006

The battle between the White House and Republican senators at odds over interrogation techniques at secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons moved closer to resolution on Monday night when the White House sent a new draft bill to Congress.

“The senators at the weekend suggested they would re-open negtotiations and asked us to send some language. Since we are eager to find a solution we are sending up draft language to the Hill for consideration to help them find a way forward,” said a White House spokeswoman.

Progress in the talks was noted on Monday by Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who has led resistance to the White House interpretation of Article 3 of the Geneva Convention, which governs the rights of wartime detainees.

“We are certainly making progress and I’m hopeful we can get it completed soon,” he said. Mr McCain, with John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and Lindsey Graham, have taken on the Senate leadership, by opposing the White House effort, citing fears it could compromise the treatment of US military personnel captured overseas.

“If it’s seen that our country is trying to redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of the CIA, why can’t every other country redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of their secret police?’” Mr Graham asked.

The White House has been conscious of two critical political deadlines. Congress has just two weeks left to act to pass a bill before gearing up for the mid-term elections. If it fails, President George W Bush could face a much more hostile Congress after the elections.

Mr McCain said he had the backing of George Shultz, former secretary of state, joining Colin Powell, another former secretary of state, who joined the debate last week with a letter warning of the moral damage to the reputation of the US.

Mr Shultz told the FT. “My concern is not doing anything to change the Geneva Convention. I believe the ability to use aggressive questioning is important and I understand the objectives of the administration and Mr McCain can be achieved without touching the Geneva Convention, and dealing with the War Crimes Act.

”The US War Crimes Act of 1996 makes it a felony to commit grave violations of the Geneva Conventions. Mr Shultz warned that the US should “not to mess around with the Geneva Convention. There has been a long tradition of the Convention. As a former secretary of state I know how important reciprocity is to military people….It is very important for us to be defining ourselves with the highest ideals, but you also have to protect yourselves.”

Jennifer Daskal of Human Rights Watch, said that approach, “certainly seems to be a reasonable compromise,” in that it could protect CIA personnel carrying out any tough interrogations in secret prisons from prosecution.

“It could allow it to go forward. It might be violating the law, but they [the interrogators] could not be held criminally accountable under the War Crimes Act.”

Frist Could ‘Fill The Tree’ On Rival Detainee Bill (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, September 19, 2006

As the man who decides how issues are brought to the Senate floor, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) could use a few procedural tricks up his sleeve to stack the deck in favor of President Bush if he decides to force an intraparty showdown this week over the treatment and interrogation of detainees in the war on terrorism.

Though much has been made of the support Senate Armed Services Chairman

John Warner (R-Va.) and Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) have garnered for their proposal on how to prosecute suspected terrorists and Bush's fervent opposition to it, there is no guarantee that Senators will get a chance to vote in a head-to-head matchup between the differing bills proposed by the two sides.

"You don't always know what options you're going to have," warned a senior Senate GOP aide.

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.) began surveying the Republican Conference on Friday to find out Members' positions on the president's detainee bill and whether they would oppose a filibuster of the Bush plan, said a well-placed Senate Republican aide.

However, as of press time Monday, Senate GOP leaders were still waiting for today's Senate Republican policy lunch to gauge the level of dissension or consensus in their ranks.

"When people get back to town, it's a whole lot easier to see where they are," explained the senior Senate GOP aide. "We can't do anything until Wednesday anyway."

That's true, considering the Senate will finish up work on a U.S.-Oman free-trade agreement today and is expected to move on to the nomination of Alice Fisher to be assistant attorney general this afternoon.

The remainder of the week is anybody's guess, as Frist must decide whether it's worth going forward with debate on detainee legislation. He still has not ruled out combining the president's plan with another lightning-rod issue within the GOP ranks, the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program.

On the detainee question, Frist could decide to give Senators only one option and then dare wavering Democrats and Republicans who are up for re-election or from politically marginal states to vote against the president's plan, which would allow the government to try suspected terrorists by military tribunal.

By most counts, Warner, McCain and Graham have at least eight other GOP supporters — Sens. Susan Collins (Maine), Olympia Snowe (Maine), Dick Lugar (Ind.), Mike DeWine (Ohio), Gordon Smith (Ore.), John Sununu (N.H.), Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.) — for their bill, which would give terrorist suspects more rights during trials and omits language the Bush administration says is necessary to protect U.S. interrogators from being charged with ambiguous war crimes.

With 11 GOP supporters and the expected backing of a majority of Democrats, the Armed Services proposal, which passed the panel with largely Democratic support last week, could draw as many as 56 votes.

But the senior Senate GOP aide noted that that count would apply only if those Senators actually have an opportunity to vote for the Warner-McCain-Graham alternative to the president's bill. Frist could decide to use a procedural maneuver, known as filling the amendment tree, to prevent an up-or-down vote on the trio's proposal. Still, Frist would need 60 votes to choke off any potential filibuster of the president's plan — a tall order.

While it is always possible that Frist could decide to bring up one or both proposals with no restrictions on amendments, giving opponents an opportunity to present their alternatives, the more likely scenario is one in which Frist tries to restrict the debate in an attempt to minimize the damage that already has been done to a national security message that was supposed to be the Republicans' ace in the hole going into the Nov. 7 elections. Additionally, adding structure and limits to the debate could also serve to head-off the potential of Democratic attempts to hijack the proceedings with other issues.

Of course, Frist also could decide to punt the issue into next week or beyond if talks between the warring parties appear to be bearing fruit.

"Ideally, we'd still like to see a compromise," said Frist spokeswoman Amy Call, who said that "as long as things are moving forward," Frist is unlikely to make any decisions about floor proceedings.

GOP sources indicated that little progress was expected given the heightened rhetoric emanating from the Bush administration over the weekend.

In fact, Warner spokesman John Ullyot said Warner and the White House had no scheduled meetings on the detainee issue.

"He remains interested in talking with the administration, but nothing is scheduled right now," Ullyot said. Still, Ullyot noted that the "Senators on the committee feel very strongly about their position."

Senate Democrats, meanwhile, will continue to focus heavily on national security issues as well, with the minority scheduled to do press events today and Wednesday focused on the issue.

Talking points distributed to Democratic offices for this week largely reflect the party's months-long effort to portray the GOP as ineffective on national security and to tar House and Senate Republicans with Bush's low approval ratings.

Democrats argued they have established a strong footing in the minds of the public on national security issues over the past several months and said the issue will remain a central component of their messaging work even as lawmakers turn to more domestic concerns as the election approaches.

Attorney General Gonzales Defends Interrogation Methods, Says Geneva Conventions Too Vague (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Monday defended the Bush administration's strategy for interrogating terror suspects, calling it legal and critical to "continue gathering information about our enemies."

In a speech, Gonzales said CIA interrogators lack guidance on how to comply with the international Geneva Conventions, saying the provisions banning "humiliating and degrading treatment" and "outrages upon personal dignity" are too vague.

"Such phrases standing alone mean different things to Americans," he said at a conference on citizenship. "Think of the differences in interpretation that will exist between differing legal systems and cultures of the nations of the world."

"Seeking this clarity is important to our efforts to continue gathering information about our enemies," Gonzales said. "In all that we do in the war on terror, we seek to promote the rule of law and protect freedom."

Trying to end a protest by dissident Senate Republicans, the White House says it's confident it can reach a compromise on proposed rules for interrogating terror suspects.

But neither side is saying how an agreement can be achieved on whether to allow highly controversial methods by the CIA, such as electric shock, forced nakedness and waterboarding, in which a subject is made to think he is drowning. The Bush administration says those techniques have foiled terror plots. Opponents say they verge on torture.

The full Senate was expected to take up the issue as early as this week.

"The reason we have this program is these kind of hard-core terrorists who are most likely to have information to allow us to protect America are trained in counterinterrogation techniques," Stephen Hadley, President Bush's national security adviser, said Sunday.

"It was only when they went into this CIA program we were able to get information," he said. "This is not torture. This is not a program out of control. This is a program that is conducted pursuant to law."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of the Republicans not satisfied with the White House proposal, said he was committed to working out a deal but insisted that the United States must hold the moral high ground.

"They are people that when they are in our custody, they deserve nothing except the fundamental rights that all prisoners have under the Geneva Conventions," said McCain, a former prisoner of war. "We should not do things which would be condemned by everyone in the world."

First lady Laura Bush, in New York for an international literacy conference, said Monday she was confident that her husband and congressional Republicans would "come to some consensus" on the legislation. Bush was not upset, she said, when McCain and two other Senate Republicans broke with the administration last week over the detainee interrogation bill.

"He knows these men very well, obviously," Mrs. Bush said in an interview on NBC's "Today" show. "He knows what their issues are... Obviously he thinks it's very important to be able to interrogate in a way that's not demeaning."

The Supreme Court in June ruled the Geneva Conventions on the rights of wartime detainees should apply to suspected terrorists in CIA custody. The decision froze the interrogations and led the Bush administration to turn over the last 14 prisoners in CIA custody to military officials at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

At issue is Common Article 3 of the conventions, which ban in part inhuman treatment of captives as well as "outrages upon personal dignity."

Legal experts say that under international law, the provision would likely bar the CIA's more aggressive tactics. Bush contends it is too vague. He wants a narrower interpretation that would permit the program to continue and shield CIA interrogators from lawsuits.

McCain, as well as Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner, R-Va., and Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., say that would redefine the broader legal understanding of the conventions in the international community.

Their Senate proposal is silent as to what types of CIA tactics might be permissible under the broader conception of Article 3.

On Sunday, Bush's national intelligence director, John Negroponte, said that after the Supreme Court ruling, the aggressive interrogation program has had "precious little activity of that kind for a number of months now" because of questions about its legality.

Hadley declined to say what specific techniques, such as waterboarding or prolonged sleep deprivation, would likely be considered illegal if Congress doesn't pass Bush's proposal.

But he said the CIA program would suffer and be shut down if interrogators do not have guidance. He said the White House is working on a compromise that "achieves Senator McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change" the Geneva Conventions.

Hadley appeared on ABC's "This Week," CBS' "Face the Nation" and CNN's "Late Edition." Negroponte was on "Fox News Sunday," McCain on ABC and Graham on CBS.

Support U.S. Intelligence (USAT)

One critical way to help prevent terrorist attacks against Americans is interrogating key al-Qaeda leaders and operatives. The Bush administration has proposed a bill that would allow the CIA to conduct such interrogations — interrogations that have helped stop terrorist attacks — in a way that gives our personnel clear legal standards.

The simple question, therefore, is whether we will allow intelligence professionals on the front lines to keep using a tool that has saved American lives.

The current debate centers on legal questions concerning Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. In June, the Supreme Court determined that Common Article 3 applies to al-Qaeda terrorists.

The administration is committed to complying with the law of the land, and we must ensure our laws provide clarity on the vague standards contained in Common Article 3, such as "outrages upon personal dignity." Thus, the president has asked that Congress clarify our treaty obligations just as it has done on many other occasions. Absent such clarification, our intelligence professionals would be subject to unpredictable legal interpretations, including those of foreign courts. This vital program cannot go forward unless the law is clarified.

The administration's proposal would not redefine Common Article 3. It would provide clarity by mirroring language written by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and passed by Congress less than a year ago as part of the Detainee Treatment Act.

Under this approach, our intelligence professionals would know what they can and can't do because the standard would be one that is well established in U.S. law as determined by U.S. courts.

Clarifying our laws would not jeopardize our troops. Lawful combatants such as U.S. soldiers would continue to be fully protected by all aspects of the Geneva Conventions. Nothing in the administration's proposal in any way would undercut these fundamental protections. The issue we are debating is the standard of treatment for unlawful combatants — those who hide among civilian populations and plot attacks on innocents.

The CIA needs to interrogate al-Qaeda operatives to gather intelligence where traditional questioning tactics do not work. The program has in the past helped us foil several publicly disclosed plots, including attacks on tall buildings in the USA, a U.S. Marine base in East Africa, the American consulate in Pakistan and Britain's Heathrow Airport.

Once intelligence has been obtained, terrorists can be brought to justice. The administration's proposal would provide for the trial of terrorists in a way that ensures that sensitive intelligence sources and methods — which must remain secret to be effective against other terrorists in the future — are not provided to the terrorists themselves.

As President Bush reminded the nation, it is "vital that our folks on the front line have the tools necessary to protect the American people." We are prepared to work with Congress to ensure this remains the case.

Bush Detainee Plan Adds To World Doubts Of U.S., Powell Says (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Ex-Secretary of State Defends Conventions

Former secretary of state Colin L. Powell said yesterday that he decided to publicly oppose the Bush administration's proposed rules for the treatment of terrorism suspects in part because the plan would add to growing doubts about whether the United States adheres to its own moral code.

"If you just look at how we are perceived in the world and the kind of criticism we have taken over Guantanamo, Abu Ghraib and renditions," Powell said in an interview, "whether we believe it or not, people are now starting to question whether we're following our own high standards."

Powell, elaborating on a position first expressed last week in a letter to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), also argued that the administration's plan to "clarify" U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions would set a precedent for other nations that would endanger U.S. troops.

"Suppose North Korea or somebody else wants to redefine or 'clarify' " Geneva Conventions provisions prohibiting "outrages against personal dignity" and "humiliating and degrading treatment" of prisoners, he said.

Powell's opposition marks a rare public breach with the administration he left 20 months ago. As secretary of state, he repeatedly clashed privately with Vice President Cheney and others who had more hard-line foreign policy views. But since leaving office he has declined nearly all opportunities to publicly criticize even those policies he opposed internally.

Powell has said he regrets that the Iraq invasion was launched on the basis of false intelligence about Saddam Hussein's weapons programs and Hussein's relationship with al-Qaeda, information that he vouched for in an address before a hostile United Nations. He has also said that he believes the administration should have sent more troops to invade Iraq and provided a better postwar plan.

Powell also allowed his name to be identified among those opposed to Bush's nomination of his former State Department subordinate, John R. Bolton, as Washington's U.N. ambassador.

But he has reserved his strongest opposition for administration efforts to preserve controversial methods for interrogating terrorism suspects, techniques that others have defined as torture. While it is not clear exactly what techniques the White House wishes to keep, sources have said those previously used include nakedness, prolonged sensory assault and deprivation, the imposition of "stress" positions, and water submersion to the verge of drowning. Bush has said none of those amounts to torture.

Powell strenuously objected to Bush's February 2002 decision that the United States was not obliged to adhere to Geneva Conventions rules in its treatment of captured al-Qaeda and Taliban prisoners. Subsequent scandals over military treatment of prisoners at the U.S. facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and at Abu Ghraib in Iraq, and over the CIA's establishment of secret prisons abroad, further cemented his views that the decision was unnecessary in terms of prisoner interrogation and is harmful to the armed forces.

Last fall, over administration opposition, Powell publicly supported McCain's successful effort to ensure that restrictions in the Army Field Manual outlawing torture be adopted as the definitive guidance for military treatment of detainees. His position owed as much to his 35 years as an Army officer as to his tenure as the nation's chief diplomat.

The current dispute is over how the provisions of Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions against inhumane and degrading treatment bind the CIA and other non-military interrogators.

The administration has argued that the article is too vague and ties the CIA's hands in extracting crucial information from terrorists. Last week, Powell joined dozens of other retired military officers and former government officials in objecting to proposed administration legislation "clarifying" the article to ensure that certain unspecified interrogation methods can continue.

In his letter to McCain, Powell said the effort to "redefine" the article was "inconsistent" with his previous opposition to the use of torture. "The world," he wrote, "is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." On Friday, the Senate Armed Services Committee voted 15 to 9 to endorse an alternative bill offered by McCain, Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.).

Bush aides said they appreciated that Powell did not make the matter personal or engage in cutting rhetoric. But the White House did not hesitate to push back strongly, even at the risk of further alienating Powell. White House spokesman Tony Snow said last Thursday that Powell was "confused" about the administration's proposal. The president followed up the next day with a stern reaction at a Rose Garden news conference, when he reinterpreted Powell's position to suggest that the former secretary of state was equating U.S. tactics to those of terrorists.

Powell declined yesterday to address Bush's comments. "To say that we want to modify, clarify or redefine Common Article 3, which has not been modified for the 57 years of its history, I think adds to the doubt" about U.S. morality, he said. "Plus I believe that the legitimate concerns that the administration has can be dealt with in other ways."

Yesterday, another prominent Republican weighed in. In a statement released by his office in California, former secretary of state George P. Shultz said he believes that a compromise can be reached that "leaves the Geneva Convention alone and achieves the specificity that the administration wants."

Meanwhile, former president Jimmy Carter, a leading voice on human rights, said yesterday that he is "filled with admiration" for McCain, Powell and others who have joined in opposition.

Experts Say Bush's Goal In Terrorism Bill Is Latitude For Interrogators' Methods (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 18 — In his showdown with rebellious Senate Republicans over bills to bring terrorism suspects to trial, President Bush has repeatedly called for clarity in the rules for what he calls "alternative interrogation techniques" used by the Central Intelligence Agency.

What Mr. Bush really wants, legal experts on both sides of the debate say, is latitude so the interrogators can use methods that the military is barred from using under a recently issued Army field manual.

Despite his call for clarity, the president has been vague in talking about the alternatives, which have in the past included sleep deprivation, playing ear-splittingly loud music and waterboarding, which induces a feeling of drowning.

"They can't come out and say we want more leeway to rough these people up," said John Radsan, who was assistant general counsel for the intelligence agency from 2002 to 2004 and now teaches at the William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul. "That doesn't sell. So he says we need clarity. It doesn't play well to say we need to deprive them of sleep and play loud music."

On Monday, the Bush administration appeared to make the first stab at compromise, telling senators, including John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and who is leading the opposition to the president's plan, to expect a counterproposal.

White House officials would not release details of the administration's new proposal, except to say late Monday night that it involved the part of the Geneva Conventions known as Common Article 3.

At the same time, the House decided to postpone its vote on Mr. Bush's proposal until at least next week. That was a setback for the White House, which had been counting on the House to pass the measure this week, a step that it hoped would prod the Senate into action before lawmakers break at the end of the month for the midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0065475

The Supreme Court ruled in June that Common Article 3, which legal experts agree would prohibit the intelligence agency's techniques, applies to the treatment of terrorism suspects.

So the White House wants Congress to pass measures redefining Article 3 to say it bars "cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment," language that the administration borrowed from a bill written by Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who was tortured while a prisoner in the Vietnam War.

"The president is advocating a standard that prohibits cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment, a standard based on years of U.S. Court decisions interpreting the constitutional prohibitions on cruel and unusual punishment that protect U.S. citizens in custody," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said Monday in a speech at a conference on citizenship. "Seeking this clarity is important to our efforts to continue gathering information about our enemies."

Some Senate Republicans, including Mr. Warner and Mr. McCain, are pushing back. They say redefining Article 3 would send a message that the United States was not serious about living up to the Geneva Conventions, a view shared by former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, and are pressing an alternative bill.

Part of the dispute revolves around protection for military and intelligence agency interrogators. The White House says Article 3 is too vague and leaves interrogators open to being sued.

The senators do not disagree. But they propose to clarify Article 3 by amending the War Crimes Act to specify exactly what abuses of the article constitute war crimes.

Jeffrey H. Smith, a general counsel for the intelligence agency under President Bill Clinton, said that the language in the Senate bill would not bar the controversial techniques, but that the White House bill appeared to give the agency greater latitude.

"The senators seem to be prepared to allow some techniques, but not nearly as many as the administration wants," Mr. Smith said.

Since his speech nearly two weeks ago announcing that he was transferring 14 prominent terrorism suspects, including the reported mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, to the detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, Mr. Bush has said the previously secret program under which they were interrogated was invaluable in thwarting terrorism plots.

The president has said he will have no choice but to stop the program if Congress does not pass his bill.

The legislation does not explicitly state what the permissible techniques are, and the president and White House officials, including Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the intelligence agency, have steadfastly refused to discuss them.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, has been repeatedly asked about waterboarding, for example, and whether Mr. Bush has ruled it out.

"I'm not going to go into what's ruled in and ruled out," Mr. Snow told reporters last week, saying to do so would tip the interrogators' hand with suspects.

In a setback for the White House, the top uniformed lawyer for the Army has now told Mr. Warner that he prefers the Senate approach. The lawyer, Maj. Gen. Scott C. Black, joined military lawyers last week in a letter saying he did not object to the administration bill.

But on Friday, General Black sent a second letter to Mr. Warner in which he said that the Senate bill was preferable and that "further redefinition of Common Article 3 is unnecessary and could be seen as a weakening of our treaty obligations."

Whether the two sides can reach an agreement is unclear. Mr. Warner and another rebelling Republican senator, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, spoke to reporters late Monday, saying the two sides were exchanging, in Mr. Warner's words, "ideas and words here and there."

Mr. Graham said the real work toward compromise started on Sunday, after appearances on Sunday by senators and administration officials on televised news and interview programs.

Mr. Graham said, "Everybody felt like what we were telling each other is: 'We share the same goals. We have a different way of achieving them. Let's see if we can write the legislation to meet our goals.' "

Torture Is Torture (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Bush's 'Program' Disgraces All Americans

I wish I could turn to cheerier matters, but I just can't get past this torture issue -- the fact that George W. Bush, the president of the United States of America, persists in demanding that Congress give him the right to torture anyone he considers a "high-value" terrorist suspect. The president of the United States. Interrogation by torture. This just can't be happening.

It's past time to stop mincing words. The Decider, or maybe we should now call him the Inquisitor, sticks to anodyne euphemisms. He speaks of "alternative" questioning techniques, and his umbrella term for the whole shop of horrors is "the program." Of course, he won't fully detail the methods that were used in the secret CIA prisons -- and who knows where else? -- but various sources have said they have included not just the infamous "waterboarding," which the administration apparently will reluctantly forswear, but also sleep deprivation, exposure to cold, bombardment with ear-splitting noise and other assaults that cause not just mental duress but physical agony. That is torture, and to call it anything else is a lie.

It is not possible for our elected representatives to hold any sort of honorable "debate" over torture. Bush says he is waging a "struggle for civilization," but civilized nations do not debate slavery or genocide, and they don't debate torture, either. This spectacle insults and dishonors every American.

There is one ray of encouragement: the crystal-clear evidence that the men and women of our armed forces want no part of torturing anybody. The members of the Republican resistance -- Sens. John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina -- have impeccable Pentagon connections and are not operating in a vacuum. Bush admitted in his news conference Friday that he had spoken to "the professionals" and that they would not carry out "the program" unless Congress specifically told them to.

In support of its torture bill, all the White House could manage to squeeze out of five top Pentagon lawyers was a four-sentence letter of non-objection that had all the enthusiasm of a hostage tape.

Colin Powell's strongly worded rejection of torture should have embarrassed and chastened the White House, but this is a president who refuses to listen to critics of his "war on terrorism" -- even critics who helped design and lead it.

There should be no need to spell out the practical reasons against torture, but, for the record, they are legion. As Powell and others have argued, if the United States unilaterally reinterprets Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions to permit torture, potential adversaries in future conflicts will feel justified in doing the same thing. Does the president want some captured pilot to be subjected to the tortures applied in the CIA prisons?

And, as has been pointed out by experts, torture works -- far too well. Torture victims will tell what they know, and when their knowledge is exhausted they will tell their torturers what they want to hear, even if they have to invent conspiracies. The president says that torturing al-Qaeda kingpins foiled serious plots against America, but how do we know those plots were real? How can we be sure that some of the detainees at Guantanamo aren't shopkeepers or taxi drivers who were snatched because Khalid Sheik Mohammed ran out of real terrorists to implicate and began naming acquaintances so he wouldn't get waterboarded again?

But we shouldn't have to talk about the practicalities of torture, because the real question is moral: What kind of nation are we? What kind of people are we?

Bush's view of the world is based on the idea of American exceptionalism: that this country is unique, that its ideas and values are not just worthy or admirable but superior to any others. This attitude annoys the rest of the world to no end -- a lot of other countries think they're pretty special, too -- but accept for the moment that the American system is in fact the best of all systems and that the great experiment begun by the Founding Fathers was a signal event in the history of mankind. Accept, if you will, Bush's view that the United States is steadfastly blessed by a loving God.

What do you imagine God might think about torture, Mr. President?

FBI Agent: Informant Was Convicted In DMV Fraud Case (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, September 19, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) _ The informant who posed as an arms dealer in the FBI sting that led to terrorism charges against two Albany Muslims was arrested in 2001 for helping immigrants fraudulently obtain drivers' licenses, an FBI agent testified Monday.

"He was not truthful at all," special agent Timothy Coll acknowledged of Shahed Hussain in the document fraud. Coll arrested the Pakistani emigre, whom he called "Malik" and who subsequently agreed to cooperate with the FBI.

He is central to the case against Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain, both accused of laundering $50,000 that Malik claimed came from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile to terrorists. Defense lawyers say he lied to the FBI about their clients, who thought he was joking about a terrorist plot.

He is expected to testify later this week, and his credibility is a key question for jurors. Coll testified Monday that Malik's cooperation agreement required him to be truthful from the time he signed it.

Malik first helped the FBI with the document case, which resulted in his identifying two state Department of Motor Vehicles employees he bribed in Albany and the suspension of 80 drivers' licenses, Coll said.

Under his guilty plea in 2003 to one federal charge of attempted unlawful transfer of an identification document, he could face up to 15 years in prison and a $250,000 fine at sentencing Oct. 27, court papers show. As a non-citizen, he could also face deportation.

A contract translator for the DMV in 2001, Malik had answered the written permit tests for a fee, and in one case arranged for a DMV clerk to issue an interim license under a false name, Coll said. He received $300 to $500 for the usual permit/license package, depending on factors like the number of times a road test applicant hit the curb.

"They hit the curb often," Coll said, and several people in the courtroom laughed.

Coll also acknowledged under cross-examination by defense attorney Kent Sprotbery that Malik has received almost $37,000 for relocation, office rent and cell phone expenses from the FBI in the two cases. Coll has not yet finished his reports to the sentencing judge and immigration officials about the informant's help, he said.

The FBI agent said Malik's "story" to Aref and Hossain was that he was doing a "substantial" import-export business, while in fact he owned a gas station near the Albany office of the DMV and had a small import-export business.

Coll acknowledged that Malik's first mention of a part-time business as an arms dealer came up with Hossain and Aref only later. He also said more than 90 percent of the three men's meetings were taped, though some were not, that many parts had to be translated, and he sometimes had to listen several times to decipher the English.

Aref, 36, and Hossain, 51, maintain their transaction was a simple loan from Malik to Hossain, common under Islamic law and custom, where Aref acted as witness and insisted on writing receipts.

Details About Informant In Aref And Hossain Trial (CAPN9)

Capital News 9, September 19, 2006

A big day for the defense, as it tried to poke holes in the investigation that led to Mohammed Hossain and Yassin Aref facing terrorism-related charges of money laundering.

The FBI agent who oversaw the sting operation, Timothy Coll, testified about how credible the informant, known as "Malik," was as he tried to act as an arms importer.

Defense teams spent hours pointing out that "Malik" had not only been arrested for fraud, but that the F-B-I agent had to rely on some of the information which he provided.

Coll admitted Malik's reports had some inconsistencies, and also said the informant made decent money for cooperating with the government. Malik's cell phone bills were also covered, $1,900 worth of charges that included his own personal usage.

Jurors hear more testimony

Testimony continued Monday in the trial of two Albany mosque leaders accused of supporting terrorism.

The informant was tasked with catching the defendants laundering money for the purchase of a missile. The defense has tried to show that he was not very clear in his dealings with Aref and Hossain. In court today, jurors saw a video clip from January 2, 2004 that featured the following conversation:

Informant: This is the part of the missile that I showed you.

Hossain: Oh yeah?

Informant: So as soon as it comes. I'll give you...this is $5,000. Over the next couple of weeks, I'll get you more money.

Hossain: I don't need that all...just so I can pay the bills.

During that conversation, Malik held up a trigger for the fake missile system. But Aref, who was also sitting there, may never have seen it, because he was counting the money at the time. Did both defendants know the sting operation, if real, would have resulted in the sale of a missile to terrorists? In another video clip dated December 5, 2003, Malik told Hossain:

Informant: Whatever I'm doing, I'm not doing anything wrong nor am I breaking any law. I do not sell any weapons that could cause a man to be killed.

Hossain: This is good. What you're saying now is good.

All of this has left the jury with some very complicated questions, including some over the credibility of the government's cooperating witness.

Plots Traced To Prison (NSDY)

Concern grows over signs that recent terror plans were hatched among converts to Islam doing hard time

WASHINGTON - The terror plots unfolded on different sides of the Atlantic, with different targets and casts of characters. But they had one thing in common: They traced back to jailhouse conversions to radical Islam.

The four young men indicted in California last summer in connection with an alleged plot to attack National Guard facilities, the Israeli consulate and several synagogues around Los Angeles, had hatched the plan in New Folsom State Prison outside Sacramento.

Muktar Said Ibrahim, who had converted to Islam in a British prison, was also arrested last summer, in connection with a bomb left on a London bus.

Convicted shoe-bomber Richard Reid, who had once been held in the same youth facility as Ibrahim and who was also a jailhouse convert, attempted to blow up an American Airlines flight from Paris to Miami in December 2001.

With concerns about homegrown terrorism mounting, a panel of homeland security experts planned today to warn of the potential threat posed by prison converts to radical Islam, and ask Congress to set up a commission to investigate the matter. Two congressional committees are holding hearings on the issue this week.

"Prisoner radicalization is a potentially significant threat to U.S. national security," said the head of the panel, Frank Cilluffo, director of the Homeland Secu- rity Policy Institute at George Washington University in Washington, D.C. "The U.S., with its large prison population, is at risk of facing the sort of homegrown terrorism currently plaguing other countries."

Most troubling, Cilluffo said, is "we don't know what we don't know. We need to be proactive. We need to get people in there who can be part of the solution. ... We don't want to be doing a report after an attack."

An estimated 6 percent of 150,000 federal prison inmates are Muslim. No nationwide figures on Muslims in state prisons exist, but experts say the largest number are in New York, where they make up about 18 percent of 63,700 state inmates.

The chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee said he welcomed the group's proposal. "It's a very real problem in California and New York," said Rep. Peter King (R-Seaford). "I know of several radical mosques in New York that hire these guys after they get out of prison." He did not name the mosques.

Civil rights advocate Ibrahim Hooper of the Council on American-Islamic Relations said his group would support such a probe "as long as it's examined by neutral parties who aren't basing their judgments on stereotypes."

For decades, Islam has been a regular part of prison culture, with tens of thousands of Muslims practicing their faith behind bars. But since the 2002 arrest of Jose Padilla, a felon and American Muslim convert who authorities say planned a "dirty bomb" after he left jail, officials have warned that prisons are a "fertile ground for extremists" in the words of FBI Director Robert Mueller.

A report prepared by Cilluffo's group and The Critical Incident Analysis Group at the University of Virginia School of Medicine, acknowledges that the problem is not new, or unique to Islam. Right-wing groups connected with "Christian Identity" ideology, including Posse Comitatus and Aryan Nation, have long existed in prisons.

Most prison converts are not potential extremists, the report notes. But it said that some gangs have adopted a "jailhouse Islam," that incorporates "cut-and-paste versions of Islam" with gang loyalty and violence. And it stressed that even "a single radicalized inmate can be a significant threat."

It quotes California officials as saying that every investigation into radical prison groups had uncovered new leads, "but they simply do not have enough investigators to follow every case of radicalization."

The report also cited indications that terrorist groups are increasingly exploiting drug trafficking and other illegal activities to finance their operations. The attack on the Madrid rail system, for instance, involved cooperation between terrorists and gangs. And the alleged California plot was uncovered after police made arrests in a series of gas station robberies orchestrated to help finance the attacks.

Canadians Fault U.S. For Its Role In Torture Case (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

OTTAWA, Sept. 18 — A government commission on Monday exonerated a Canadian computer engineer of any ties to terrorism and issued a scathing report that faulted Canada and the United States for his deportation four years ago to Syria, where he was imprisoned and tortured.

The report on the engineer, Maher Arar, said American officials had apparently acted on inaccurate information from Canadian investigators and then misled Canadian authorities about their plans for Mr. Arar before transporting him to Syria.

“I am able to say categorically that there is no evidence to indicate that Mr. Arar has committed any offense or that his activities constituted a threat to the security of Canada,” Justice Dennis R. O’Connor, head of the commission, said at a news conference.

The report’s findings could reverberate heavily through the leadership of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which handled the initial intelligence on Mr. Arar that led security officials in both Canada and the United States to assume he was a suspected Al Qaeda terrorist.

The report’s criticisms and recommendations are aimed primarily at Canada’s own government and activities, rather than the United States government, which refused to cooperate in the inquiry. But its conclusions about a case that had emerged as one of the most infamous examples of rendition — the transfer of terrorism suspects to other nations for interrogation — draw new attention to the Bush administration’s handling of detainees. And it comes as the White House and Congress are contesting legislation that would set standards for the treatment and interrogation of prisoners.

“The American authorities who handled Mr. Arar’s case treated Mr. Arar in a most regrettable fashion,” Justice O’Connor wrote in a three-volume report, not all of which was made public. “They removed him to Syria against his wishes and in the face of his statements that he would be tortured if sent there. Moreover, they dealt with Canadian officials involved with Mr. Arar’s case in a less than forthcoming manner.”

A spokesman for the United States Justice Department, Charles Miller, and a White House spokesman traveling with President Bush in New York said officials had not seen the report and could not comment.

Canada’s prime minister, Stephen Harper, said his government planned to act on the report but offered no details. “Probably in the few weeks to come we’ll be able to give you more details on that,’’ he told reporters. The Syrian-born Mr. Arar was seized on Sept. 26, 2002, after he landed at Kennedy Airport in New York on his way home from a holiday in Tunisia. On Oct. 8, he was flown to Jordan in an American government plane and taken overland to Syria, where he says he was held for 10 months in a tiny cell and beaten repeatedly with a metal cable. He was freed in October 2003, after Syrian officials concluded that he had no connection to terrorism and returned him to Canada.

Mr. Arar’s case attracted considerable attention in Canada, where critics viewed it as an example of the excesses of the campaign against terror that followed the Sept. 11 attacks. The practice of rendition has caused an outcry from human rights organizations as “outsourcing torture,” because suspects often have been taken to countries where brutal treatment of prisoners is routine.

The commission supports that view, describing a Mounted Police force that was ill-prepared to assume the intelligence duties assigned to it after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Mr. Arar, speaking at a news conference, praised the findings.

"Today Justice O'Connor has cleared my name and restored my reputation," said Mr. Arar, who has been unemployed since his return to Canada in 2003. "I call on the government of Canada to accept the findings of this report and hold these people responsible."

His lawyer, Marlys Edwardh, said the report affirmed that Mr. Arar was deported and tortured because of "a breathtakingly incompetent investigation."

The commission found that Mr. Arar first came to police attention on Oct. 12, 2001, when he met with Abdullah Almalki, a man already under surveillance by a newly established Mounted Police intelligence unit known as Project A-O Canada. Mr. Arar has said in interviews that the meeting at Mango's Cafe in Ottawa, and a subsequent 20-minute conversation outside the restaurant, was mostly about finding inexpensive ink jet printer cartridges.

The meeting set off a chain of actions by the police.

Investigators obtained a copy of Mr. Arar's rental lease. After finding Mr. Almalki listed as an emergency contact, they stepped up their investigation of Mr. Arar.

At the end of that month, the police asked customs officials to include Mr. Arar and his wife on a "terrorist lookout" list, which would subject them to more intensive question when re-entering Canada.

However, the commission found that the designation should have only been applied to people who are members or associates of terrorist networks. Neither the police nor customs had any such evidence of that concerning Mr. Arar or his wife, an economist.

From there, the Mounted Police asked that the couple be included in a database that alerts United States border officers to suspect individuals. The police described Mr. Arar and his wife as, the report said, "Islamic extremists suspected of being linked to the al Qaeda movement."

The commission said that all who testified before it accepted that the description was false.

According to the inquiry's finding, the Mounted Police gave the F.B.I. and other American authorities material from Project A-O Canada, which included suggestions that Mr. Arar had visited Washington around Sept. 11 and had refused to cooperate with the Canadian police. The handover of the data violated the force's own guidelines, but was justified on the basis that such rules no longer applied after 2001.

In July 2002, the Mounted Police learned that Mr. Arar and his family were in Tunisia, and incorrectly concluded that they had left Canada permanently.

On Sept. 26, 2002, the F.B.I. called Project A-O and told the Canadian police that Mr. Arar was scheduled to arrive in about one hour from Zurich. The F.B.I. also said it planned to question Mr. Arar and then send him back to Switzerland. Responding to a fax from the F.B.I., the Mounted Police provided the American investigators with a list of questions for Mr. Arar. Like the other information, it included many false claims about Mr. Arar, the commission found.

The Canadian police "had no idea of what would eventually transpire,'' the commission said. "It did not occur to them that the American authorities were contemplating sending Mr. Arar to Syria."

While the F.B.I. and the Mounted Police kept up their communications about Mr. Arar, Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs was not told about his detention for almost three days. Its officials, acting on calls from worried relatives, had been trying to find him. Similarly, American officials denied Mr. Arar's requests to speak with the Canadian Consulate in New York, a violation of international agreements.

Evidence presented to the commission, said Paul J. J. Cavalluzzo, its lead counsel, showed that the F.B.I. continued to keep its Canadian counterparts in the dark even while an American jet was carrying Mr. Arar to Jordan.

The panel found that American officials "believed — quite correctly — that, if informed, the Canadians would have serious concerns about the plan to remove Mr. Arar to Syria."

Mr. Arar arrived in Syria on Oct. 9, 2002, and was imprisoned there until Oct. 5, 2003. It took Canadian officials, however, until Oct. 21 to locate him in Syria. The commission concludes that Syrian officials at first denied knowing Mr. Arar's whereabouts to hide the fact that he was being tortured. It says that, among other things, he was beaten with a shredded electrical cable until he was disoriented.

American officials have not discussed the case publicly. But in an interview last year, a former official said on condition of anonymity that the decision to send Mr. Arar to Syria had been based chiefly on the desire to get more information about him and the threat he might pose. The official said Canada did not intend to hold him if he returned home.

Mr. Arar said he appealed a recent decision by a federal judge in New York dismissing the suit he brought against the United States. The report recommends that the Canadian government, which is also being sued by Mr. Arar, offer him compensation and possibly a job.

Mr. Arar recently moved to Kamloops, British Columbia, where his wife found a teaching position.

Canadian Was Falsely Accused, Panel Says (WP)

Muslim Held by U.S. Was Sent to Syria For Interrogation

TORONTO, Sept. 18 -- Canadian intelligence officials passed false warnings and bad information to American agents about a Muslim Canadian citizen, after which U.S. authorities secretly whisked him to Syria, where he was tortured, a judicial report found Monday.

The report, released in Ottawa, was the result of a 2 1/2-year inquiry that represented one of the first public investigations into mistakes made as part of the United States' "extraordinary rendition" program, which has secretly spirited suspects to foreign countries for interrogation by often brutal methods.

The inquiry, which focused on the Canadian intelligence services, found that agents who were under pressure to find terrorists after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, falsely labeled an Ottawa computer consultant, Maher Arar, as a dangerous radical. They asked U.S. authorities to put him and his wife, a university economist, on the al-Qaeda "watchlist," without justification, the report said.

Arar was also listed as "an Islamic extremist individual" who was in the Washington area on Sept. 11. The report concluded that he had no involvement in Islamic extremism and was on business in San Diego that day, said the head of the inquiry commission, Ontario Justice Dennis O'Connor.

Arar, now 36, was detained by U.S. authorities as he changed planes in New York on Sept. 26, 2002. He was held for questioning for 12 days, then flown by jet to Jordan and driven to Syria. He was beaten, forced to confess to having trained in Afghanistan -- where he never has been -- and then kept in a coffin-size dungeon for 10 months before he was released, the Canadian inquiry commission found.

O'Connor concluded that "categorically there is no evidence" that Arar did anything wrong or was a security threat.

Although the report centered on Canadian actions, the counsel for the commission, Paul Cavalluzzo, said the results show that the U.S. practice of renditions "ought to be reviewed."

"This is really the first report in the Western world that has had access to all of the government documents we wanted and saw the practice of extraordinary rendition in full color," he said in an interview from Ottawa. "The ramifications were that an innocent Canadian was tortured, his life was put upside down, and it set him back years and years."

Arar, who came to Canada from Syria when he was 17, said in Ottawa that he was thankful that he had been vindicated. He expressed surprise and anger at learning Monday that Canadian authorities also had asked U.S. authorities to put his wife on the al-Qaeda watchlist.

"Today Justice O'Connor has cleared my name and restored my reputation," he said at a news conference. He said the individual Canadian officials should be held accountable: "Justice requires no less."

O'Connor said it was beyond his mandate to recommend discipline for any individual.

"He really is a victim of authorities in three governments, as well as being an innocent man," Irwin Cotler, a member of parliament from the Liberal Party, said after the report was issued.

Stockwell Day, the federal government's public safety minister, said the treatment of Arar was "regrettable. We hope, with any future situations, never to see this happen again."

Since Sept. 11, the CIA, working with other intelligence agencies, has captured an estimated 3,000 people in its effort to dismantle terrorist networks. Many of them have been secretly taken by "extraordinary rendition" to other countries, hidden from U.S. legal requirements and often subject to torture.

Those renditions are often carried out by CIA agents dressed head to toe in black, wearing masks, who blindfold their subjects and dress them in black. The practice is generating increased opposition by other countries; Italy is seeking to prosecute CIA officers who allegedly abducted a Muslim cleric in Milan in February 2003, and German prosecutors are investigating the CIA's activities in their country.

Although details of the renditions and the destinations of those held are secret, President Bush has confirmed the existence of CIA-run prisons throughout the world. Some of the subjects of renditions have been held in those prisons.

O'Connor also recommended that the government review the case of three other Muslim Canadian citizens, who were detained when they traveled through Syria, to determine what role Canadian authorities played in their imprisonment.

But it was the case of Arar, a reserved, soft-spoken father of two, that created outrage in Canada after he returned in 2003 and said he wanted the public to know what had happened to him.

The report said agents of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police "overstated" Arar's importance in the broad investigation they began of potential Canadian suspects after Sept. 11.

Canadian police opened a file on Arar after seeing him talking to two other Muslim Canadians they were watching, authorities have acknowledged. Arar insisted the men were casual acquaintances in the small Muslim community in Montreal, where he lived before moving to British Columbia.

O'Connor said Monday that police agents told the Americans that Arar was "suspected of being linked to the al Qaeda movement." The judge concluded: "The RCMP had no basis for this description."

The Mounties also falsely claimed Arar had refused to be interviewed and had "suddenly" left for Tunisia. It listed him as a business associate of another man they called a "Bin Laden associate." Those descriptions were "either completely inaccurate" or overstated his casual connections, O'Connor said in an 822-page, three-volume report.

DOJ_NMG_0065481

That information "very likely" led to his rendition, the report said. U.S. officials refused to cooperate with the Canadian inquiry.

Cavalluzzo said the Canadian agents apparently operated without proper training. "The best one can say is that it was sheer incompetence. They did not appreciate the fact that the branding of someone as a 'target' or 'suspect' or 'Islamic extremist' to Americans in 2002 could lead to disastrous consequences."

After Arar was detained in New York, Canadian authorities apparently were unaware the Americans were preparing to send him to Syria, according to the commission finding.

The RCMP contact, Inspector Michel Cabana, "was under the impression that Mr. Arar would only be detained for a short time," O'Connor's report said. "In his view, Mr. Arar was being held in a country with many of the same values as Canada."

Arar filed a lawsuit in U.S. federal court, but the case was dismissed by a judge citing "national security" issues. Arar is also seeking compensation from the Canadian government.

Some crucial questions about the incident remain unanswered, at least publicly. Over the repeated objections of O'Connor, the federal government censored much of the testimony given during the proceedings as well as some of the final report. O'Connor's report said a federal court should be asked to decide whether to disclose some of the censored items.

Arar was not permitted to testify; the judge ruled it would be unfair to subject him to questioning based on secret information. He has testified before a European Parliament committee in Brussels.

Special correspondent Natalia Alexandrova contributed to this report.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FEMA Revamp Snubs Homeland Security Chief (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff was dealt a major blow by congressional negotiators' deal to overhaul the Federal Emergency Management Agency, in which lawmakers forced a major reorganization of the sprawling department and unraveled changes he had personally backed.

FEMA would be strengthened and become an independent entity within the Department of Homeland Security under the deal worked out late Friday night between Senate staff and representatives of several House committees. But DHS would be barred from changing FEMA's budget, personnel or structure, giving the agency the same protections currently provided to the U.S. Coast Guard and the Secret Service.

The deal, if approved, would authorize an annual 10% increase of FEMA's $2.4 billion budget for the next three years. It now moves to a House-Senate panel that is hammering out a $34.8 billion bill funding the Homeland Security department for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

Until now, Mr. Chertoff had the authority to move money, people and programs out of FEMA and 19 other agencies in the department to use elsewhere to meet an ever-changing terrorist threat. But critics said that funds taken from FEMA's budget undermined the agency's effectiveness and contributed to the bungled federal response to Hurricane Katrina last year.

Moreover, under the congressional deal, the FEMA administrator -- not the Homeland Security secretary -- would be the principal adviser to the president during an emergency. The structure is modeled after the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

DHS officials fiercely opposed it in part because it would do away with new units created by Mr. Chertoff last year as part of his much touted "Second Stage Review" to improve the department. Of particular concern: The pact would fold the Directorate for Preparedness, headed by DHS Undersecretary George Foresman, into FEMA. The directorate handles all first-responder and homeland-security grant programs and works with state, local and private-sector officials to identify threats and determine vulnerabilities of infrastructure to terrorist attack.

According to Senate negotiators, the deal dissolves the directorate, passing all of its programs -- except for the Office of Infrastructure Protection, the National Communications System and the National Cyber Security Division -- into FEMA.

They said Mr. Chertoff was free to recommend Mr. Foresman for FEMA administrator, or he could become a deputy administrator. Currently, R. David Paulison, a former Miami fire chief, is the FEMA director.

Many observers saw the deal as a setback for Mr. Chertoff, who has come under scrutiny for his handling of the department.

DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said, "We will continue to work with Congress toward a satisfactory outcome."

His ability to change the bill at this point may be severely limited. Congressional staffers from both parties say that with important midterm elections just weeks away no one wants to be accused of moving to undermine the nation's ability to handle a disaster and even White House officials have indicated that they won't oppose the bill.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D., Conn.), who along with Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine) drafted the legislation to overhaul FEMA, praised the deal, saying it will "reverse the department's misguided decision to separate those who are supposed to prepare for disasters from those who are supposed to respond to them."

House, Senate Near Agreement On Homeland-Security Budget (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House-Senate negotiators are nearing agreement on a homeland-security budget that includes $1.82 billion in emergency funds, blessed by the White House to burnish Republican credentials on border security before the fall elections.

Even with the infusion of funds, the $34.8 billion package falls short of what the Senate promised last week for port-security grants. But between $1 billion and $1.2 billion would be provided as a down payment toward fencing the U.S.-Mexico border and about $350 million of the emergency funds are expected to be split among Coast Guard procurement, new customs inspectors and X-ray equipment at ports of entry.

Republican leaders are determined to complete the homeland measure and a larger Pentagon appropriations bill before lawmakers go home at the end of next week to campaign. The defense and homeland bills fit into the Republican national-security theme this fall, and negotiators want to finish the talks this week.

Domestic agencies will have to wait until after the elections before their 2007 funding is resolved, but they will be affected by the defense talks now.

After failing to get a budget for fiscal 2007, which begins Oct. 1, because of disagreements over spending, the majority party and White House are using emergency funds -- counted outside appropriations caps -- to resolve their differences.

The proposed $375.4 billion Pentagon bill, for example, carries with it a "bridge fund" -- ostensibly to fund military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan but also allowing Republicans to borrow about $5.9 billion from President Bush's defense budget to offset cuts in domestic programs.

The House had set aside $50 billion for the bridge fund; the Senate added another $13.1 billion. Negotiators are expected to raise this to at least $70 billion. Access to emergency funds during wartime has made it easier for Republicans to disguise their divisions over domestic spending. But the bridge fund also reflects the stress felt by military services after more than three years in Iraq.

This is especially the case with the Army. To meet this month's payroll, for example, service commanders this summer proposed taking money from maintenance and procurement accounts, including hundreds of millions of dollars Congress had added in the spring to buy radios and trucks to reconstitute units.

The House Appropriations Committee resisted, forcing some changes. Democrats on the panel last week released a staff report detailing the need for more money for the service. In the partisan atmosphere now in Congress, Democrats have tried to make an issue of defense readiness, but the report itself is respected on both sides of the aisle given the history of the defense-appropriations panel.

Among major points, the report found that many Army combat and support units scheduled to deploy to Iraq will have less than the required one-year period for rest and retraining. The report also found that funding shortfalls have created backlogs at all the Army's depot maintenance locations, and 20% to 30% of Army equipment isn't in service, because it is either in transit or undergoing maintenance.

In testimony before Congress, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, argued for more money. The Democratic staff report cites specific cases of delays in maintenance at major facilities.

At Anniston Army Depot in Alabama, for example, the report estimated about 600 M1 tanks sit in disuse. At Red River Army Depot in Texas, 700 Bradley fighting vehicles and more than 450 trucks haven't been serviced.

The problem is often less one of capacity than lack of money to run shifts with the full work hours required. In this fiscal year, for example, the Anniston depot had plans for 7.2 million man-hours of work, the report says. But funding cuts by Congress, the Army and Defense Department limited workload levels to 6.3 million man-hours.

Congress Bustles With Busywork (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

With 10 days left before the scheduled Sept. 29 recess, Congress's much-trumpeted national security agenda is becalmed and awaiting a stiff wind to get it to port. This week, there doesn't even seem to be a gentle breeze on the horizon.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) had hoped to begin work on legislation authorizing military commissions to try terrorism suspects or a bill on President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program. But for the moment, the only bill on military trials that can pass the Senate is the one Bush opposes -- the bill drafted by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) and Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.).

The surveillance bill negotiated by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Vice President Cheney is ready for consideration, but with at least half a dozen Republicans expressing reservations, it may not have the votes for passage.

So while Frist tries to decide between the frying pan and the fire, the Senate will keep busy with consideration of the Oman Free Trade Agreement and the nomination of Alice S. Fisher to serve as assistant attorney general. If those items are dispensed with quickly, the Senate may have to be content with reauthorizing the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and Amtrak.

The situation in the House is only a tad brighter. House leaders had scheduled consideration of Bush's military trials bill for midweek. But the notoriously cantankerous chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), asked for time for his committee to consider it, and GOP leaders relented, pushing back a floor vote at least another week.

Instead, the centerpiece of the House's floor schedule will be a package of immigration and border security bills designed to demonstrate GOP toughness ahead of the election. Never mind that much of the legislation -- three bills in all -- already passed the House in December as part of a broad crackdown on illegal immigration.

The first bill would bolster the secretary of homeland security's authority to detain dangerous illegal immigrants and to clarify the authority of state and local enforcement officers to assist in the enforcement of federal immigration laws. Some police officials in border regions have expressed concern that by deputizing them in the hunt for undocumented workers, the law will jeopardize the relations they have established with immigrant communities on other law enforcement matters. But support in the House for putting the local cop on the immigration beat is overwhelming.

Another bill would streamline immigration litigation procedures. Republicans say it is needed to unclog courts bogged down with deportation appeals, but immigration and civil liberties groups say the measure would deny due process to some immigrants who are seeking political asylum.

Finally, the House will consider a bill requiring voters to prove citizenship before registering or re-registering to vote in a federal election. A coalition of groups -- including the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, the NAACP, and AARP -- is holding a conference call today to denounce what it says is legislation to create a national, government-issued identification card.

But GOP leaders are showing no qualms about such opposition. The spate of immigration-related legislation -- including last week's authorization of a 700-mile-long, double-layered fence on the U.S.-Mexican border -- is designed to appeal to the dispirited Republican base.

So, with less than two weeks to go before recess, prospects look bleak for the big pending bills. Aside from the national security battles that are dominating debate in both chambers, GOP leaders are punting all leftover business until after the November elections -- at the earliest.

The list includes most appropriations bills. House and Senate GOP leaders still hope to complete spending measures for the Defense and Homeland Security departments before adjourning, fearing that voters could punish them at the polls if they do not. But a veterans spending bill has stalled. And the packages that fund health, science, transportation and education programs are not even close.

A bill that would fund water projects has been left hanging, despite the election-year appeal of its many pork-rich contents. Also headed nowhere: the permanent estate tax repeal that Republicans have tried all year to push across the finish line. A port security bill faces better odds, congressional aides said, but its "must pass" status has made it a magnet for unrelated earmarks.

House and Senate GOP negotiators are way behind schedule on a defense authorization bill, but as they make a final push before next Friday, new obstacles keep surfacing.

Of all pressing federal government priorities, fixing the Federal Emergency Management Agency would presumably rank at the top of the list. Last week, the House and Senate reached agreement on how to reform the troubled agency, incorporating recommendations from post-Katrina investigations. But the proposal would increase FEMA's budget, and it is unclear whether House and Senate appropriators -- who are negotiating a final fiscal 2007 spending bill -- will include the extra money.

FBI Raids Muslim Charity (DETNEWS)

By Paul Egan And Francis X. Donnelly

Detroit News, September 19, 2006

SOUTHFIELD -- FBI agents from the Joint Terrorism Task Force raided the Southfield offices of a highly regarded American Muslim relief organization Monday, but would not disclose the nature of their criminal investigation.

The FBI executed a search warrant at the offices of Life for Relief & Development on 10 Mile Road about 9 a.m. and remained there copying documents and computer files until late afternoon.

The FBI also searched the Ypsilanti home of the group's chief executive officer, Khalil Jassemm; a home on Indiana Street in Dearborn owned by Jassemm; and the Dearborn office of a nonprofit group opposed to the Iraq war called Focus on American & Arab Interests and Relations, headed by Muthanna Al-Hanooti, who until recently worked for Life for Relief & Development.

Al-Hanooti, an Iraqi expatriate and community activist, was out of the country visiting the United Arab Emirates, but was informed of the search, said Imad Hamad, regional director of the American Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0065484

The reasons given to U.S. District Judge Nancy G. Edmunds to obtain the search warrants were sealed, and no arrests have been made. The search is "pertaining to a criminal matter," FBI Special Agent Dawn Clenney said. A federal official in Detroit said the investigation was being run out of the Justice Department in Washington, D.C.

Lawyer Ihsan Alkhatib, Life for Relief's legal director, said Internal Revenue Service agents accompanied the FBI. Agents told him the investigation was tax-related and not terrorism-related, Alkhatib said.

"They've been professional, courteous and polite," Alkhatib said of the agents.

The main concern, Alkhatib said, is the timing of the raid, less than a week before the start of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. That's the peak time for donations to Life for Relief, which had been hard-hit like all Muslim charities after the Sept. 11 attacks and was just beginning to see a recovery in levels of giving, he said.

Group is cooperating

Jassemm, Life for Relief's chief executive officer, said his group is cooperating with the investigation. "We understand that the government has to do its job," he said.

Life for Relief describes itself on its Web site as the largest American Muslim humanitarian relief organization. The nonprofit organization was founded in 1992 by concerned Iraqi-American professionals in response to the crisis in Iraq following the 1991 Gulf War, the Web site says.

The charity says it has provided more than $50 million in aid to more than 13 million people around the world.

The group's most recent IRS filing, for 2004, said it had revenues of $10.6 million and spent $8.8 million that year on humanitarian and relief programs.

Life for Relief once had North American offices in California and Canada, but no longer does, Alkhatib said. But the group has offices associated with its relief efforts in Iraq, Jordan, Pakistan, Dubai, Syria, Sierra Leone and Israel, he said.

In addition to providing emergency relief in the form of food and medicine, Life for Relief runs programs for orphans and built a computer center in Iraq, Alkhatib said. Its Web site says it has improved schools in countries such as Iraq and Afghanistan and worked to improve Iraq's drinking water infrastructure.

Hamad said he believes Life for Relief is the only Muslim charity licensed to work in Israel and the occupied territories. To hear its offices were raided would not be unlike a Westerner hearing the offices of the Red Cross had been raided, he said.

A former Life for Relief chief executive officer, Ghanim al-Jumaily, was named Iraqi ambassador to Japan in 2004.

FBI seizes files, computers

On Monday afternoon in a light rain, more than a half dozen FBI agents streamed in and out of the rear entrance of the Life for Relief & Development building on 10 Mile, carrying with them dozens of file boxes and at least two computers.

The materials were loaded into a packed box truck parked in the rear. A Michigan State Police trooper secured the area for the FBI.

Al-Hanooti, the man associated with the other office targeted by the FBI, recently launched a lobbying and consulting firm, Focus on Advocacy & Advancement of International Relations LLC, which is aimed at improving Iraqi-American relations, Hamad said. It has offices in Dearborn and Washington, D.C.

Susan Lindauer, a Takona Park, Md., woman who has worked with Al-Hanooti on Muslim causes in Washington, said he met monthly with the local FBI task force in Detroit on anti-terrorism and was a liaison between Arab-Americans and the community. He's spent considerable time in Iraq since the start of the recent war acting as a bridge between the U.S. troops and Iraqi citizens, she said.

"I'm amazed, given all the excellent work he's done, that they would come after him," Lindauer said.

Life for Relief was one of two groups that funded a 2002 trip to Baghdad by three Democratic congressmen who opposed the Iraq war.

The congressmen were Rep. David Bonior of Mount Clemens, who has since left office and teaches labor studies at Wayne State University; Rep. Mike Thompson of California and Rep. Jim McDermott of Washington. The other group paying for the trip was the Church Council of Greater Seattle, a church group opposed to the war.

"They're a four-star charity, and they do work through the United Nations, and they have a good reputation for doing humanitarian work," said Dawud Walid, head of the Michigan branch of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said. "I was totally surprised."

The Joint Terrorism Task Force is made up of the FBI and more than 20 other law enforcement agencies, including the Michigan State Police.

Bill Pierre, regional director for the Middle East for the American Friends Service Committee, said his group has worked closely with Life for Relief in providing aid to Iraq.

"I'm very much surprised," Pierre said. "They have been steadfast in being open and above-board."

Raid On Metro Charity Troubles Area Muslims (FREEP)

By Niraj Warikoo

Detroit Free Press, September 19, 2006

Counterterrorism agents of the FBI and IRS raided what is believed to be one of the biggest Muslim charities in the United States on Monday, hauling away a truckload of documents and computers from its Southfield office.

DOJ_NMG_0065485

The raid was based on sealed search warrants, but the charity's head of legal services, Ihsan Alkhatib, said the agents are investigating whether the charity conducted business in Iraq before the 2003 war in violation of legal sanctions against the country.

Alkhatib said Life for Relief and Development "did everything by the book.

"They knew the government was looking at them through a magnifying glass," he said.

Tax records show that Life raised about $10.6 million in 2004. The charity has distributed money in Pakistan, Iraq, Lebanon, the Palestinian territories, and in the United States after Hurricane Katrina, among other places. A senior federal official with knowledge of investigations related to the raid said that agents are probing whether Life officials violated the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, a federal law that allows the government to prohibit economic activity with countries that are deemed security threats.

According to the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, agents are investigating whether Life may have illegally distributed money and medical supplies inside Iraq.

Agents of the FBI and IRS seized cabinet files and hard drives from the office of Life, a nonprofit group that Muslim leaders say is the biggest Islamic charity headquartered in Michigan.

Southfield police and Michigan State Police officers were also at the scene Monday.

Federal agents also raided the Ypsilanti home of the charity's chief executive officer, Khalil Jassemm, and the Dearborn office of Muthanna Alhanooti, a former official of the charity who has ties to an Islamic party in Iraq.

No one was arrested.

The agents were from the Joint Terrorism Task Force, and they spent hours interviewing Jassemm, as well as Life's office manager, Kudama Kaluan, accountant Nael Zenhom, and marketing manager Mohammed Abaza, Alkhatib said.

The raids are part of a major effort by the FBI and other federal agencies to investigate the flow of money from the United States to terrorist groups in the Muslim world, current and former FBI agents said Monday.

"It's logical to assume that many Islamic terrorist organizations have representation here in the U.S., and sources of funding," said Christopher Hamilton, a former FBI agent who investigated terrorism cases and is now a senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, based in Washington, D.C.

Many of the efforts of counterterrorism officials in southeastern Michigan focus on how money from the region ends up in Middle Eastern and other Muslim countries such as Iran and Pakistan.

Earlier this year, the Treasury Department shut a charity based in Toledo, with Michigan ties, for alleged links to Hamas.

And the FBI said in May that the owner of the La Shish chain of restaurants, Talal Chahine, raised money for Hizballah through a charity in Lebanon that has an office in Dearborn.

Last month, Alhanooti left Life for Relief and Development to consider being the U.S. representative of the Iraqi Islamic Party.

Another Life official, Mohammed Alomari, was involved with Sunni political parties in Iraq, say charity officials.

Founded in 1992, the charity was started by Iraqi-American Sunnis who said they were concerned about the plight of Iraqis and the effect of United Nations sanctions imposed after the 1991 Persian Gulf War, according to charity officials.

Life officials have traveled to Iraq often over the years and had an office that distributed aid after the fall of Saddam Hussein's government in 2003, say charity officials.

Coming days before the start of Ramadan, the raids concerned some Muslims in metro Detroit, but some said they were not surprised.

"The community was expecting to give Ramadan gifts, but we're wondering, who's next" to be raided, Jassemm said. "And apparently, Life is next."

The raids were based on several search warrants that dealt with possible violations of criminal laws, said FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney. Affidavits filed in support of the warrants have been sealed.

Life for Relief and Development is actively involved in metro Detroit's Arab-American and Muslim communities. It is part of the Congress of Arab American Organizations.

And the Life group has worked with and donated supplies to the Michigan branch of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee.

The head of the committee, Imad Hamad, urged the public not to rush to judgment.

But federal agents say they worry whether the group may have violated federal laws.

The group can still operate, but Alkhatib said that will be hard to do because they have no computers and hard drives.

Federal Agents Raid Islamic Charity In Suburban Detroit (AP)

AP, September 18, 2006

SOUTHFIELD, Michigan Federal counterterrorism officials on Monday raided the suburban Detroit offices of an international Muslim humanitarian organization.

FBI and Joint Terrorism Task Force agents executed search warrants at the headquarters of Life for Relief and Development in the Detroit suburb of Southfield.

DOJ_NMG_0065486

The warrants were based on a criminal assertion, but the affidavits in support of the warrants are sealed, William Kowalski, an assistant special agent in the FBI's Detroit office, told the Detroit Free Press.

"The warrants have been signed off by a judge, and it pertains to an ongoing criminal matter," FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney told The Associated Press. She did not give additional details.

Agents hauled away documents, letters and ledgers starting at about 9 a.m. (1300 GMT), said Dawud Walid, head of the Michigan branch of the Council on American Islamic Relations. Walid said agents told officials at the charity that the raid was related to criminal activity.

"They're seizing documents," Walid said. "They haven't closed down the charity, they haven't filed any charges against the organization nor have they arrested anyone. It was totally unexpected and they're baffled."

Mohammed Alomari, spokesman for Life for Relief and Development, described the federal agents as courteous and said staff members who remained in the office were cooperating. He said much of the staff was sent home for the day after agents arrived.

"They didn't really give a reason, but . . . I guess they're looking for some financial information," Alomari said.

"What we asked them is, can we still continue operating the charity, and they said yes," he said.

Alomari said the organization raises money for humanitarian relief efforts and for development projects such as building schools, water treatment plants, computer centers and sewing centers for women. He said the organization has offices in Iraq, Pakistan, Jordan, Israel, Syria and Sierra Leone and employs 25 people at its Southfield headquarters.

A statement on the organization's Web site said it "has provided over $50 million (€39.48 million) in humanitarian assistance to more than 13 million beneficiaries worldwide."

The group was founded by Iraqi Americans in 1992.

FBI Searches Islamic Leader's Home (COLMISS)

By Derek Kravitz And Anna Scianna

Columbia Missourian, September 19, 2006

FBI agents searched the home of a prominent Islamic community leader Monday, three days after FBI officials met with community members at the Columbia mosque to improve the bureau's often frosty relations with Muslims.

A dozen agents searched the home of Shakir Abdul-Kaf Hamoodi and his wife, Lamya Mukhlef Najem, on Monday, said FBI spokesman Jeff Lanza. Agents showed up at Hamoodi's southwest Columbia home about 8 a.m. Monday, seizing boxes and computer equipment throughout the day, neighbors said, before leaving the quiet residential neighborhood about 4 p.m.

Lanza said agents only searched Hamoodi's home, located at 2701 Woodberry Court, in The Pines subdivision, in connection with the search warrant. The reason for the raid has not been disclosed because details of the warrant are sealed.

On Monday, federal agents also raided the offices of a Southfield, Mich., Muslim charity organization, Life for Relief and Development. Lanza would neither confirm nor deny whether the two searches were connected.

Last February, Stephens College held a tsunami relief concert and gave all the proceeds to the Life for Relief and Development.

Muslim leaders said that the timing of the two searches raised suspicions.

"After learning about the Columbia raid, I have to say the timings are odd," said Ibrahim Hooper, the national communications director for the Washington, D.C.-based Council on American-Islamic Relations.

Reached at his home by phone Monday afternoon, Hamoodi said he cooperated fully with federal investigators.

"They came in, asked questions, I told them the answers and they left," he said. He declined to discuss the nature of the questions he was asked.

Hamoodi, 54, grew up in Anah, a town in central Iraq, and studied in Iraq, Scotland and France. After he immigrated to Columbia in 1985 with his wife, Lamya, 40. Hamoodi studied at MU and worked as an assistant research professor for the school's College of Engineering, before leaving that position. According to an article published in the Missourian in March 2003, Hamoodi has hundreds of relatives still in Iraq, including his parents and several brothers and sisters. Hamoodi and Najem have five American-born children.

Hamoodi has owned and operated a grocery store, World Harvest International and Gourmet Foods, on Nifong Boulevard, since 2004. Najem is a teacher at the Islamic School of Columbia Missouri.

Hamoodi was the former outreach coordinator for the Islamic Center of Central Missouri, organizing interfaith meetings with community leaders and peace demonstrations. Corey Brand, the center's president, described Hamoodi as a prominent and well-respected member of Columbia's Muslim community.

"I've known him for a number of years, and to think he'd be capable of anything criminal. ... I just can't possibly believe that," Brand said.

Brand said Hamoodi actively spoke out against the war in Iraq and was involved with several charitable organizations.

"I've been opposed to sanctions, and I'm opposed to the United States' current foreign policy in the region," Hamoodi said in the 2003 Missourian article following the U.S. invasion of Iraq. "I sincerely do not find any justification for this."

Monday's raid came three days after FBI agents met with Muslim community members at the Islamic Center of Central Missouri.

DOJ_NMG_0065487

At the meeting, community members raised concerns about being racially profiled following the October 2004 federal raid of the Islamic American Relief Agency's U.S. headquarters in Columbia. Hamoodi attended the meeting, organizers said.

The U.S. Treasury Department has linked the IARA charity to the Sudan-based Islamic African Relief Agency, which they say has ties to Osama Bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas. No one has been charged in connection with that case. Brand said he did not know if Hamoodi donated any of his time or money to the IARA, which housed its U.S. headquarters in offices at 201 E. Cherry St.

Several Columbia Muslim leaders said they felt personally targeted after the raid, which they said caused lasting damage within the Muslim community.

Brand said he hopes the ongoing federal investigation doesn't undo the progress made at the last week's forum.

"I think it has the danger of erasing the whole purpose of Friday — to reassure the Muslim community," Brand said.

FBI Searches Home Of Muslim Family (COLTRIB)

By Jacob Lueke

Columbia Tribune, September 18, 2006

FBI agents today searched the home of a Columbia businessman and former Iraqi who has been an outspoken critic of the war in Iraq.

About a dozen FBI vehicles parked this morning in front of the home of Shakir Hamoodi, 54, at 2701 Woodberry Court, in the upscale The Pines neighborhood in southwest Columbia, neighbors said.

At exactly 9 a.m., the FBI agents left their cars and rushed the house. Two teenagers inside the house were brought outside and escorted to the family car and drove off, said a neighbor who did not want to be identified. The neighbor said the agents entered the house and removed boxes and other items. Some agents stood on the lawn and examined papers pulled from the house.

Hamoodi owns World Harvest International and Gourmet Foods on Nifong Boulevard. County records show he owns the Woodberry Court home with Lamya Najem, 40, who a neighbor said teaches at the Islamic School of Columbia Missouri.

Hamoodi

Jeff Lanza, a spokesman for the FBI in Kansas City, would not say what prompted the raid, but he said the home was not a threat to the community.

Neither Hamoodi nor Najem could be reached for comment this morning. A neighbor who requested anonymity said police told him Hamoodi was out of the state this morning.

Several neighbors who watched the ongoing raid and requested anonymity said they didn't know much about the family. "They have been nothing but very, very nice," one neighbor said.

Around 9:30 a.m. a Columbia police officer was rummaging through the home's open garage while neighbors loitered outside and gawked. Shortly after a reporter arrived, the officer closed the garage door.

Officer Bill Lee turned away an attempt to question the FBI agents and asked a Tribune reporter and photographer to leave the property. He declined to answer questions.

Hamoodi is an Iraq native who lived in Scotland and France before moving to Columbia in 1985. He studied at the University of Missouri-Columbia and later became an engineering research assistant professor at the school. He left the school and opened World Harvest in 2004, according to a 2005 Tribune story about his business.

Hamoodi has been identified as an outreach coordinator for the Islamic Center.

"He's been involved with charity. He's a good human being and does a lot of charitable work," said Ahmed Habib, who knows Hamoodi and his family through the mosque. "He's well respected in the community."

Neighbors said the home was generally quiet, although once every few months several cars would park there for about an hour. They speculated Hamoodi hosted religious gatherings.

Hamoodi has made several public appearances in opposition to the U.S. war in Iraq. At one event, a July 2005 speech at a Rotary Club event in Jefferson City, he was identified as a nuclear engineer living in Columbia.

In 2003 he participated in an MU forum on the war and said: "The U.S. Army is as unwanted as Saddam Hussein. The U.S. Army is probably more unwanted than Saddam Hussein."

After Saddam's capture, Hamoodi told the Tribune the event was insignificant. "They found him in a hole, he can't lead the resistance from a hole," Hamoodi was quoted as saying. "The war was a lie. Innocent people were killed. Is this worth finding weapons of mass destruction?"

Their home on Woodberry Court was recently defaced with spray-painted anarchist graffiti, neighbors said.

Islamic Center 'surprised' By Timing Of Raid. (COLTRIB)

By Janease Heavin

Columbia Tribune, September 18, 2006

An FBI visit this morning to the Columbia home of a Muslim family could undo any bridge-building efforts between law enforcement and members of the Islamic community, the president of the local mosque said this morning.

DOJ_NMG_0065488

The FBI search of the home of Shakir Hamoodi, 54, and Lamya Najem, 40, this morning came as a surprise to Corey Brand, president of the Islamic Center of Central Missouri.

"I could not believe that he would be involved in anything evil," Brand said. "I've known Shakir Hamoodi for years, and he's quite highly respected. This is absolutely going to damage relationships."

Hamoodi, Brand and others in the Muslim community met with FBI Supervisory Special Agent Richard Thornton on Friday at the Islamic center in an effort to improve communications. Islamic center member Ahmed Habib said Thornton asked for the meeting; however, Thornton told the Tribune on Friday that Habib invited him to speak.

During the more than two-hourlong meeting on Friday, Thornton explained FBI procedure and assured the group that if any of them "ever come under scrutiny," the FBI would "do it fairly and constitutionally."

Habib said Hamoodi and Thornton talked during the social hour, but Hamoodi did not publicly ask questions.

During Friday's meeting, many Muslims shared concerns about the FBI shutdown of the Islamic American Relief Agency in Columbia two years ago. U.S. Treasury officials contend the Columbia-based charity was the U.S. affiliate of a Sudanese charity, the Islamic African Relief Agency, which is accused of supporting terrorist organizations, including al-Qaida.

Thornton on Friday told Muslims that those who contributed large amounts of money to that charity could face FBI questioning. Brand said this morning he did not know whether Hamoodi contributed to the IARA.

Although Habib seemed surprised this morning to hear of the raid on Hamoodi's home, he was careful not to speculate whether it would undo any positive relations built Friday night.

"We wanted to show them that the mosque is open to them," Habib said. "I'm surprised this type of thing would happen so soon afterward."

White House Selects Cybersecurity Chief (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, September 18, 2006

The Homeland Security Department picked an industry information security specialist Monday as its cybersecurity chief, filling a job that has had no permanent director for a year.

Greg Garcia was appointed assistant secretary for cybersecurity and telecommunications, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said. The cybersecurity job was created in July 2005, but department officials have struggled to find candidates willing to take significant pay cuts from industry jobs to fill it.

Part of Garcia's job will be to oversee the department's National Cyber Security Division. For the last two years, that office has been run by Donald "Andy" Purdy Jr., who is a two-year contract employee on loan from Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh. Carnegie Mellon has received $19 million in contracts from Homeland Security's cybersecurity office under Purdy's management.

Garcia "brings the right mix of experience in government and the private sector to continue to strengthen our robust partnerships that are essential to this field," Chertoff said in a statement.

A test of mock Internet attacks concluded last week that many government and industry officials were unable to fight back quickly and effectively against a series of simulated hackings that aimed to halt subways and trigger power outages.

Dozens Die In Blasts In Northern, Western Iraq (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 18 -- Suicide bombers killed at least 34 people in attacks in western and northern Iraq on Monday, underscoring the continuing violence throughout the country as U.S. and Iraqi forces focus on tamping down attacks in the capital.

In Tal Afar, north of Baghdad, a man wearing an explosive vest blew himself up at 6:15 p.m. in a line of residents waiting to buy cylinders of cooking gas, killing 21 people and wounding 18 others, said Brig. Gen. Saeed Jubury, a police spokesman in Mosul.

Earlier in the afternoon, a suicide car bomber slammed into a recruiting center for Iraqi security forces in Ramadi, capital of Anbar province, killing 13 recruits and wounding 10 others, said Talib Mushtaq al-Obaydi, a doctor at Ramadi General Hospital. A statement from the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq asserted responsibility for the attack.

Mohammed al-Askari, a spokesman for the Defense Ministry, said in a statement that the recent violence in outlying provinces is a result of the new security plan in the capital, which "has not left room for terrorism in Baghdad."

Still, horrific bloodshed remains routine in Baghdad, where nearly 100 people were found dead in one 24-hour period last week. Many residents remain fearful of security forces meant to protect them, particularly police from the Interior Ministry, which is thought to be infiltrated by militias and death squads.

Starting next month, Iraq's entire national police force will undergo a month-long training course that includes inspections of individual units that could identify corrupt officers or militia members, according to a Western adviser to the Interior Ministry.

The adviser, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press, said the inspections, which have already begun, include reviews of payroll and inventory records. "If you have a police chief that is selling weapons or body armor on the black market," he said, "that is going to be discovered. If someone is getting rid of Sunnis on the force, there's an administrative trail to get rid of them."

Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, confirmed the training program but said there would not be any effort to root out rogue elements or death squads thought to be rampant among the police ranks.

"We will not lose trust with our forces by doing tests on them," he said. "Cleaning the bad elements out of the Interior Ministry is the duty of the inspector general, it's not our duty."

In the southern city of Basra, about 600 protesters gathered in the streets and burned an effigy of Pope Benedict XVI to decry a speech last week quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as saying that the prophet Muhammad brought "only evil and inhuman" things to the world. The pope said in a statement Sunday that he was "deeply sorry" about the reaction in some countries to his remarks.

The U.S. military on Monday also announced the deaths of two soldiers in Baghdad on Sunday, one killed by small arms fire and the other when his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb. No other details were released.

Special correspondents K.I. Ibrahim and Naseer Nouri contributed to this report.

Attacks In Iraq Leave 23 Dead As Talks Lag On Autonomy (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Abdul Razzaq Al-saiedi

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Tuesday, Sept. 19 — Suicide bombers attacked a market in Tal Afar and the Iraqi police in Ramadi on Monday, killing at least 23 people, as political leaders in the capital struggled to reach a deal that would end the fight over splitting Iraq into autonomous states.

The worst attack was in Tal Afar, where a bomber wearing an vest filled with explosives killed 21 people and wounded 17 others when he blew himself up near a line of people waiting to receive their allotment of cooking fuel, according to Iraqi state television.

Tal Afar, a dusty, agrarian city of a quarter million in northwestern Iraq, has been the scene of fierce battles over the past two years as American troops have fought to wrest control of the area from groups affiliated with Al Qaeda and from other insurgents.

Two suicide bombs struck the police in Ramadi, the restive capital of Anbar Province west of Baghdad. News agencies quoted Iraqi officials as saying that 13 people had been killed. But an American military spokeswoman said United States forces in the area had counted two dead, both Iraqi policemen.

Early Tuesday morning, the American military released statements disclosing two new combat deaths. One soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in northeastern Baghdad on Sunday afternoon, and another was killed by small-arms fire in north-central Baghdad, also on Sunday afternoon.

Negotiators from major political blocs met late Monday in an effort to resolve the bitter fight over how soon Shiite provinces in the south can break off into autonomous regions with substantial control over their security and the billions of barrels of oil beneath southern Iraq.

A faction of Shiites and Kurds led by the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri, a powerful Shiite party with close ties to Iran, proposed a compromise on Monday, said an adviser to Khalid al-Atiya, a deputy speaker of Parliament and one of the faction's negotiators.

Sciri wants to pass a bill in Parliament giving provinces a quick route to forming autonomous regions, which are allowed by the Constitution's federalism provisions.

But furious Sunni Arab leaders say the Constitution might not have even been approved in the referendum last October had it not been for their last-minute support. They gave that support only after a provision was added that called for portions of the Constitution to be renegotiated as soon as Parliament was called into session. But that has not happened.

Under the new proposal, according to the aide to Mr. Atiya, Parliament would form a committee to propose constitutional amendments, as sought by the Sunnis. At the same time, Parliament would proceed with the federalism proposal backed by Sciri and the Kurds, but the law would not become effective for one year, or until after the constitutional committee finished deciding whether to propose amendments.

But one of the negotiators for the Sunni members of Parliament, Ayad al-Samarrai, said the Sunnis did not want to move ahead with any aspect of federalism until the constitutional questions were resolved.

And even then, he said in an interview on Monday night, Sunnis do not want to create any autonomous states that have the same level of independence as Iraqi Kurdistan.

A committee is needed to study how federalism would work in the Arab regions of Iraq, he said, "because we can't use the Kurdish style." Iraq will always require a strong central government to settle problems in the regions, he added.

DOJ_NMG_0065490

In Baghdad, the government released a statement on Monday saying it would shut down the offices of the Kurdistan Workers' Party, or P.K.K. Rebels from the P.K.K., who live in the mountains of Iraqi Kurdistan near Iran and Turkey, favor an independent Kurdistan. They are enemies of Turkey and Iran, which have sizable Kurdish populations and reject calls for an independent Kurdish nation.

However, a senior Kurdish official in Baghdad said he strongly doubted that the decree would mean that the Kurdish militia, the pesh merga, would be called on to crack down on the rebels.

At the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein on Monday, prosecutors called the latest witness to describe the so-called Anfal military campaign of 1988, in which Mr. Hussein faces charges of gassing and killing more than 50,000 Kurds.

Darwan Abdullah Ali Tawfiq, a former pesh merga fighter, testified that he was left with permanent eye damage after he was gassed in 1988 when a rocket fell next to his tent. "After that, I ran toward a hill behind us," he testified, a pool report said. "While I was running, I was jumping over bodies of children and old people. I saw severed body parts.

"Until now, I suffer from the pain," he said. "When I take my glasses off in front of my children, they tell me to put them back on because they get scared of the way my eyes look."

Iraq Violence Kills At Least 41 People (AP)

By Elena Becatoros

AP, September 19, 2006

Bombers and gunmen killed at least 41 people and wounded dozens across Iraq on Monday, while parliament leaders again put off debate on legislation that some Iraqis fear could threaten the country's unity and bring even more violence.

The U.S. military relinquished control of a second Iraqi army division as Iraqi officials prepared to further tighten security ahead of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, when insurgent attacks tend to spike.

In a positive development for Iraq's leaders, predominantly Sunni Arab tribes in a volatile western province have joined to fight insurgents in the region and want the government and the U.S.-led coalition to supply them with weapons, a tribal leader said.

Tribal leaders and clerics in Ramadi, capital of violent Anbar province, met last week and set up a force of about 20,000 men "ready to purge the city of these infidels," Sheik Fassal al-Guood, a tribal leader from Ramadi, told The Associated Press.

"People are fed up with the acts of those criminals who take Islam as a cover for their crimes," he said. "The situation in the province is unbearable, the city is abandoned, most of the families have fled the city and all services are poor."

An indication of the situation came Monday when two suicide car bombers attacked a police station in Ramadi, killing at least two police officers and wounding 26 people, the Interior Ministry and U.S. military said. Al-Arabiya and al-Jazeera television put the death toll much higher, saying 13 people were killed.

A suicide bomber also struck in Tal Afar, a city 260 miles northwest of Baghdad that has seen much insurgent activity in the past, killing at least 20 people and wounding 17. Bombings and shootings in and around Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of the capital, killed 12 people.

At least six more people died in other incidents around Iraq, and authorities found at least five bodies, including two women, that probably were victims of the sectarian reprisal killings being waged between Shiite and Sunni Arabs.

In Baghdad, political leaders from Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni Arab groups met to discuss the federalism bill submitted to parliament this month by the largest Shiite bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance. They canceled a formal parliament debate scheduled for Tuesday.

The head of the largest Sunni Arab alliance, Adnan al-Dulaimi, said the faction leaders would meet again to discuss the issue Tuesday, but said the bill would not be debated until a later — as yet unspecified — date.

The legislation calls for setting up a system to allow creation of autonomous regions in the predominantly Shiite south much like the self-ruling Kurdish region in northern Iraq. Sunni Arabs fear that would split Iraq apart and fuel sectarian bloodshed.

The Kurdish north and Shiite south hold Iraq's oil fields, while the predominantly Sunni Arab areas don't have any.

Sunni Arabs say that before autonomy legislation can be passed, parliament must name a committee to amend the constitution — a key demand they made when they agreed to join Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government. One of the amendments they seek would weaken the ability to set up self-ruling cantons.

Al-Dulaimi, as well as Shiite and Kurdish lawmakers, said the Kurds had proposed setting up the committee simultaneously with submitting the draft bill for debate sometime in the future.

Monday's violence came as the government prepared to announce new security measures for Baghdad ahead of Ramadan, which is expected to start Sept. 24.

Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari told the AP the measures would be adopted two or three days before the holy month begins to "protect citizens from terrorists attacks."

The Iraqi army's 4th Division also came under Iraqi control in central Salahuddin province Monday, the government said.

It was the second of Iraq's 10 divisions to be put under direct Iraqi control since Sept. 7, when coalition forces handed over control of Iraq's armed forces command to the government.

Zarqawi Had Foes Within Al Qaeda (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0065491

By Sharon Behn, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 19, 2006

Iraq's national security adviser yesterday released a letter captured after the death of terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi, in which he was criticized by another al Qaeda figure for his brutal methods.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie cited several points in English from the Arabic-language document, saying the letter reveals Zarqawi's intention to spur sectarian violence in the country.

The long letter was from Attyia al-Jaza'ri, purportedly an al Qaeda leader of Algerian origin, to Zarqawi before he was killed in an air strike on June 7.

Mr. al-Rubaie's statement and the letter were given to journalists by the U.S. military at the request of the adviser with the caveat: "We have no knowledge of the matters contained in this message. If you have any questions, please contact the government of Iraq."

According to Mr. al-Rubaie, in the letter "the leader of al Qaeda criticizes Zarqawi for making decisions without seeking the counsel of senior al Qaeda leadership [and] reminds Zarqawi that he is not on the same level of these historic leaders."

Al-Jaza'ri also reprimanded the Jordanian-born terrorist for putting military acts above political action, expressed his reservations on Zarqawi's attempts "to prematurely declare war on the Shi'ites," and chastised him for not cooperating with Sunni scholars and tribal leaders.

The letter "expressed that al Qaeda leadership in Pakistan and Afghanistan are unhappy with [al Qaeda in Iraq] methods in Iraq [and] criticized [its] method of selectively choosing brutality and violence over mercy and kindness."

Zarqawi was the mastermind behind a number of gruesome videotaped beheadings, executions and kidnappings in Iraq, making him one of the most wanted men in Iraq.

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell told reporters on June 8 that Zarqawi's death and 17 simultaneous raids in Baghdad and the city's outskirts led to a "treasure trove" of information and intelligence.

But the euphoria over Zarqawi's death quickly faded as sectarian violence dramatically increased in the capital, leaving thousands dead in the past three months, their tortured and bound bodies found strewn around the city.

There was no immediate independent confirmation of the veracity of the documents released. Phone calls to the Iraqi national security council spokesman were not answered.

The President Of Iraq, Jalal Talabani, Shares His Views In 'Dear Americans' (MCT)

McClatchy Newspapers, September 19, 2006

Dear Americans:

As I am visiting the United States for the second time representing free and democratic Iraq, I felt it my duty to give you an update on what has been achieved in Iraq over the past year and on the challenges that lie ahead.

The first thing I would like to convey is the gratitude of all Iraqis, who are fighting for a democratic government and a civil society, to the Americans. Without your commitment, our struggle against despotism could not have made the progress that we have achieved. No expression of thanks could be enough for those who lost loved ones in Iraq. We feel your pain, we honor your sacrifice and we will never forget you.

To those of you who have family and friends in Iraq today, we say: Your sons and daughters are helping us through a historic transition. We will always remember the enormous sacrifice that America is making for Iraq.

Thanks to the United States, we are transforming Iraq from a country that was ruled by fear, repression and dictatorship into a country that is ruled by democracy and has the values of equality, tolerance, human rights and the rule of law at its heart.

April 9, 2003, the day of liberation, heralded a new era in the history of Iraq and the region. That day triggered a sequence of events that laid the foundation of a modern Iraq that is at peace with itself and the world.

All segments of Iraqi society have benefited from liberation.

Under Saddam Hussein, the majority of the Sunni Arabs of Iraq were marginalized, Saddam and his gang were ruling in the name of this community. But in reality, the Sunni Arabs never had the chance to choose their representatives democratically and have a say about their future. Today, they have 58 deputies in Parliament, a vice president, a deputy prime minister and a speaker of Parliament; all were elected by the people of Iraq.

The Shia majority of Iraq was for decades oppressed and discriminated against. They did not even have the right to practice their religious ceremonies. Now, they are equal citizens and hold key posts in government and parliament through their democratically elected representatives. Kurds were second-class citizens. They suffered from genocide and chemical bombardment; now they are equal members of Iraqi society and active participants in the running of their country, Iraq.

The same applies to the Turkomens, Assyrians and other groups of Iraqi society.

Iraq finally has an elected and representative government, a huge contrast to the authority of a vicious tyrant. In other words, Iraq is no longer the property of a gang that ruled by fear and repression. Every Iraqi today feels they have a stake in the new Iraq.

With the regime of Saddam gone, the countries of the Middle East no longer worry about the threat of new adventures by Saddam and his army across Iraq's international borders.

DOJ_NMG_0065492

Every time that I visit the United States, I am convinced anew of the virtues and health of the American idea of government, and of the generosity of its people.

I was here around the same time last year. Here is what has happened between then and now, although I must say that I do not think that our situation can be understood simply by following the latest news. A much broader view of Iraq must be taken.

For this, I will start with the economy.

The economic conditions for most Iraqis have improved. The economy was liberated from the control of the state and we are now taking the first steps in creating a vibrant private sector.

Thanks to our independent businesspeople, our market places are bustling despite the unsettled security situation.

A new investment law is before our Parliament. It will further invigorate our private sector, streamline the procedures for starting a new business, and open the country to greater foreign participation and investment.

Salaries of government employees were raised 100 times or more. A policeman under Saddam received $2 to $3 dollars a month. Now a policeman is paid at least $200 a month.

The financial and economic boom is mostly noticed in the safer parts of Iraq. The city of Sulaymaniyah in Iraqi Kurdistan region now has more than 2,000 millionaires. Before liberation, the city had 12.

Politically, we had an eventful year. For the first time in Iraq's history, we ratified a constitution that enshrines many of the democratic values of human rights, equality, rule of law and good government.

After three historic ballots that remain landmarks in the history of the Middle East, we now have a government that arises out of the people, instead of over the people, to use the words of a great American patriot, Thomas Paine.

Unlike the previous election, last December more people voted - 10.5 million - and a more representative parliament and a national unity government are now in place.

Taking part in the national election and referendum on the constitution were the first steps in our national reconciliation efforts; we opted for the ballots and not the bullets to resolve our differences.

We consolidated this by the National Reconciliation Plan of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The plan aims at bringing into the political process all elements of the Iraqi political spectrum that condemn terror and violence.

In the period between the election and the formation of the national unity government, the political blocs - which formed the government later - agreed on the political program for the government and agreed on forming the Political Council for National Security.

An important event that marked the new Iraq over the past year is the trial of Saddam Hussein and his aides for the crimes that were committed against the people of Iraq.

We offered him the justice that he denied Iraqis for decades. The trials, the testimonies of the witnesses and those of the defendants are stark reminders and indications of what Iraq was like in the past and what the new Iraq is about.

Through the constitution and other legal means, we are redefining the foundations that Iraq was built on and are rebuilding what the country's bloody past has destroyed. We have no choice but to succeed.

Our enemy attempts to destroy and disrupt any part of the political process, not because they disagree with the tenets of the Iraqi constitution, but because they do not want a constitution.

This contingent of international terrorists and the supporters and beneficiaries of the old regime - the devotees of Saddam Hussein - constitute the driving force of our enemy.

They attempt to turn Iraqis against each other, and take Iraq back to its brutal and bloody past.

Their tactics of suicide bombings and beheadings make it obvious that they mean to govern by inciting terror and fear, just as Saddam did. Although portions of Iraq are already safe and secure, certain parts are still coming under attack from the vicious, bloodthirsty enemy.

With the support of the citizens of Baghdad, the government started its Baghdad Security Plan. This plan is already showing signs of success, with a marked drop in the reported incidents of violence over the last month.

The battle in Iraq today is not between the various communities. Their elected representatives have agreed on a government of national unity and on national reconciliation. Nor is it a battle between civilizations, as some have seen it.

It is a war "about civilization" as Prime Minister Tony Blair has phrased it so well - the conflict is between those who believe in having a civilization and those who don't believe in having one at all.

As you no doubt already understand, we are fighting a terribly difficult war in Iraq. We are doing everything within our power to protect our people from this clear form of fascism that seduces them into civil war.

The calculated crime of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and his henchmen in bombing the Shrine of Samarra, one of Iraq's religious and cultural treasures, is a prime example of their agenda. They wanted to slide the country into civil war.

Thanks to the presence of the U.S. forces in Iraq and the wisdom of my colleagues in the leadership of Iraq, that plan was thwarted and the short spate of violence was contained.

I want to be frank here. In order to rid Iraq of the constant threat of violence, we still need your help. As long as we are determent to outlast and outsmart our enemy, we shall reach our common goals.

DOJ_NMG_0065493

Iraq is slowly gaining the ability to fight this war with its own soldiers, evidenced recently by the relinquishing of complete control of coalition forces to the Iraqi government. The coalition now employs more soldiers from Iraq than any other nation.

Slowly but surely, Iraq will be able to protect itself on its own.

The stakes of Iraq are enormous, world-shifting even. This is why our country should be a point of concern for every democratic country of the world.

I can assure you that the immediate departure of coalition forces would only unleash tensions between different communities; the prospect of a safe Iraq would be completely lost; and the previous descriptions of a civil war would seem insufficient and tame compared to the bloodshed of an Iraq that loses its international support.

And although I cannot promise when or how the American presence will completely end in Iraq, I can promise that American soldiers do not fight in vain.

We in Iraq recognize that an incredible amount of American resources have been offered to us. And we understand that many Americans are frustrated with the course of the war, and we understand that doubt naturally coincides with difficulty.

I realize that many Americans were apprehensive about the decision to go to war.

But I ask that you put this behind you in favor of supporting a democratic and free Iraq, and a future for Iraqis that excludes the threat of violence and extremism.

I ask that you consider what the terms of failure in Iraq would actually look like, and what they would mean for Iraq, the United States and the international community.

I would venture to say that the interest of Iraq and the United States are one in this matter.

The United States carries a heavy responsibility in helping us. As complicated as the relationship may be, America and Iraq are now siblings in the world.

Ex-Workers Testify About Halliburton (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Edward V. Sanchez, a truck driver for Halliburton, had just passed under a bridge near Baghdad on April 9, 2004, when another truck in his convoy hit a mine and "all hell broke loose."

"We began taking rounds of small arms fire from both sides," Sanchez said at a Capitol Hill hearing yesterday. "The shots were coming like a hail storm."

By day's end, seven civilians from the fuel convoy were dead and seven more were injured. Surviving convoy members and the families of the dead now claim the incident could have been prevented. Halliburton, they argue in a suit filed in federal court, had ample warning the route was unsafe to travel because of reports of a running battle between insurgents and the U.S. Army.

That allegation was at the center of a Democratic Policy Committee hearing that renewed attention on Halliburton Co., which has come under intense scrutiny as the largest U.S. contractor in Iraq.

Past criticism has focused on accusations that the firm, once run by Vice President Cheney, is squandering taxpayer money. Testimony by two former Halliburton truck drivers yesterday raised the question of whether the company was protecting its workers. The firm's KBR subsidiary has lost 91 employees and subcontractors to violence in Iraq since the war began in March 2003.

In response to the lawsuit, the company has said decisions about convoy activity are out of its hands. "The U.S. military has command and control of all KBR convoys in Iraq . . . and is required to provide security for KBR's employees through the company's contract with the Army," the company said in a statement.

Halliburton has sought to have the suit thrown out, arguing the company is immune from litigation related to its work in Iraq for the U.S. government.

The drivers did sign liability waivers before heading to Iraq. But T. Scott Allen Jr., the attorney representing the drivers and their families, said yesterday that Halliburton should have to answer for sending the convoy despite knowing the roads were the scene of "active combat, that the areas were closed and off limits to civilian personnel."

Sean A. Larvenz, a former Halliburton driver who was traveling in another convoy on the day of the attacks, said he had to turn his truck around that morning because he saw insurgents firing at vehicles ahead of his. He said he notified his bosses at Halliburton. Sanchez's convoy was sent later that day.

Larvenz said he believed financial motivations had guided the firm's decision. "As long as the trucks rolled," he told senators, "they got paid."

Also testifying was Julie McBride, a former Halliburton employee who alleged the company inflated its profit by overstating the number of soldiers using Halliburton recreation facilities. Halliburton has a multibillion-dollar contract to provide the Army with logistics support, including gyms and computer clusters. McBride, who helped run those facilities at an Army base in Fallujah, said the firm lied about the number of soldiers who used them because it got reimbursed for its costs and then received a percentage for profit.

DOJ_NMG_0065494

"Under its contract, the more facilities, equipment, staff and administrators Halliburton can show a need for, the more profit Halliburton makes," she said. "As the mantra at Halliburton camps goes, 'It's cost-plus, baby.' "

In a statement, Halliburton denied McBride's allegations and said they "clearly demonstrate a complete misinterpretation of facts."

The Army said this summer that it would not renew Halliburton's contract for another year, and instead would divide it up among three firms following a new bidding competition.

The hearing yesterday was the latest in a series held by Democrats who say they feel Republicans have failed to aggressively oversee spending on the war.

"There's something dreadfully wrong with the way that money has been spent and the lack of accountability," said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), who chaired the hearing.

Halliburton Ignored Dangers, Drivers Say (HC)

By David Ivanovich

Houston Chronicle, September 19, 2006

WASHINGTON - Halliburton Co. officials knew a highway intersection near Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison was fraught with danger hours before the deadly ambush of a truck convoy known as the Good Friday Massacre, former company truck drivers told Democratic senators Monday.

And the Houston-based contracting giant may have tried to shield itself from lawsuits by including a clause in an application for a Defense of Freedom Medal, in which survivors would sign away their rights to sue, according to a document unveiled by the panel Monday.

"That is almost an unbelievable piece of paper," said Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-S.D., chairman of the Senate Democratic Policy Committee.

Asked about the clause, Halliburton spokeswoman Cathy Mann said: "It was never KBR's intention to utilize any such release to preclude claims by current or former employees against the company. And we have no intention of doing so in the future."

Appearing before Dorgan's panel of Democrats, former workers accused Halliburton subsidiary KBR of sending unarmed civilians into an area they had been warned was the site of attacks by insurgents.

"One question haunts me: Why would KBR/Halliburton knowingly send unarmed noncombatant civilians in military tankers down a closed road where there was an ongoing battle?" said Ed Sanchez of Silver City, N.M., who survived the Good Friday Massacre.

Six KBR truck drivers and two soldiers were killed in that ambush. Another driver and one soldier are still listed as missing.

The leader of the convoy, Tommy Hamill, was kidnapped. He later escaped.

Mann said Halliburton's "priority has always been the safety and security of its employees, regardless of where they work around the world.

"The U.S. military," Mann added, "has command and control of all KBR convoys in Iraq, such as supplying pre-trip threat assessments and determining routes, and is required to provide security for KBR's employees through the company's contract with the Army."

Giving a warningSean Larvenz, a former civilian convoy commander for Halliburton subsidiary KBR, told the panel he had driven near that same intersection near Baghdad International Airport the morning of April 9, 2004.

Larvenz's convoy was attacked by small-arms fire, mortars and rocket-propelled grenades.

He said he could see mortar fire landing in the road at the interchange of two main supply routes, called Tampa and Sword. Over his radio, he could hear the sound of explosions and the chatter of drivers as their convoys were attacked.

Larvenz sent a text message to company managers warning of the danger.

"There is absolutely no question in my mind that ... KBR/Halliburton was aware of the hostilities that existed at the juncture," he said.

Three hours later, Sanchez's convoy, trying to deliver jet fuel to the airport, came under attack in the same area.

Sanchez told senators he was shot twice but managed to help two other truck drivers escape. During the attack his tanker truck caught fire, and Sanchez and the others had to abandon the vehicle.

When he was picked up by a military Humvee crowded with survivors he was handed an M-16.

"I fired that weapon for the first time in my life," he said.

Appears in a movieSanchez is one of the former Halliburton workers who appear in a recently released film, Iraq for Sale: The War Profiteers, directed by Robert Greenwald, who also produced The Crooked E: The Unshredded Truth about Enron. The film had its Houston-area theatrical release on Sept. 8.

Sanchez, along with other survivors of the ambush and family members of those who were killed, have filed suit against Halilburton in U.S. District Court in Houston.

Mann could not comment on the lawsuit, except to say that "Halliburton and KBR deny any allegations of wrongdoing and fully intend to vigorously defend our position."

T. Scott Allen Jr., a Houston-based attorney handling the case, said Halliburton is trying to get the case dismissed.

DOJ_NMG_0065495

Release from liabilityThe panel also unveiled a letter from Halliburton's government operations office in Houston sent in November 2004 to one survivor of the ambush, Ray Stannard of El Paso.

Enclosed with the letter was a "medical records release form" which "authorizes me to share your medical records with the Pentagon Review Board for the purposes of awarding you the Secretary of Defense Medal for the Defense of Freedom."

The Defense of Freedom award, the civilian equivalent of a Purple Heart, was inaugurated in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to recognize civilians hurt or killed while aiding the military.

"You most certainly qualify," the letter assured Stannard.

Clause 9 of the form, however, would release KBR and the military "from any and all claims and any and all causes of action ... I may have against any of them."

Stannard could not be reached for immediate comment.

Democrats held the hearing on their own, arguing Republicans who control the Senate have showed little interest in pursuing the issues.

Afghan Bombings Kill 19, Including Four Canadians (WP/AP)

By Noor Khan

The Washington Post/AP, September 19, 2006

KAFIR BAND, Afghanistan, Sept. 18 -- Three suicide bombers killed at least 19 people across Afghanistan on Monday, including four Canadian soldiers in an attack that tested the NATO alliance's claim of success in driving insurgents from this volatile southern region.

The deadliest attack was in the usually calm western city of Herat, where an attacker strapped with explosives on a motorbike killed 11 people and wounded 18, including the deputy police chief, officials said.

The third attack, a car bombing in the capital, Kabul, killed at least four policemen and wounded one officer and 10 civilians.

In recent weeks, Afghanistan has been suffering the heaviest insurgent attacks since the Taliban was toppled in late 2001. The suicide bombings came a day after NATO troops in the region ended a two-week offensive that the commander called a "significant success."

"It does appear that they are resorting to these despicable tactics after the pressure we have them under in their strongholds," a NATO spokesman, Maj. Luke Knittig, said in Kabul.

NATO's Operation Medusa centered on southern Kandahar province's Panjwai district, where the first of Monday's suicide bombings killed four Canadian infantrymen delivering aid and wounded an unspecified number of other troops, the Canadian military said.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousaf Ahmadi, asserted responsibility for the bombing in a telephone call to the Associated Press.

NATO said 25 civilians also were wounded in the blast in Kafir Band, a clutch of mud-brick homes surrounded by grape and pomegranate orchards.

"Fifty to 60 soldiers were patrolling on the main street when a man on a bicycle stopped and blew himself up near the forces," said Fazel Mohammed, a farmer who lives near the blast site.

"This attack amounts to a serious violation of international humanitarian law," said Tom Koenigs, the top U.N. official in Afghanistan.

The commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, said the attack took place as Canadian troops were arranging aid, reconstruction and development for villagers in the district, which suffered heavy damage during the NATO offensive.

Reacting to the recent surge of western attacks, Afghan and foreign troops launched an operation Monday in Farah province, where a dozen Taliban fighters and Afghan police officers were killed during insurgent raids last week. Operation Wyconda Pincer involves Afghan soldiers and police along with U.S., Italian and Spanish troops, NATO said.

"Fifty to 60 soldiers were patrolling on the main street when a man on a bicycle stopped and blew himself up near the forces," said Fazel Mohammed, a farmer who lives near the blast site.

He said most of the village's 25 families fled the fighting and only the poor stayed behind.

The explosion tore through the Canadian patrol, shredding uniforms and military equipment.

The commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, said the attack took place as Canadian troops were arranging aid, reconstruction and development for villagers in the district, which suffered heavy damage during the NATO offensive.

"It is beyond comprehension that a suicide bomber should choose this time to attack, knowing that he could kill innocent children," Gen. Richards said.

At least 36 Canadian soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan since 2002. Five died during Operation Medusa, in which NATO estimated it killed at least 510 insurgents with air strikes and ground assaults.

On Sunday, Gen. Richards called Operation Medusa a success and said NATO had reclaimed crucial territory from the Taliban.

Afghan Suicide Bombs Kill 18, Including 4 Canadian Soldiers (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 18 — Afghanistan was hit by three devastating suicide bomb attacks on Monday, killing 18 people and wounding more than 60, many of them children, in one of the country's worst days of violence against civilians.

Four Canadian soldiers were killed in one explosion, when a suicide bomber on a bicycle set off a bomb as the soldiers were handing out gifts to children in a village in southern Afghanistan.

Eleven other soldiers were wounded as well as 27 villagers, many of them children, local government officials said.

The bombing was in the southern village of Char Kota, in Pashmul, one of the areas that NATO troops had only just wrested from the control of Taliban fighters after two weeks of heavy fighting.

The NATO commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, declared victory in the area on Sunday, saying that NATO had taken control of the area and had forced out the remaining Taliban fighters.

NATO confirmed that four soldiers from its International Security Assistance Force had been killed and several wounded but did not confirm their nationality.

NATO said the four were on patrol in a village and talking to children when the bomber approached on his bicycle.

"This action was as much an attack on the Afghan people as an attack on" the military force, General Richards said in a statement issued in Kabul.

"This patrol was arranging the requirement for aid, reconstruction and development in the Zhare and Panjwai areas," his statement said. "It is beyond comprehension that a suicide bomber should choose this time to attack, knowing that he could kill innocent children." Another suicide bomber struck in the western town of Herat, killing 11 people and wounding 18, and a third blew up his car in Kabul, killing three policemen and wounding nine other people.

A Taliban spokesman, reached by telephone, claimed responsibility for the attack in southern Afghanistan, identifying the bomber as a man from the southern city of Kandahar.

The attacks came a day after President Hamid Karzai left to attend the United Nations General Assembly and then to make state visits to Canada and Washington.

Mr. Karzai is hoping to win more support for his beleaguered country as violence worsens, and in particular to ask President Bush to bring more pressure to bear on neighboring Pakistan to help prevent the violence.

The Afghan government says Pakistan is providing refuge to the Taliban insurgents across the border.

The attack in Herat came at 7 p.m., as townspeople were leaving the main town mosque after evening prayers, according to the provincial governor's office. It said most of those killed had been young men and the wounded had included a 4-year-old boy.

While the first spokesman said he could not confirm that it was a suicide bombing, another city official said it was the work of a suicide bomber on a bicycle, The Associated Press reported.

In Kabul, a suicide bomber blew up his car as the police approached a suspicious-looking vehicle on the main road leading east out of the city, said an Interior Ministry spokesman, Zemarai Bashari.

Three policemen were killed and one was wounded, said Ali Shah Paktiawal, director of the crime unit for the Kabul police. Eight civilian passers-by were wounded and a civilian truck was damaged.

The three bombings in one day were a clear escalation in insurgent tactics, possibly linked to Mr. Karzai's visit to the United States and to NATO claims of success on the battlefield.

A Poor Yield For Afghans' War On Drugs (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

As Opium, Heroin Trade Booms, Police Net Mainly Smaller Players

KABUL, Afghanistan -- The grim-faced man in gray prison pajamas sat on a metal chair Saturday, listening silently while judges and lawyers debated whether he had known about the 37 pounds of heroin found hidden in the car he was driving cross-country to a city near the Iranian border.

No evidence or witnesses were presented. There were glaring gaps in the police report. The car's owner, a man named Shoaib, had not been arrested, so no one could check the defendant's story that Shoaib had given him money and a car to drive home from Kabul after visiting his sister in the hospital.

"People like Shoaib are the smugglers who use poor people like my client for their business," protested the man's attorney, provided by a foreign legal aid foundation. "We should be going after the real criminals who take advantage of the poor."

After a two-hour hearing, the driver, a young house painter and father of two, was sentenced to 16 years in prison. It was a harsh punishment, based on Afghanistan's tough new drug law and meted out by its year-old narcotics court, which is battling corruption, inexperience and a long-broken legal system to crack down on Afghanistan's skyrocketing opium and heroin trade.

Foreign backers of the government of President Hamid Karzai are growing impatient with the continuing production and trafficking. President Bush weighed in Monday, saying in a report to Congress that the Afghan government must be "held accountable" and toughen its fight against drugs even further.

"We are concerned that failure to act decisively now could undermine security, compromise democratic legitimacy, and imperil international support for vital assistance," Bush said in comments accompanying an annually compiled list of major drug-transit or drug-producing countries.

Two weeks ago, the top U.N. anti-drug official aroused new international alarm when he announced here that the cultivation of opium poppies in Afghanistan had increased by 59 percent in the past year. It grew despite a slew of expensive, foreign-funded programs to eradicate poppy fields and motivate Afghan farmers to grow other crops.

Poppy farming, banned in 2000 by the Taliban administration that U.S.-led forces overthrew the following year, quickly revived after the establishment of a U.N.-backed government and has been spreading rapidly ever since. It now accounts for more than half the country's gross national income and provides the raw material for about 75 percent of the world's heroin.

"It's become an industrial production," said Doris Buddenberg, director of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime here, noting that Afghanistan's opium output this year was a staggering 6,700 tons. Rural poverty, dashed hopes for economic recovery, Taliban blandishments and anti-government sentiment "all added up to more families deciding to grow poppy," she said.

But anti-drug officials and experts here say the expansion of drug smuggling and refining is a far more pernicious problem than poppy farming and could easily turn Afghanistan into another Colombia.

"Our main problem is these former commanders and warlords who are still in power. Now they are district chiefs and local police," said Maj. Gen. Sayed Kamal Sadaat, head of the anti-narcotics police force. "The drug mafia is getting more powerful day by day, and the only support we have is from the international community. The senior authorities not only do not cooperate, they get in our way."
